As the case of Mr. Smith, of Maryland, has been particularly relied upon as a precedent, I wish to call the attention of the honorable gentleman from Vermont to some of the circumstances connected with that precedent. Some of them, I admit, are much more in his favor than has heretofore been stated, and others of them are against him. The facts in relation to the case of Mr. Smith are these—I shall endeavor to be precise in their statement:

Samuel Smith was a Senator from Maryland in 1808. His office expired by constitutional limitation on the 3d of March, 1809. It seems that the Legislature of his State had been in session before that date, and that the Legislature had forborne, from some cause or other, I do not know what, to fill the term, and had not, in fact, filled the term, as one to commence from the 4th of March, 1809. Under these circumstances, Samuel Smith was appointed by the Executive of Maryland, not to fill a vacancy which had "happened," according to the terms of the Constitution, but to go into office ab initio, to commence a term which had never been originally filled, and which, as I shall contend now, could only be filled by the election of the Legislature. It seems to be conceded, that the authority to commence a new term of six years, after the efflux of a regular term, is exclusively vested in the State Legislature.

Samuel Smith held his seat upon this floor until Congress met in May, 1809. He held his office until about June, 1809, when an extra session of the Legislature of Maryland was called. He then wrote a letter to the President of the Senate, stating the fact that he was in his seat, and was in a seat which had been filled by the Governor of Maryland. He stated, also, that the Legislature of his State had met before his appointment, and adjourned without making an election. So far, I beg leave to say, the precedent would operate in favor of the sitting member; that is, it would be competent (if the decision involved in the precedent may be regarded as having been made by the Senate) for the Governor to make an appointment after the adjournment of the Legislature, and when that body had refused or forborne to make an election; and this, too, upon the assumption that in such a state of things the Governor could take upon himself all the power that had belonged to, but had not been exercised by, the Legislature.

The session of the Legislature of Maryland, in June, 1809, continued but for five days; and the question then submitted, and the only question submitted, to the Senate, and upon which its judgment was pronounced, was whether Samuel Smith could hold under the Executive appointment to the end of that session, and not whether he was lawfully in his seat. The session terminated after a sitting of five days, and Mr. Smith went out at the end of that session, not pretending to hold any longer under the Executive appointment, having held his seat until the session of the Legislature, and no longer.

But I maintain now, and am sure that the precedents—the authority of which seems now to be regarded by the Senate—have established that Samuel Smith did not himself then present the true issue. He did not present the issue whether, under the Executive appointment to commence a term, he had been filling the seat constitutionally. That question was never presented to the Senate; and I take it for granted that if it had been presented then, and the decision had been made, as it has since been made, it would have been decided, not only that Mr. Smith was not entitled to hold his seat during the session of the Legislature, but it would have been determined that, from the very beginning—from the 4th of March, 1809—he had been holding his seat here without authority. It was supposed that his letter could not be found, but the Secretary of the Senate, with his usual industry and research, has found the letter, and put it in my possession, and I ask now that it be read.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

WASHINGTON, May 29, 1809.

SIR: The Legislature of Maryland having, at their last session, declined to appoint a Senator to represent that State in the Senate of the United States from and after the third day of March of the present year, and the Executive of the State having conferred on me the honor of an appointment, which, in conformity to the Constitution, was limited in its language to the next meeting of the Legislature of Maryland, I have to state to you, for the information of the Senate, that this meeting will take place on the fifth day of June, as by the Governor's proclamation will appear; and I have, therefore, to request that you will be pleased to lay this case before the honorable the Senate, for their determination, as to the question whether an appointment, under the Executive of Maryland, to represent that State in the Senate of the United States, will or will not cease on the first day of the meeting of the Legislature of Maryland.

SAMUEL SMITH.

TO THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BUTLER. It will be observed, Mr. President, that Mr. Smith did not make the question whether the Executive appointment originally gave him a right to a seat, or not. If he had made that question, there could have been but one judgment, according to subsequent precedents, and according to the common, obvious meaning of the Constitution.

Let me recur to the facts of that case again, before the Senate is called upon to pronounce judgment upon this precedent. The Legislature of Maryland commenced its sitting in November, 1808, and adjourned previous to the 3d of March, 1809, without having elected a Senator prospectively, whose term should commence on the 4th of March. They forborne, from some cause, to make the election. After their adjournment the Executive interposed, and made an appointment under which Mr. Smith sat in the Senate until June, 1809, when he went out, in consequence of the expiration of his office, as was supposed, by the adjournment of the Legislature. Then, in any point of view, this precedent will fail the honorable gentleman from Vermont, though, if the predicate of the original proposition were established, that Mr. Smith had a right to his seat in the first place, it would certainly be authority in his favor; but that point I shall contest, not only upon precedent, but upon the obvious reading of the Constitution of the United States. If the Senate had so decided that point, their judgment would have been in conflict with the decision made in the case of Kensey Johns, of Delaware, in 1793.

Kensey Johns presented his credentials to the Senate, and they disclosed the fact that the Legislature of Delaware had met and had not filled the place, and the Executive undertook to fill it after the adjournment of the Legislature. By a strong vote the Senate decided that Mr. Johns was not entitled to a seat, evidently on the ground that the Executive had no right to substitute his functions for those which belonged to the Legislature.

The next time that we hear of this question, or of any one akin to it, was in the case of Mr. Uriah Tracy, of Connecticut, in 1801. Mr. Tracy claimed that he had a right to commence a new term—I mean a full constitutional term—under an Executive appointment, the Legislature not having made an election in anticipation. The question was then discussed at some length, I presume, but it assumed a party character, and, by a strict party vote, Mr. Tracy was allowed to retain his seat. That precedent has not been followed, but has ever since been repudiated as authority on all occasions calling for a consideration of the question.

In 1825 Lanman's case came up for consideration, involving both the questions. In that case, after a very full debate, it was solemnly decided that it was not competent for the Governor of a State to put a member on this floor, at the commencement of a term. In other words, it was decided that his power of appointment could not be substituted for the election of the State Legislature. Even if such had not been the decision in the case of Lanman, I take it for granted that such would be and must necessarily be, the decision now.

Then I conclude, with regard to the sitting member, that neither he, nor any other person, can claim the right of taking a seat here under an Executive appointment, in a case where it belongs alone and exclusively to the Legislature to make an election. That certainly must be taken for granted. Then, so far as regards the precedents, Kensey John's case is in conflict with the ground now taken by the sitting member. So far as regards the predicate, or essential question, involved in Smith's case, it is overruled by the authority of the decision in regard to Mr. Lanman; and if there were no precedents upon the subject at all, I should hold that, according to the obvious reading of the Constitution, the vacancy which is to "happen," according to the phrase of the Constitution, is not that kind of vacancy which exists at the commencement of a constitutional term. I assume, therefore, that it is not competent for the Executive to make the appointment in such a case as must involve an election by the Legislature. I assume this as the predicate of the whole of my argument. The Executive can have no original power to make a Senator; his authority is limited, contingent, and founded on the necessity of the case. "If vacancies happen, &c., during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

Mr. President, we need not go very far upon that subject. Now let me put this proposition: Suppose the State Legislatures, after the adoption of the Federal Constitution by the different States in their conventions, had failed, or had forborne, or, from some cause, had not made an actual election, and had not sent members of the Senate here, would it have been pretended that the Executive, in such a case, could do so? I take it for granted that this Government had to go into operation according to the provisions of the Constitution. According to its provisions, the State Legislatures were the primary agencies and constituencies to put it into operation, so far as it regarded the organization of the Senate of the United States. This I take to be a very clear proposition; and upon this point I agree fully with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] that, so far as regards their relations to this body, the State Legislatures are the organs of senatorial existence; and it is through them that this body has its original, legal, and constitutional existence.

The relations of the Federal Government are with the States in nearly all particulars; and the Legislatures of the States, by a compact of the different States, are the true constituencies of the Federal Senate.

In this connection, also, allow me to remark, that this Government was never understood to be a Democracy; for so far as regards its original organization, it was essentially a confederacy of republics; and so far as regards the character of this body, it must be so. It was not a confederacy in which the Executive of a State, representing the people, might undertake to make an original nomination, nor in which the people themselves could make a nomination to this body. This was a body having an organized constituency, and the State Legislatures composed that constituency.

I do not wish to be misunderstood. In the organization of the State governments, the will of the people should be the prevailing element of control and representation; in the executive and legislative departments of such a government the people should directly make the elections, and devolve upon such government to make laws, and maintain its relations with other political Powers. These State governments should be made the organs to constitute the relation with the Federal Government. In thus considering them, the checks and balances of a regulated Republic may be understood and maintained. Such, I think, was the understanding of the republican statesmen of this great Confederacy. The States having agreed that the State Legislatures should make election of Senators, it is our duty to require them to stand to their duty, and discharge the duties imposed upon them; in other terms, to maintain the republican principles of our Constitution. What might be the consequence of a departure, I know not.

The manner in which it is proposed here allows an Executive appointment to supersede such a provision. I do not know to what it may lead. It must inevitably lead to confusion. The Legislature of a State may be a different being, in a political sense, from the Governor, so far as it may reflect the constitutional will of the people. The one—constituted so as to give it a longer existence, and one of different responsibility—might conduct to a different standard from a mere popular Executive for the time being. The one has a complicated organization, that would relieve it from individual temptation, to which the other might be subjected.

I have alluded to the precedents; let me now refer to the Constitution specifically. What is the Constitution? If this were a new question, I take it for granted that I should decide, according to the strict letter of the Constitution, that the limitation was upon the appointing power, and that the member holding his seat under Executive appointment would hold no longer than the meeting of the Legislature, or no longer than this body had official notice of the meeting of the State Legislature. But I am willing to agree that, according to a fair and liberal construction of the intentment of the framers of the Constitution—I wish to consult their will as far as I can—it may not have been intended, in the first instance, that eo instanti, when the Legislature met, the office should determine, or that the Legislature, upon the very first day of its meeting, should go into the election of a Senator. For this reason there has been a liberal allowance of time, so as to give the Legislature the right to make the election during the sitting; making "during the sitting" to fulfill the words "until the meeting," &c., and the same as to make session and meeting to mean "at which the election shall take place." To give the words referred to such an interpretation would but devolve on the Legislature—on the Legislature instead of the Executive—the jurisdiction of making a Senator; and it would seem to me, so soon as it is devolved on one (with the simple limitation as to time of performing a duty) it is taken from the other, without the power of resumption.

I take this broad proposition, that the moment the Legislature assembles it must necessarily resume the original jurisdiction over the subject; and if it must resume the original jurisdiction over the matter, the Executive power is exhausted; and when the Executive power is once exhausted it cannot be resumed, nor can it be continued. I do not say that it depends upon the actual exertion of power on the part of the Legislature; but the very existence of its jurisdiction supersedes all others, and must be exclusive. As I have said in my report, the moment the Legislature meets, the power to make an election exclusively devolves upon that body; and if this be so the Executive power must necessarily be exhausted.

I am willing to go very far and say, that there shall be a liberal time allowed for the exercise of the legislative power; but the fact that it is not exercised does not restore an exhausted power. If the executive power be exhausted upon the meeting of the Legislature, I know no mode by which it can be restored to the Executive; and it cannot be done by any legal intentment, or by any fair construction of the Constitution. The original power is in the Legislature, and the Governor has but a power of attorney, revocable the moment the Legislature meets. It is revoked, to all intents and purposes, when the Legislature has the potential faculty of exercising its power. In order to allow it to continue until the exercise of the power by the Legislature during its session, I grant it is necessary to resort, as has been said, to something like the fictions of law, and to regard the whole meeting of the Legislature as a day, as a unit, like the term of a court, counting the word "session" as synonymous with "meeting"—that is to say, the member, under Executive appointment, shall hold until the Legislature, at its next session, shall assume a jurisdiction over the matter, with the further qualification that during such session it cannot divest itself of a jurisdiction that has thrown on it an exclusive responsibility.

It may, perhaps, be going very far to resort to that apparent fiction. I am not so sure, however, that it is not one favorable to truth; but if you do not give it that view, you certainly would subject the State to some of the objections which have been made here, as to not being fully represented in this body. But I am not to be seduced by any temptations of that kind, to have a State represented here by my choice, instead of that of the Legislature. Construction has no terminus to restrain its flexibility; and it might assume a sphere, under a liberal and friendly indulgence, that might give, virtually, this body the power of selecting, if not electing, a Senator.

Here, I may say, by way of parenthesis, that if it depended upon my choice, and, I believe, if it depended upon the choice of the Senate—if they had the power, by construction, of making the selection—the honorable gentleman from Vermont would be allowed to retain his seat. I know of no man whom I would prefer to see occupy it from his State. If I had the choice, I should prefer to see him in it, but the power to make an election for the State of Vermont is not lodged in me. It is a power vested in the State Legislature by the Constitution of the United States; and I cannot allow any one to come into this body, except according to the mode prescribed by the Constitution. I must shut the gate against all who do not come with a warrant of competent authority, from the only constituency which I can recognize here.

Well, sir, I contend that if the ground taken by the Executive of Vermont can be maintained, there is no limitation at all to the term of Senators holding under Executive appointments. The only limitation that there can be is the next session of the Legislature during the senatorial term. The Legislature, at its first session, might not make an election. The Senator would still hold his seat, according to the argument of the majority of the committee. It might meet a second and a third time, and he could still hold his seat, under an Executive appointment. It might meet a fourth time, and not make an election; and still the Senator could remain here. It might go further, and, according to the broad ground which is taken, when there was a new term to be commenced, the Executive could supply it, or, at least, the old appointment would run on, in spite of any objections which could be made to it; because it had been made, and the Legislature not having thought proper to exercise the right of filling the vacancy, that must stand until the Legislature did fill the vacancy. Under this construction, therefore, an Executive appointment, which is regarded as contingent and limited, to fill temporary vacancies, would be a greater power than the legislative power to fill these vacancies. That must be the consequence, and gentlemen cannot disguise it.

I have come to the conclusion myself, that it is in violation of the Constitution of the United States to allow a member under an Executive appointment to sit here any longer than until the Legislature has met and adjourned; and, in that respect, a precedent established in the case of Mr. Smith, of Maryland, is in the teeth of the claim now set up, because Mr. Smith only made a single issue—he presented the question whether he should hold his seat until the meeting of the Legislature, which was to take place in a day or two afterwards, or whether he could hold until the termination of the session of the Legislature. The Senate decided that he could hold until the adjournment of the Legislature; and he never held it a day afterwards under the Executive appointment. This shows that the common understanding at that day was that an Executive appointment terminated certainly at the adjournment of the Legislature.

Not only precedent, but the fair and obvious reading of the Constitution, it seems to me, is entirely against the pretension set up by the Executive of Vermont; and I should be very sorry to see the precedent, which would be set by the adoption of the resolution of the majority of the committee, now established. I believe it is one which might touch deeply the structure and organization of this Confederacy, substituting, as it would, an Executive appointment for the solemn deliberations of a State Legislature in sending an ambassador or a representative here. I will never consent to any such thing.

It has, however, been asked: "Will you deprive the State of a representative upon this floor when you have it in your power to allow a representative to continue here?" and gentlemen say that, according to the intentment of the Constitution, and Democratic equality, we should never allow a State to be misrepresented when we can prevent it. According to my view of the structure of this Government that is more for the consideration of each State than for the determination of this body. I would respect more the rights of the independent States than the Democratic determinations of the United States Senate.

Suppose this case, that a State Legislature, by resolution, had refused to make an election, and in conformity with it a Governor were to refuse to make an appointment—I admit that I am now presuming a case which is very extravagant, and one having something of the character of a revolution, but still it is possible—suppose, then, that the people in the State unanimously—this is a strong proposition—were to meet and send a Senator here, would it then be contended that we could so far consult Democratic equality as to admit such person as a constitutional Senator on this floor? Sir, if such a man came here, and had been anointed with all the Democracy that is bottled up in Tammany Hall, he should not take a seat here with my consent. No, sir; I have no idea of substituting the Democratic judgment of the Federal Departments for the constitutional rights of the States separately, or as they exist in a recognized compact. I intend to maintain here, by my vote, the principles which I assert. I contend that this is a confederacy of republics, and that the State Legislatures are the constituencies of this body; and whenever you break down that doctrine, and run into anything else, you may make it one of those Democracies in which the people will rise up and dictate to us, contrary to our opinions, under the sanctions of the Constitution.

I have supposed a strong case. The honorable gentleman from Vermont, I believe, does not represent what is called a Democratic seat; but if any gentleman claiming to be a Senator from New York were to apply here under the circumstances which I have stated, and had the favorable voice of all the Democracy—Hards and Softs—Tammany and all—poured out upon him, I could not go contrary to the Constitution, to admit him to a seat here, and he should not have a seat, according to my notion of the Constitution. For this reason, all the arguments which are used, that we must fill the seat because it is favorable to views of equality, Democratic views of the Constitution, do not at all change my opinion. I will not entertain the doctrine, that the Senate can have devolved upon it duties to a State, in maintaining equal representation, when a State has failed to discharge its constitutional responsibilities according to the mode prescribed for it.

Mr. President, I shall not say more. I have now gone further on this subject than I intended, and I have said more than the state of my voice properly allows me to do. I wished simply to put my views before the Senate. They may decide upon the case as they please; and if that decision shall be against that of my judgment, it will give me no concern, personally.

Mr. BADGER. I yield very readily to the suggestion thrown out by my friend, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that we should suggest to the Senate such doubts or difficulties as we may have in relation to the right of the honorable gentleman [Mr. PHELPS] to a seat, and give him an opportunity of hearing them before he replies. I follow that example this morning, because I believe it is right; I believe it is due to the Senate, due to myself, and due to the gentleman from Vermont. Mr. President, I have, so far as I am able to do it, without hearing the full and clear exposition of the subject which that gentleman will give, and as to which I hold myself ready to open my mind to conviction, come to the conclusion that, upon a just construction of the Constitution, that honorable gentleman is not entitled to the place which he now occupies on this floor.

I do not think it necessary to follow the example of my friend from South Carolina on this occasion, and go into an investigation of the doctrine of State rights, or the nature of this Government, for which he has a remarkable proclivity. This is a question of the construction of a clause of the Constitution, and must receive the same result, upon a careful and proper examination of its provisions, whether we adopt or disregard what is commonly called the doctrine of State-Rights.

Now, Mr. President, I will present in a very brief space my views upon this question. The Constitution provides that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years." It also provides that "if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." It is clear that the Constitution has vested the appointment of Senators in the Legislatures of the several States; and it is also clear that the provision which it makes for "temporary appointments" is a provision for a case of necessity, and of necessity only. And therefore, in undertaking to expound the particular language which is used in this clause of the Constitution, we must consider, as a key for resolving everything that may be considered doubtful or uncertain in its phraseology, this proposition: that the power of appointment is in the Legislature, and that the power of granting temporary commissions is a power conferred in a case of necessity, and therefore all the language is to be so expounded as to terminate the temporary appointment with the termination of the necessity. It being clear, that if there be doubt or uncertainty in the language used, it is to be so expounded as to terminate the temporary appointment with the necessity which gave rise to it, what is the language of the Constitution upon which the difficulty or the supposed difficulty arises?

Two constructions are offered. One is that the limitation expressed by the word "until" is upon the power of the Executive to make appointments; and the other is that it is upon the holding of the person appointed. I am satisfied, Mr. President, that it makes little or no difference as to the result at which we must arrive, whether the one or the other exposition be given to it. The honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PERRY], I confess, in the very forcible and clear argument which he offered here the other day, unsettled for a time all the previous notions which I had entertained upon the subject; but I have reexamined it; I have thought of it with an anxious desire to arrive at the truth, and I must confess that I have swung back to my original moorings.

That Senator says that "the next meeting of the Legislature" means the first assemblage of the Legislature at a session. In my opinion, the Constitution has itself demonstrated that it means no such thing; that it uses the word "meeting" as exactly synonymous with "session;" that it embraces not the mere act of getting together or assembling, but the whole process and continued transactions of the Legislature until an adjournment closes their session. Let us see if that is not so. The language is that the Executive "may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Will the Senator, while upon that point, as I have great confidence in his legal judgment, allow me to propound a question to him?

Mr. BADGER. Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I ask the question now, because it is material to the opinion which I may form of this case. I desire to ask the Senator from North Carolina, if the phrase, "until the next meeting of the Legislature," is to be taken and construed to mean "during the session;" because, by legal and parliamentary language, a term of a court or session of Parliament, at the making of the Constitution, was deemed as only a day—the day of their inception—and decrees and judgments of the courts and acts of Parliament were, by English and colonial jurisprudence, in force as entered or passed on the first day of the term or session. What I desire to ask the gentleman is this: if ex vi termini "session" means the entire session, according to legal and parliamentary language, as used in the Constitution, would or would not Mr. PHELPS, under a new commission from the Governor, be entitled to his seat, because the new commission conferred a temporary appointment to fill a vacancy caused "otherwise" than by death, viz: the failure of the Vermont Legislature to fill the vacancy temporarily filled by Mr. PHELPS? and further, is the vacancy now existing a vacancy caused by Mr. Upham's death, or the expiration of Mr. PHELPS's temporary appointment? Did not this vacancy occur after the Vermont Legislature adjourned?

Mr. BADGER. I think my friend can hardly expect me to stop here to answer his question, because it is in reality asking me what are my views upon the whole subject-matter before the Senate. I shall endeavor to explain them before I get through.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. The point as to which I particularly desire the opinion of the gentleman is, as to what would be the effect of a new commission.

Mr. BADGER. I will speak upon each point in its order; but my friend anticipates a little. After conferring upon the Executive power to appoint "until the next meeting of the Legislature," the Constitution adds, "which shall then fill such vacancies." Now, the word "then" is a word of reference. To what does it refer? To "the next meeting of the Legislature." Let us strike out the word "then," and insert the words to which it refers as the most unobjectionable method of ascertaining the meaning of the phrase. It would then read that the Executive "may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall, at such next meeting, fill such vacancies." Whatever the words "next meeting" mean, when used in the first instance, the word "then," substituted by reference, means in the second place; and whatever it means in the second it means in the first. Let us inquire, then, what it means in the second. Did the Constitution mean that the Legislature at their first coming together, in their assembly, should proceed to fill the vacancy? Why, surely not. Such a construction would make the framers of this sacred instrument, upon which we value ourselves so much, not only not remarkable for intelligence, but extremely wanting in even the ordinary capacity to prepare a great and solemn public instrument.

The Legislature is at its first meeting to fill the vacancy. Does not that very term demonstrate that by first meeting they meant first session, and that they did not mean the first act of coming together, the moment that they were assembled in the legislative chamber, or so soon as they were organized, and without an adjournment; surely not. Then, if the term did not mean that the Legislature was to make the appointment the first moment, or the first day of their meeting, I pray you to inform me what limitation is there upon it except the whole session, from the beginning to the end? If the Constitution did not confine them to an election on the first day, it did not to the second, or the third, the fourth, or the fifth day of their session. And therefore the Constitution, according to my understanding, has itself said that by the words "next meeting" was not intended the first coming together of the members in a session, but the session itself. Everything is entirely consistent, according to my views, with this exposition.

The Executive "may make temporary appointments." Mark, if you please, Mr. President, that the Constitution does not say that the Executive may fill the seat. The Constitution considers a continuing vacancy in the term; but an acting Senator, a man who is to hold and discharge the duties until the vacancy shall be filled in the constitutional method, is allowed to be appointed by the Governor, who "may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

Then, it seems to me, Mr. President, the interpretation upon this clause of the Constitution is clear, if we look at the mind and intention of the framers of the Constitution. It was, that in the case of necessity which grew out of an accidental termination, by "resignation or otherwise," of the connection between a member and his seat or place in this body—the Legislature not being in session—in that case of necessity the Executive shall have power to do what? Not, in the sense of the Constitution, to fill the vacancy—for the man who fills the vacancy holds as the party who held before; that is, for the term—but "to make temporary appointments" till the appointing body shall be together, and have an opportunity of filling the vacancy.

Now, Mr. President, this view of the subject is in exact accordance with everything that has been determined by the Senate. I do not undertake to speculate whether, as my friend from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] says, the framers of the Constitution were influenced by any reference to the fiction which prevails in courts of law, or the fiction that prevailed in the Parliament of Great Britain and the Colonial Legislatures, that all proceedings referred to and took effect and operation from the first day of a session. I do not suppose there was such a reference, but they have determined the sense in which they used the word; and, I think, in exact accordance with the sense I have put upon it, are the resolutions of the Senate.

Now, the resolution in the case of Mr. Smith, of Maryland, was that he was entitled to hold, during the session of the Legislature, unless they should, by an election, fill the vacancy and notify the Senate that they had done so, during the session. Certainly. Why during the session? Why did they use that phrase? Simply because the Senate put upon the words "next meeting" the interpretation I have given them, so as to mean the next session. Now, if "meeting" means "session," this particular point is concluded forever; as to what is meant by the term "next meeting." It is clear that the Legislature can do what the Constitution requires at the first meeting after the vacancy occurs, (for the Constitution both empowers and requires it to fill the vacancy then,) if the word "meeting" means "session;" for then the Legislature can do it at any time during the session. Then what is to determine the temporary appointment? It is the meeting of the Legislature, and filling the vacancy; and if the Legislature adjourn without filling the vacancy, the whole necessity upon which the temporary appointment was allowed being gone, the authority of the party who held under the temporary appointment granted for such necessity, is, of course, ended.

We are not, Mr. President, as I apprehend, to speculate ingeniously about the particular application of certain phrases technically in the Constitution. It has been long settled as a rule of interpretation of that instrument by the highest tribunal in the country—by Mr. Madison, and the other persons associated with him, Hamilton and Jay—in the letters in which they commended this instrument to the adoption of the people, that its interpretation is to be popular, unless where words strictly technical are employed.

Then look at this question. Is it not plain? The Legislature has the appointment. But a vacancy may arise when the Legislature cannot fill it. For that necessity the Constitution provides, and means to provide only until the Legislature meets, and has the power of filling it—till the general appointing authority is in a condition to act. It is true, as I have said, that authority must be extended through the whole session, for the very obvious reason that it cannot mean that they are to elect at their first coming together; it means during the session; for if they may take one day to consider of it, they may take the whole session.

Now, my friend from Kentucky has suggested one or two questions, which I think will be sufficiently answered by this statement. The vacancies which the Executive of a State is authorized to fill, are never vacancies that happen by the efflux of time; they are not foreseen vacancies; they are vacancies that "happen" by resignation or otherwise."

Mr. President, from an exceeding desire to give to this clause of the Constitution such a construction as would keep the Senate always full, I labored hard, a year or two ago, when we had questions of this kind before us, to find out some method of supporting, in my own mind, the construction that a vacancy happening by the efflux of time, and not filled beforehand by the Legislature, might be brought within this limited power conferred upon the Executive; but, sir, I have been obliged to abandon it.

"By resignation or otherwise," is the language. We must expound the word "otherwise" to apply to vacancies happening by similar events; that is, unforeseen events—death, resignation, appointment to an office which disqualifies—and it can never be applied to the expiration of the term of a Senator which leaves a seat vacant on this floor. My opinion, therefore, is, that the Governor of a State has no power to fill a vacancy in this body which is brought about by the expiration or efflux of the time for which a Senator was elected—in other words, at the determination of his term in the Senate. It must be a vacancy in the term, happening during the recess of the Legislature; it must be a vacancy in the term happening by resignation or other casualty. That I understand to have been the express and solemn decision of the Senate in Mr. Lanman's case, in 1825, overruling one or two earlier decisions, which had passed, perhaps, without full consideration.

So, Mr. President, as I consider this whole power, and the duration of the appointment depending upon it, as conferred for a special necessity, and as terminating with that necessity—the power of the Executive to appoint and the right of the person holding under the exercise of that power—so it necessarily follows that, if a legislative session intervene when there is a vacancy in this body which has not been filled, the Executive of the State can have no power to fill it after the expiration of that session. The necessity existed; it existed until the meeting of the Legislature. The power was not exerted during the necessity; or if exerted during the necessity, expires with it; and, as a necessary and inevitable consequence, the power is not reproduced to be exerted afterwards.

Mr. President, every view of this subject strengthens what I have suggested. The arguments have been well stated as strong to support the construction which I have given to this clause of the Constitution. The Senator from South Carolina has well said, that if there be no limitation on the appointment, except the filling of the vacancy by the Legislature, if it may continue beyond an intervening session of the Legislature, the appointment certainly does not end until the expiration of the term for which the resigned or deceased Senator was elected.

And permit me to ask you, sir, what follows; what might follow; yes, Mr. President, and what certainly would follow if this interpretation be adopted? In some of the States the Senate holds over, while the House of Representatives is elected annually. Suppose the Senate of a State to be of a particular political complexion, and the Executive of the same political complexion. A vacancy has arisen, and a temporary appointment has been made by the Executive. The Legislature meets, and it is the duty of the Legislature, under the Constitution, to fill that vacancy. But suppose also an overwhelming number of the House of Representatives, or the Lower House, by whatever name called, which is just elected by the people, whose politics are directly different from those of the Senate holding over—can it be, sir, that we are to hold out a direct encouragement to that Senate to refuse to go into an election, and cause the popular will of the State to be misrepresented, to continue in this body a man who has ceased entirely to represent the views of the people whom he is sent here to represent; and, therefore, to add to some of the difficulties which sometimes arise in the way of the Legislature, the positive inducement to forbear discharging the duty imposed upon them by the Constitution, in order to advance the party interests represented by the Senate holding over.

Mr. President, if my friend from Vermont can satisfy me that these views are wrong, so far as he is personally concerned I shall rejoice at it. I believe with my honored friend from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] that if it depended upon the Senate to say, as a matter of choice, whether he should fill the place on this floor which he now so worthily occupies, there would not be a dissenting voice in this Chamber. But that is not the question we have to decide; it is a question of constitutional right. If he is entitled to retain his place, then the most unworthy and most objectionable man, under circumstances the most improper, such as I have already adverted to, may be authorized to hold a seat on this floor from session to session, and from year to year. I cannot resist the conclusion that the Senate heretofore has not been mistaken with regard to the true purport of the Constitution, and that the true construction to be placed upon it is, that, with the necessity expires the Executive appointing power, and the right of those who hold under it, and that the Constitution intended, and the Senate has always so recognized it, that by the term "meeting" was intended "session." Then by inevitable consequence it follows, that though the Senator holding under the temporary appointment has a right to sit during the whole of the next session of the Legislature, unless superseded by a new appointment, yet when that session ends the seat necessarily fails; the necessity is gone under which he held. The full time, period, and opportunity contemplated by the Constitution has been given to the general electing power—the Legislature; they have failed—whether by fault or misfortune, whether because they could not agree, or because one House was obstinate, and would not go into joint ballot; or because both Houses refused to discharge a solemn duty devolved upon them by the Constitution and their oaths, makes no difference as to the effect of such adjournment upon the temporary appointment which had its whole origin, owed its whole life, and had therefore, necessarily, its continuance measured by the accidental, casual necessity out of which it sprung.

Therefore, Mr. President, as at present advised, with the greatest reluctance in the world—I mean reluctance so far as the honorable gentleman is personally concerned—I shall feel obliged to vote against the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, if I thought that this course of debate was best calculated to elicit from the Senate a correct decision on this question, I should submit to it in silence; but I entertain a very different opinion in regard to it. We have now heard three consecutive speeches—all very able ones—from gentlemen opposed to the member from Vermont holding his seat. The proposition which was made yesterday, and acquiesced in by the gentleman who claims the seat was, that he should reserve himself until the close of the discussion, and then give us his views upon the question whether he is entitled to the seat or not. I submit, sir, that that course is unjust both to the claimant and to ourselves. I think we ought to hear the argument of the gentleman who claims the seat, in the first instance, and then, after having heard him, we can discuss the question between ourselves. If we concur with him, we can say so; if we differ from him, we can show the reasons why we do so.

But, sir, if this course is to be pursued, it is evident that nearly all the members of the Senate will express themselves on one side or the other before the gentleman who claims the seat, and who, it must be presumed, has examined the subject much more thoroughly than any of us, has been heard in defense of his claim. I trust that course will be adopted which I think has been adopted in every case of a similar character, that the claimant to the seat shall be fully heard in the first instance, and that then, if there be any one who desires to reply to him, he may do so; and others who oppose the claim may also speak; and at the close of the debate, the claimant will fairly be entitled to reply to those who oppose him. I trust, therefore, that if the gentleman from Vermont himself, has not any insuperable objection to going on with the debate, we shall now have the privilege of hearing him.

Mr. BUTLER. I have but a word to say as to the propriety of the suggestion of my friend from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON.] It is not usual for a member whose seat is contested to mingle at all in the debate. I feel bound to say that such is the parliamentary usage; but when it was proposed that the honorable gentleman who claims the seat of Senator from Vermont should be heard in the first instance, I yielded. We heard him before the committee, and I am willing to hear him at this time, and also at the conclusion of the debate; but I would not have it understood, by any remark which has been made by the honorable Senator from Delaware, that there is any disposition to deny to the gentleman from Vermont any personal courtesy which could be extended to him.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not believe there is.

Mr. BUTLER. I can assure the gentleman that, according to the usage in the Parliament of England in such cases as the one now presented, the claimant would have asked leave to be heard at the bar of the House; and he would have been heard at the bar at the beginning, and the members would have deliberated upon the subject afterwards. But I am perfectly willing to hear the gentleman again, because the committee has reported in his favor.

Mr. TOUCEY. Mr. President, not having been present in the Committee on the Judiciary when this subject was before them, I shall desire very briefly to express my views to the Senate at some time before the vote is taken. I had intended to do so this morning; but the floor has been preoccupied, and I am willing to give way to the gentleman who claims the seat from Vermont, if he desires it, and he may address the Senate before the discussion is concluded on the part of the members of the Senate. I should myself desire to hear him, before I express an opinion with regard to the title which he has to the seat.

Mr. PETTIT. I think the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary is mistaken in reference to the precedents. I do not know that I am now prepared to speak of the precedents in the Parliament of Great Britain in cases of contested elections, but, so far as the other end of this Capitol is concerned, I have had considerable experience there. I have mingled in the debates of that House in at least half a dozen cases of contested election, and it is the uniform practice there to hear the arguments and the views of the contestants at such time as may suit them. It is a courtesy which is never denied, never refused.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not deny it; I do not refuse it; nobody objects to it; I was only explaining the effect of my suggestion.

Mr. PHELPS then proceeded to argue his right to the seat which he claimed. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. DIXON interposed at three o'clock, and moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope we shall make some disposition of this subject, one way or the other. I shall feel constrained to ask the Senate to take up to-morrow the special order that was fixed for that day. I hope there may be some understanding as to what shall be done with it. If gentlemen move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until the Nebraska bill be disposed of, I shall not interpose any objection.

Mr. PHELPS. I am very far from wishing to interfere at all with the arrangements of the honorable Senator from Illinois. I should have been willing to finish my remarks to-morrow; or, if that should interfere with the wishes of the Senate, to defer them to a later day. I am not at all solicitous about it.

Mr. PRATT. I make the distinct proposition to postpone the further consideration of this subject until after the final action of the Senate upon the Nebraska bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WELLER in the chair.) There is a motion to adjourn pending.

Mr. DIXON. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PRATT. I desire to submit the distinct proposition, that the subject now under debate be postponed until after the final action of the Senate on the Nebraska bill. I think that would be perfectly in order, because there is no rule which requires a particular day to be named to which to postpone the consideration of any subject. I think that by adopting this course we shall be doing justice to the honorable gentleman from Vermont. He will not have an opportunity now of making his speech as satisfactorily as at a future period. The Senate will then be more willing to listen to him; and, in the mean time, we shall have an opportunity of examining his remarks, so far as they have been made.

Heretofore, the debate has been almost entirely upon one side; at least since I have been here. I think, therefore, it is due to him that there should be a postponement of the subject, so that we may see both sides of the question. Certainly no injury can result to his State, no injury can result to anybody by having this subject postponed until after the action of the Senate on the Nebraska bill; and if there is any dispute about it, I shall ask the yeas and nays upon the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject until the Senate shall have finally passed upon the Nebraska bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. It occurs to me that that motion is not altogether in order. It is not proper to move to postpone a subject until after the happening of a certain event. The motion must be either to postpone to a day certain, or to lay upon the table. That is the rule.

Mr. PRATT. Let it be postponed for a fortnight.

Mr. MASON. I concur entirely in the suggestion that this subject should be postponed. It is a very grave and important question, and one on which we have been told by the gentleman who claims a seat from Vermont, that there have been, apparently, some previous commitments of opinion by the Senate, and by individual Senators. I shall feel it incumbent upon me to detain the Senate for a very short time with my views upon the question, and I would suggest to the Senator from Maryland to fix a day on which we shall proceed to the consideration of this subject, and if the Nebraska bill be not then disposed of, we can proceed with it, and consider this afterwards.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Say to-morrow week.

Mr. PRATT. Any day may be named; this day week or this day fortnight, the understanding being that the subject shall come up immediately when the Nebraska bill shall have been acted upon.

Mr. MASON. Say to-morrow week.

Several SENATORS. Monday week.

Mr. MASON. I will propose Thursday of next week, if the Senator from Maryland does not propose it.

Mr. PRATT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MASON. Then I move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until this day week.

Mr. PRATT. If the understanding of the Senate be as I have mentioned, the particular day cannot be material, because so soon as the Nebraska bill shall have been finally acted upon, this subject will come up.

Whether the postponement be to this day week or this day fortnight cannot be material. If you postpone this bill to this day week, and we shall not then have finished the Nebraska bill, by common understanding we can continue the debate on this subject until that be finished. It is, therefore, perfectly immaterial what day is fixed.

Mr. MASON. I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until this day week. The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. BRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 2, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MINT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting the annual report of the Director of the Mint at Philadelphia, showing the operations of the Mint and the branch Mints for the year 1853; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania, moved that twenty thousand extra copies of the report be printed; which motion goes, under the rule, to the Committee on Printing.

PROTECTION OF THE MAILS.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, "for the safe transmission of the mails of the United States on the railroads of the United States" was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon which the previous question was demanded.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to submit a point of order. I have been looking through the rules in vain to accomplish the object which I desire now to accomplish through the Speaker. I have understood, perhaps erroneously, and if so, I desire to be corrected, that a motion being made to reconsider a vote had on a previous day, the act of reconsideration must be consummated on the subsequent day or it falls; that is to say, that the motion to reconsider the vote by which this bill was referred, having been made by a gentleman who voted with the majority, and the act of reconsideration not having been consummated on the day subsequent to that on which the bill was referred, the motion falls.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, and states that the motion to reconsider must be submitted upon the day, or the succeeding day, but that the House is not compelled to dispose of the motion on either of those days.

Mr. FLORENCE. My idea was that the motion to reconsider must be disposed of on the days I have indicated, and I looked into the rules to see whether we were proceeding in order, as I desire always to do.

The SPEAKER. The 56th rule is as follows: "When a motion has been once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for a reconsideration thereof, on the same or the succeeding day."

Mr. FLORENCE. Then the Chair rules that the point of order cannot be sustained?

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire if the bill has yet been printed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the bill has not been returned from the printing office.

Mr. JONES. If it is not here we are in a bad fix to act upon it.

The SPEAKER. There is a copy of the bill here.

Mr. JONES. What copy has gone to the printer then?

The SPEAKER. The copy that was originally introduced, as the Chair is informed, is in the hands of the printer. There is, however, a copy of the bill before the House to vote on.

Mr. JONES. In order that we may have the bill printed and before us, so that we may know exactly its contents, I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. To-morrow will be private bill day, and I am desirous that the deficiency bill shall be completed this week.

Mr. OLDS demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Mr. LILLY. Would it be in order to move that the consideration of the bill under consideration be postponed to a future day?

The SPEAKER. Not while the privileged motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is pending.

Mr. OLDS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS of Alabama, and OLDS were appointed.

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative, the tellers having reported—ayes 73, noes 49.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SEYMOUR in the chair.)

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The subject under consideration is the deficiency bill, the pending question being on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] which is to reduce the appropriation for the custom-house at Louisville to $500.

Mr. BISSELL. I propose, by the unanimous consent of the House, to withdraw my amendment.

There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PRESTON.] The Clerk will report the amendment:

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

"For completing the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, $40,000."

Mr. LILLY. I move to strike out the words "custom-house" and insert the words "post office." I think, from the remarks made by gentlemen yesterday, that this is really and emphatically a post office building, and not a custom-house, as there is but one gentleman employed by the Government as a custom-house officer, while there are no less than sixty persons employed in the post office.

Now I think that calling the building a custom-house, under such circumstances, is considerably like getting money under false pretenses. We are not building a custom-house, but really we are building a post office. If a post office be necessary at Louisville, it is also necessary at divers other places throughout the country where there are distributing offices, and where there is a large amount of business transacted. And I think that if we are going to build a post office at Louisville we ought to build them also at divers other places in the country. If my motion carries to strike out the words "custom-house" and insert the words "post office," and if it be the general will of the House to make appropriations for building post offices, I have no objection, and I shall willingly vote for the bill.

The question was put on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PRESTON.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I propose an amendment, to reduce the appropriation one dollar. I desire to make one or two observations on this matter. From some remarks dropped yesterday, it might have been inferred that it was intended to convey the idea that the bids originally made and closed under Mr. Corwin's administration had been reopened by the present Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of giving a job to a political friend. Now, I will simply explain to the committee the reasons assigned by the Secretary himself for opening the bids. The whole amount appropriated at different times for the Louisville custom-house was $178,745. Sixteen thousand dollars of this sum had to be taken for the purchase of the site, which reduced it that amount. The lowest bid for erecting the building alone was $179,000, and a fraction. This bid was made under Mr. Corwin's administration. The Secretary says, "being anxious to bring the whole expense within the amount appropriated, I directed alterations to be made in the plan, and curtailments to be made, with a view to reduce the expenditure. I then opened it to new bids." But still the bids were above the appropriations at his command.

I will also answer a remark made yesterday by my colleague upon the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. HAVEN,] giving his reasons for voting against this appropriation. He says it is right in the abstract, but says he will vote against it, because he will not sanction the practice of allowing an Administration to commit Congress to the expenditure of any sum of money which the House may not, when they come to act upon it, be willing to pass. That has not been done, as the gentleman will see, if he will take the pains to observe the language of the Secretary of the Treasury. He has not committed the House to any expenditure; and he has made no contract which binds the Congress of the United States.

The Secretary, finding the sum of money at his disposal not sufficient to complete the custom-house according to its original plan, has not had the building put up at all. He has made conditional contracts, the fulfillment of which await the action of Congress. He has done what he ought to have done, and what every officer ought to do, under the same circumstances. He did not go on, as has been done heretofore, expending the money appropriated, in violation of an act of Congress, and having expended the whole, come back to Congress to make up the deficiency.

What will be the effect if you choose not to pass this amendment, and make this appropriation? The whole sum appropriated is $178,745. The amount heretofore expended is $16,000 for a site, and some $6,000 in excavations, and work preparing the foundation—making together some $22,000. This leaves the sum of $155,745 as available funds, now in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be applied to that work. But the Secretary says that $40,000 more is required to complete the building, according to the original plan. If this amount is not appropriated, the effect will be that the Secretary will take the $155,000 and build such a custom-house as that sum will erect.

After a good deal of hesitation, I have come to the determination, as one of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, to separate from the majority of my colleagues on the committee, and to support the estimates and recommendations of the Secretary, in relation to all these custom-houses. I say, I have come to that conclusion, after a good deal of hesitation, because I would not, as an original thing, favor the building of large custom-houses in the interior of the country. And, in my opinion, this system will finally put a stop to the collection of revenue by duties on imports. The machinery will become too cumbersome and expensive. Why, sir, in twenty-five years, if we proceed at the present rate, extending these custom-houses to all the little towns, the Government will have an amount of real estate so large that the rents of it would almost meet its annual expenditure. But the question presented now is one of a different nature. You have already appropriated a large sum of money for the purpose of building a house, which ought to be a fire-proof building. It is suggested that $40,000 more is necessary to that purpose, and the question is, whether you will take the $155,000 and build therewith an indifferent structure, or will you add $40,000, making in all $195,000, and build a fire-proof building? Under this state of the question, I shall vote for the appropriation.

I feel myself bound, upon the same ground, to vote for the estimates in regard to the custom-houses at Cincinnati and elsewhere.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is it in order to oppose this amendment, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg leave to say, then, a single word, as I intend to vote against this and all other like appropriations; and I want it understood that my vote is not governed by any opposition to this particular measure.

I am opposed to all appropriations for custom-houses in the interior of the country. They are necessary upon the frontiers, of course. You are obliged to have one, for instance, at Chicago, upon the northern frontier, and one at New Orleans, upon the southern border. You are obliged to have them upon the Atlantic coast. It is not necessary that you should build them in the interior; and I have heretofore regularly opposed all appropriations for that purpose. Gentlemen from the West say, as they do not get any part of the appropriation made for the support of the Army and Navy, that, therefore, they must have something. The Army and Navy are created to protect the whole country, and the State of Kentucky would be better protected in time of war than any State upon the frontier. The enemy would have to pass through the frontier States to get into Kentucky. The object of the Army and Navy being national defense, it is idle for my friend to say that the people of his State do not derive the same benefit. It might as well be argued that the center of a corn-field would be less protected by a fence than the outer rows of corn, because it was further from the fence around it. I agree with the gentleman that, so far as local advantage is concerned, the interior of the country is rather behind the frontier. When the subject of internal improvements was under consideration, where I thought the expenditure was a legitimate one for the improvement of western rivers, I moved to raise the appropriation for the Mississippi river from some $200,000, up to $858,000. I am willing, whenever such a bill comes up, to give the West a liberal appropriation for those works. But are we to go on with this system of building custom-houses because my friend from Kentucky wants to have a magnificent building to beautify his city, or because a portion of his constituents want to get contracts, or want to be employed as workmen, and so forth? Are we to go on and make a large expenditure for a work that is wholly unnecessary?

It is true the appropriation for building this custom-house has already been made; but if the building were up, I would vote to sell it, or any other custom-house in the interior. I had rather devote the money to some other useful purpose, than expend the public funds in this way. I know that gentlemen from the West are sensitive, when we vote against these propositions. Let them show me any public purpose—any necessary expenditure—and I will cheerfully vote to give them an appropriation; but as the money we have in the Treasury has been raised by taxes from the people, we ought not to spend it, except for necessary purposes, and only to carry out the proper objects of the Government.

I live myself in the Mississippi valley. My district is an interior one, and has never received a dollar from any of these public expenditures. Still we are getting, indirectly, the benefit of national appropriations. If we limit our expenditures to necessary objects, in a short time we shall be able to reduce the public taxes; while, if we go on in the present mode, we are not likely to have the means of making the necessary additions to the public defenses, as recommended, and admitted to be necessary.

The question was then taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PRESTON. I move to increase the amount $5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not strictly in order.

Mr. PRESTON. I hope I may be allowed to go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can proceed with his remarks by the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. PRESTON. I desire to say this, that I am not here to demand this appropriation as a favor to myself or the people I represent; but I hold that the Government will save nearly as much as the interest upon the expenditure in the way of rents. Although no foreign vessels enter the port at Louisville, yet she pays twice as much revenue as Norfolk, that has eighty-nine vessels entering at that port. Norfolk paid $38,000 last year, while Louisville paid $48,307. The city of Cincinnati paid $251,000 of direct revenue, while the city of Richmond only paid $73,000; and the city of St. Louis pays $294,000. Now, sir, in view of all these facts, every western man should recollect that by a direct trade with Louisville ten per cent. upon their goods will be saved.

I have no other word to say upon this subject. If the House choose to decide that we shall all be cut down together, I shall not complain; but if they choose to sustain the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, which the Committee on Ways and Means have cut down—which I think it is very proper they should do—they will adopt the amendment which I have originally offered. I leave the whole matter in their hands.

Mr. CLINGMAN. A single word. I want to ask my friend from Kentucky, who has just taken his seat, if these very goods of which he speaks as coming to Louisville, do not have to pass the New Orleans, or some other custom-house, before they reach Louisville?

But, sir, considerable stress is laid upon the fact that more revenue is collected at Louisville than at Norfolk. This may all be, but we are compelled to have a custom-house at Norfolk because it is upon the frontier. It is a port of entry, and goods may come directly there without passing any other custom-house, which is not the fact with reference to Louisville. Vessels cannot come directly there without passing the custom-house at New Orleans, where the goods are entered; and the comparison, therefore, which is made between Louisville and Norfolk, is unreasonable.

But it is said that there are sixty thousand inhabitants in Louisville. Well, sir, if you are to build a custom-house at every town having sixty thousand inhabitants, why not build one at every town of forty thousand? Why not build one at every town of twenty thousand, or ten thousand inhabitants? Why not build one at every town or village in the country accessible by river, railroad, canal, wagon road or pack mule? I object to this system of spreading your custom-houses all over the country. If the course we are now pursuing be followed out, the custom-houses will extend themselves until the Government will be obliged to abandon the whole system; for, as I said before, it will become so expensive that we cannot go on with it.

I hope, therefore, the House will vote down this appropriation for the custom-house at Louisville, and in all other similar instances. If the money must be expended, spend it in improving your rivers, or in increasing and building up your Army and Navy; or better still, cut down your expenditures and reduce your taxes.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MILLSON. I move to amend by reducing the amendment five dollars.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is really a very hard case that gentlemen who have determined to take no part in these discussions, and who are very unwilling to do it, should be forced into such a course, as I now feel myself forced to do by inferences—mistaken, unintentionally mistaken, inferences—which have been drawn in reference to the district where I reside.

I rise, sir, simply to correct the error of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] this morning, and for no other purpose. The gentleman says the revenue collected at Louisville is twice that collected at Norfolk. According to the statement which has been placed before us, I find that the revenue collected at Norfolk is upwards of $31,000, while that at Louisville is $48,000. Now, with this data, my reckoning certainly does not agree with that of the gentleman from Kentucky, when he arrives at the conclusion that one is twice as much as the other.

But it must be recollected that Norfolk is in the immediate neighborhood of other large importing cities, and has a very extensive coasting trade, so that the amount of revenue actually collected at that port is but little compared with the amount of commerce carried on there. The coasting trade with New York, and other Atlantic cities, is very large, supplying a large surrounding country with merchandise. But I said I rose simply for the purpose of correcting an error, and I will not proceed further.

Mr. HIBBARD. I wish to say, in reply to the query suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] that not only does every vessel that trades to Cincinnati pass by New Orleans, but they are all entered there, and almost all the work to be done with them is done by the officers there.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] a question, and it is this: whether the exports from Norfolk do not render necessary a custom-house of a larger order than would be required if the exports were smaller, or if there were none at all? and whether the corps of officers employed at Norfolk, which is a port of entry, is not necessary for the prevention of the smuggling of goods from foreign countries?

Mr. MILLSON. It is undoubtedly so, as I explained yesterday. We have a very large coasting trade, and Norfolk is the exporting port for the whole maritime part of North Carolina. I received, last night, a newspaper, containing an account of the arrivals at the port of Norfolk, and I had the curiosity to count the number of vessels arriving there—all coasting vessels—last Monday, and on that one day thirty-two vessels arrived at Norfolk, and were entered at the custom-house.

Mr. DISNEY. It was not my purpose to take any further part in this debate; but, in consequence of some remarks which have fallen from gentlemen during this discussion, I feel compelled again to make some remarks in connection with the subject. Although the question now before us is merely as to the propriety of making these buildings fire-proof, gentlemen will persist in going behind that question, and inquiring into the propriety and necessity of erecting the buildings at all. Now, upon that point I am perfectly willing to meet them. The point has been discussed before Congress, and upon a full hearing; Congress after Congress has decided in the affirmative, not only as to the propriety, but as to the necessity for the establishment of buildings of this sort.

Now, one word as to that question. The commerce of the West is taxed precisely to the extent of the profits of the eastern merchants—if you deny the people of the West the establishment of these custom-houses—because, having no facilities of communication with Europe, they are compelled to transact their business with the merchants of the seaport towns. The people of the West, having a right to expect at the hands of the General Government the same facilities for their commercial transactions that are accorded to the people of the East, have asked for and obtained the establishment of custom-houses, and the effect has been vastly to increase their intercourse with the people of Europe.

It will be seen, by the returns of the custom-house at Cincinnati for the last year, that the sum of $250,000 was actually collected at that port, upon goods imported from Europe—a trade which has sprung up in consequence of the establishment of a custom-house. But for this, they would have been compelled to buy their goods from the merchants of New Orleans, or New York; and, in consequence, the goods brought to Cincinnati would have been taxed to the consumers there precisely to the amount of the profits of the merchants in New Orleans and New York. The establishment of custom-houses there, and at Louisville, enables the consumers of goods to make their purchases in those cities, at a cost less than they would otherwise have had to pay, by precisely the amount of the profits of the merchants at New Orleans or New York.

Again: if the merchant in the city of Louisville is compelled to make importations, admitting that he keeps up his relations with Europe, without the facilities of the custom-house in his own city, he would be forced to give bonds in the city of New Orleans, taking that to be the port. How is he to give those bonds? The merchant in Louisville, with ordinary commercial relations, is compelled to go to the city of New Orleans, and enter into negotiations to get parties to become his sureties on his importing bond. This necessarily requires compensation on his part, besides the want of proper facilities, and all the embarrassments surrounding a transaction of this sort. Do gentlemen understand this? As I have said before, if you will look into the returns made at the cities of Pittsburg, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and Louisville, you will find that an immense trade has grown up under the facilities which have been furnished by the establishment of custom-houses in them.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to reduce the appropriation to three dollars.

Mr. Chairman, several of the gentlemen who seem to be in favor of this appropriation have laid a great deal of stress on the fact that the Louisville custom-house is to contain a post office for the accommodation of the public; and that, inasmuch as it is to contain this post office, as well as to serve the purposes of a custom-house, a larger proportion of the public money is therefore necessary for its erection.

Now, so far as the Norfolk custom-house is concerned, it contains a post office also. In addition to that, this custom-house, with the post-office, is to be a fire-proof building, and that fire-proof building is to be constructed for the sum of $110,000; but, sir, when it comes to Louisville, and it is admitted on all hands that there is an available appropriation now of $155,000 for the erection of that house, gentlemen tell you that a fire-proof building cannot be erected for that sum. How is it that a fire-proof building can be erected for $110,000 at Norfolk, and that a fire-proof building cannot be erected for $155,000 at Louisville? I cannot understand how it is.

Again: if there is but $22,000 expended, ($6,000 in excavation and $16,000 in purchasing the site,) why is it necessary now to make any appropriation at all for this Louisville custom-house? Have they not means enough on hand to prosecute it? Have they not means enough to build such a house as there is in Norfolk; and why cannot the Department, with these means on hand, go on and make these improvements?

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] seems to think that a large amount of revenue is collected at Cincinnati, Louisville, and St. Louis; and that, therefore, they are entitled to these appropriations. Well, does the fact of this revenue being collected there justify extravagant expenditures?

Mr. DISNEY. They are not extravagant, but proper expenditures.

Mr. LETCHER. In old times custom-houses were built for $40,000 or $50,000, and they answered good purposes. A number of them, according to the list I have before me, were built for a vast deal less. Why is it that in this age of economy, and in this age of Democratic retrenchment, you must have $300,000 to build a custom-house? I cannot understand this, nor can I understand how it is that the gentlemen on the Whig side of the committee are so much enamored of the recommendations coming from the Treasury Department. I cannot understand it, so far as one is concerned, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] who is a shrewd tactician; and I venture to say that, in less than four years, we shall hear something from him in regard to these Democratic recommendations, indorsed by a Democratic House. It will come up in the next presidential contest, as one of the evidences of preaching on one side, and practicing on the other.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I have a few words to say on this subject, in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] as to that part of his remarks which related to the post office at Norfolk and the post office at Louisville. He thinks that the post office at Louisville ought not to be larger than the one at Norfolk, and that the cost of the building should not be greater. Now, sir, the post office at Louisville—as I said yesterday—is one of the largest, if not the very largest, distributing post office in the western country. If the gentleman takes the trouble to look at the Blue Book, he will see that there are no less than thirty-two clerks employed regularly in the office, besides a large number of other employees. Consequently the room necessary to accommodate these gentlemen must be much larger than that which is required at Norfolk, for the reason that there are but four clerks employed in the post office at Norfolk, and that it is not a distributing post office.

This seems to be a sufficient explanation why it is necessary to have a larger post office at Louisville than that at Norfolk: One is a large distributing post office, with fifty or sixty clerks and employees; and the other is not a distributing post office, and has but four clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER.]

The question was put, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PRESTON.] The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

"For completing the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, $40,000."

The question was then put. Pending its decision, tellers were called for and ordered; and Messrs. PRESTON, and HARRIS of Alabama, were appointed.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 65.

So the amendment of Mr. PRESTON was adopted.

Mr. PHILLIPS moved to amend the bill by inserting, after 113th line, the following:

For the completion of the custom-house at Mobile, according to the plan and estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, $65,000.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot recognize the propriety of the animadversion upon the Secretary of the Treasury, or the imputation upon the Committee on Ways and Means. There is nothing to justify the assertion that the one has exceeded his powers, or that the other has unfaithfully discharged its duties.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] himself a member of the committee, places his opposition to the estimates upon the ground that there has been a dictation to Congress upon this subject. He says that Congress should lead, and not be led. This sentiment, sir, is just in itself; but if the gentleman means by the assertion, that the Secretary is debarred from sending in his estimates, together with his recommendations, as to the best manner of completing the custom-houses for which Congress has already appropriated, I deny, in the broadest terms, the correctness of his position. Now, in the case of the Mobile custom-house, the Secretary, in his letter to the committee, says:

"The plans and specifications for the custom-house were prepared with great care and attention, so as, if possible, to keep the expenditure within the amount then appropriated, while it should be fire proof without and have a suitable stone exterior. Bids were solicited for its erection by an advertisement of 30th October, 1852, for sixty days, the lowest of which for a stone exterior exceeded the amount appropriated; and to effect its erection for that sum the exterior of the building would have to be cut down to a brick and mastic covering, and some parts not made fire-proof, as in the St. Louis custom-house. The Department considered that true economy required that a further appropriation of $65,000 to carry out the original design should be made; and consequently made the estimate therefor, feeling assured that when the facts were brought to the attention of Congress, its necessity would be seen and the appropriation made. The contracts were awarded to the lowest bidders, and are subject to be cut down to the present appropriation, if no additional one is made."

Now, the gentleman from New York must see that as it was made the duty of the Department to prepare a suitable plan, the Secretary has done nothing more than he was fully authorized to do; and that as his contract is conditional, and is made in express terms, subservient to the action of Congress, it is wholly improper to say that any attempt has been made either to lead or to dictate to Congress.

In reference to the committee, I do not doubt they have been entirely influenced by what they consider the principles of a proper economy. It is, however, to be remarked, that we see no evidence of any discrimination in their action; the recommendations of the Secretary have been obliterated by "one fell swoop." I cannot but believe that the distinguished gentleman at the head of the committee, representing the State of Alabama, was induced to report against the Mobile appropriation, rather from a feeling of delicacy than from the conclusions of his judgment; for certain it is, that no one of the reasons which he urged against the other appropriations, are applicable to this.

Here the Speaker's hammer fell, the five minutes having expired. Subsequently, the amendment was renewed for $64,900, when

Mr. PHILLIPS said: Mr. Chairman, the close vote by which my original amendment was lost induces me again to present the subject to the House. I am satisfied that my amendment was lost, not because it was opposed, but because it had no active opposition. The question fell upon one of those unfortunate calms which are often more fatal to measures than the severest legislative storms.

No one of the speakers in opposition to the various appropriations have advanced one argument or objection which reaches the case now before us.

The case is not presented for any advantage to the city of Mobile, but for the accommodation of Federal officers and agents, in the discharge of those duties which the Federal Constitution and the laws impose upon them.

Now, sir, when it is seen that Mobile is one of your first sea-ports, where large revenues are collected; where, according to the statement of the Secretary, one hundred and thirty-seven foreign vessels annually arrive and depart; the third city in the Union, as measured by its exports, it will be seen that there must, necessarily, be provided conveniences for the accommodation of the numerous body of officials connected with the proper collection and control of the customs. Besides this, Mr. Chairman, provision has to be made for the post office, and suitable arrangements for the circuit and district courts of the United States. I think the statement I have made is sufficient to disarm opposition. It is the duty of the Government to furnish a proper building, durable in its character, and freed as much as possible from the chances of fire. The whole sum required for this purpose, including the appropriation now asked for, is $265,000. Surely, no one will regard this as an extravagant expenditure, when the means are compared with the end. I make, therefore, no appeals to this House in behalf of the city of Mobile. I do not call attention to the fact that appropriations of much greater amount have been made to other places for similar purposes. I ask of this House only to discharge its duty, in the spirit of a wise economy. Let this case be judged of by its own merits, and not be grouped with other cases to which objections may be entertained. If the House will do this, I feel satisfied, in the language of the Secretary, "that the necessity of the estimate will be seen, and the appropriation made."

Mr. HAVEN. I do not propose to detain the House, and answer the suggestions which have been very properly made by the gentleman from Alabama, any further than to put myself right upon one point. In the report of the Secretary I find the following, in reference to the Mobile custom-house. The gentleman, however, says that these are conditional contracts; but if they are so, he has light upon the subject which I am unable to discover. Secretary Guthrie, at page 277 of his report, after stating that $200,000 have been heretofore appropriated since the commencement of 1850 for this custom-house, says:

"This structure is to be of granite, and a contract is made for that material, and another for the construction of the building, which is to be completed July 1, 1856; the contractor has commenced on the excavations for the foundations."

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question before he takes his seat. It is this: Do not all contracts of this character contain a conditional clause having this effect, that if the appropriation should not be sufficient, and Congress should refuse to make, or withhold further appropriation, then the contractor relinquishes all claim upon Government for damages, and the contract ceases to be further effective? I understand all contracts of this kind have such a clause.

Mr. HAVEN. I am totally unable to state. I only know that during the little time I have been here, a large portion has been consumed in making up damages for violations of contracts.

The question now recurring upon the amendment,

Mr. PHILLIPS demanded tellers, which were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and CHURCHWELL were appointed.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 63.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. BENSON. I offer the following amendment:

For completing the custom-house at Bath, Maine, $20,000.

Mr. Chairman, I regret the necessity of offering this amendment. If the Committee on Ways and Means had not seen fit to omit this just appropriation, I should have been saved from the necessity of presenting it for the consideration of this committee.

In the first place, allow me to say that the amendment comes before you with the same recommendation that has been presented in favor of all the other amendments of this nature that have been offered—the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. If gentlemen will turn to the third page of the Secretary's letter of estimates, they will find that he there recommends this appropriation in the precise language of the amendment; and if they will refer to miscellaneous document No. 5—a document apparently designed to communicate information to this same Committee on Ways and Means—they will find that he there not only recommends it, but gives reasons for the recommendation. It seems to me that there are not only these reasons, but if gentlemen will listen to me for the remainder of my five minutes, I think I can show that there are other reasons than those presented by the Secretary of the Treasury. And, in the outset, allow me to refer for a moment to the objections which have been offered to all these amendments by the Committee on Ways and Means.

The appropriation for Wilmington, Delaware, was opposed by the Committee on Ways and Means because the amount of revenue collected there was so small—something less than $1,000—during the year ending on the 30th of June last.

But if you will look at this same document, you will find that the amount of revenue collected at the port of Bath was $19,742 82. The appropriations for Louisville and Cincinnati were objected to on the ground that those cities are not ports of entry. The port of Bath is a port of entry. Another objection is, that no foreign vessels are entered at the custom-houses at Louisville and Cincinnati. If you will refer to this same document, you will find that eighty foreign vessels entered at the port of Bath last year.

But, sir, it is designed that this custom-house building shall also accommodate a post office; and if you will refer to the Blue Book, you will find that the net proceeds of the post office at Bath amount to $2,364 24, and you will find further, if you will look at the statistics which are within your control, that the district of Bath is the largest ship-building district in the United States.

Mr. FULLER. What was the tonnage last year?

Mr. BENSON. During the year ending the 31st of December, 1853—and I have Democratic authority, the Easton Times of January 12, 1854, for what I say—the number of vessels built in the district of Bath was sixty-nine, and the tonnage was 49,119 10-95, and the tonnage of vessels registered, enrolled, and licensed, in this district, on the 31st of December last, was 151,498 75-95 tons.

Mr. DEAN demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Alabama, and VAIL, were appointed.

Mr. FULLER. Is it in order to move an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, in the opinion of the Chair, in order to submit an amendment while the committee is dividing.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 71, noes 55.

Mr. WADE. I propose to amend the bill by inserting after the 113th line—

To complete the marine hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, $25,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. There are estimates for other custom-houses, and I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that it would be better to allow the custom-houses to be disposed of first. There are several marine hospitals in the same condition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman from Ohio has a right to offer the amendment under the rule.

Mr. WADE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move an amendment to the bill—

Mr. BENTON. I hope gentlemen will wait till the committee gets through the custom-houses.

Mr. WASHBURN. My amendment is: "To complete the whole works in and about the custom-house at Bangor, Maine." This amendment is in pursuance of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. Some three years ago, $50,000 was appropriated for the custom-house building at Bangor—for the building alone. Subsequently, $15,000 was appropriated for the purchase of a site. There was some question as to what might be the most eligible site. The Treasury Department decided to select, and did select the site of the old market-house foundation, which was a station at the bed of the stream which divides the city, and nearly in the center, leaving half the population on either side. This was thought by the Government altogether the most eligible site, the most central, and the most convenient, inasmuch as the building was to contain not only offices for the custom-house, but also for the post office, and rooms for the Federal court. That site was then selected. It afterwards became necessary to make an appropriation to prepare that foundation, and the Secretary of the Treasury now reports:

"Sufficient appropriations were made previous to the last session of Congress for this building; but a deficiency existed for the foundations, which had to be put down lower than was anticipated, and their walls also raised somewhat higher.

The appropriation of March 3, 1853, was made to meet this deficiency, and is in the following words: 'To complete the foundations of the custom-house in Bangor, and connect the same with the shore.' That amount was found sufficient for the foundations, but left only a small sum for the last purpose.

A full examination of the subject made it apparent that most of the connection with the shore should be by solid pieces, faced with substantial granite walls, and the surface paved with granite blocks.

The present appropriation of $20,000 is asked for that purpose; and, if made, would complete the whole works in and about said custom house."

When I asked for an appropriation during the last session I stated, as you, Mr. Chairman, may remember, and as the old members will remember, that I supposed that appropriation was all that would be required. I had no doubt of it whatever; and I never knew nor suspected that any more would be necessary until after I arrived at Washington the present session, when I found that the Treasury Department had ascertained that the sum was too small, and that they themselves had declared that this additional amount was necessary. It is absolutely necessary, if there is to be any use whatever from the custom-house. The custom-house building has already been put under contract; it is very well advanced, and may be finished some time this season. The site has been purchased, the title made perfect, and, when finished, this building will be of no sort of use whatever to the community, no sort of use to the Treasury Department, because there are no approaches to it. And this appropriation is asked for, and is made necessary, simply for the purpose of connecting that custom-house and these establishments—which are in the most central part of the city—with the bridge on either side.

Bangor is the second city in Maine as to its population, its commerce, its business. It is a port of entry. There are sometimes no less than two hundred vessels loading there for foreign and domestic ports; and when we consider the amount of trade carried on there, its ship-building, the amount of its commerce, and the additional fact that it has a population of twenty thousand inhabitants; also, that this building is intended to accommodate the custom-house, post office, and Federal court, it will be seen at once that the whole amount of the appropriation to Bangor, is not an unreasonable one.

Mr. Chairman, I think there can be no question whatever as to the course which ought to be pursued by this committee in reference to this recommendation. This appropriation having been recommended by the Treasury Department, and being absolutely necessary to the use of what has been already appropriated, I will not trouble the committee with any further remarks.

Mr. HIBBARD. This is an old acquaintance, if not an old friend of mine, and I cannot permit this occasion to pass without a remark. This is an appropriation for a county way down East—net in my own State, but near it—for a cherished friend of New Hampshire, the old State of Maine. I say in regard to this what I say in regard to others, not only that it is not necessary, in my judgment, but the whole scheme and plan is, if not the most unreasonable and unfounded of them all, one of the most unreasonable, unfounded, and uncalled for. I do not know but that it will pass, and it looks as if all these things might go, for I observed that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PRESTON] yesterday, in his remarks concerning the Louisville custom-house, called over the roll of all the other places which have custom-houses, for which appropriations are to be asked for here. I cannot, I do not believe, that that gentleman had any object in that, to promote what we sometimes call log-rolling, in order to call to the aid of his project the friends of other projects, who want benefactions for themselves, and therefore make common cause together. I do not believe that, nor do I charge it in this Hall. But out of it there has been a great deal of log-rolling among the friends of these different appropriations. They have been putting their heads together, and holding conferences, and soliciting aid, by promising to support their schemes if they will support the schemes of those soliciting their aid. Go with me, and I will go with you. That is the kind of influence I fear and apprehend.

How stands the facts as to Bangor, upon its merits? They collected there during the present year some $19,000. They have employed there six persons in all. Heretofore we have made appropriations to that point. At one time, $15,000; at another time, $15,000; and at another time, $50,000—in all, $80,000. When the gentleman from Bangor [Mr. WASHBURN] came here last session to get the last appropriation, what did he tell us? He wanted that for the very purpose for which he wants this—to connect the custom-house with the main land—as they built it out somewhere in the water, I suppose; I do not know where. The gentleman presented his appropriation, and it was urged for that purpose. It was carried, and it was to complete the work. Such, at least, were the assurances made here. Such, he states now, was his conviction; and the result shows how vain are all human calculations of this kind. Now he wants $20,000 more for Bangor, and urges that this appropriation is absolutely necessary for the use of that which has already been expended. Twenty thousand dollars more are wanted; and when this is appropriated, what assurance have we that it will finish the work? None whatever; and we are as likely to be called upon for a new appropriation the next year as for this one now. Let me state the available means they have on hand. My friend states that some $32,000 are now on hand, available.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I desire to put the gentleman right. Will the gentleman allow me a moment of explanation?

Mr. HIBBARD. I cannot give way, as my time is so limited. Thirty-two thousand dollars and upwards are now available and unapplied to complete this building. They can complete the building with this sum. They will complete it, if we stop where we are; but if we keep on with this wasteful system of appropriation, these custom-houses will never be finished, especially so long as honorable gentlemen are willing to come here and carry through these unheard-of and unusual appropriations.

Mr. PRESTON. It was not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to venture another word before the committee upon this subject; but the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HIBBARD] has made some allusions evidently in reference to me, which induces me to say something in response. The gentleman charges me with the heinous crime of "log-rolling" in this House, because yesterday I ventured to read some extracts from the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to the sums necessary for the completion and construction of the custom-houses at Louisville, St. Louis, Mobile, and other cities. I certainly can see no cause for censure in the reference I have made to the communication of the Chief of the Treasury to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in relation to a subject directly under the consideration of the House. That communication grouped the cities and the estimates together, and if there has been any "log-rolling," as the gentleman styles it, it certainly owes its origin to the Administration at the other end of the avenue, and not to me, and from a source that I suppose is far better skilled in the science.

The Secretary of the Treasury transmitted these estimates to the Committee on Ways and Means, and that committee having rejected them, I propose, by amendment, to insert them in the deficiency bill; and because I venture, in support of my amendment, to read the catalogue of custom-houses, and the sums the Government thinks necessary for their proper construction, the gentleman from New Hampshire, coming from somewhere near the north pole, turns his eyes to heaven, in patriotic horror, and asks me if it is possible that I intended, by such "log-rolling," to secure the passage of the amendments. I frankly avow it is my intention not only to vote for my amendment, but to effect, if possible, the insertion of all the appropriations for all the custom-houses embraced in the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I have great respect for the gentleman from New Hampshire, but in sincerity I must say that his affected condemnation of my supposed "log-rolling" is somewhat absurd. He reminds me of Joseph Surface, in Sheridan's comedy of the School for Scandal, who, after Sir Peter Teazle discards his frank and careless brother, and gives to Joseph all his confidence, at length detects him, after all his virtuous speeches, in an attempt upon the honor of his wife, which causes the indignant baronet to exclaim with an oath that he never would trust another man of sentiment again. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, in all candor, I would ask, if it is not preposterous for the gentleman from New Hampshire, who stands in relations of the strongest personal and political affiliation with the Chief Magistrate; who was one of the most efficient and intelligent friends he possessed; who participated in forming those combinations which elevated him to the most exalted station in our country with triumphant success, and now his trusted friend, to turn to me, a less expert brother member, with no desire for a coalition, and nothing to coalesce with, and read me, in choice terms, a homily on the wickedness of "log-rolling?" Verily, sir, I feel inclined to say with Sir Peter, "Confound me if ever I trust a man of sentiment again." [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN. I wish simply to make a statement in reply to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. HIBBARD.] The gentleman states that we have had some $30,000 appropriated for the custom-house at Bangor. Fifty thousand dollars were originally appropriated for that purpose. The contract has already been made for the building, and a large portion of the money has already been expended. Fifteen thousand dollars were appropriated for the purchase of a site, and that amount has already been paid over. Fifteen thousand dollars more were appropriated for repairing the foundations, which sum has been expended; and now twenty thousand dollars more is necessary to make a connection with the shore. The money heretofore appropriated has been, and will be expended, before the meeting of another Congress. The amount now asked for is absolutely necessary to make a connection with the shore. Will the House, after having made an expenditure not in accordance with, but against the wishes of a majority of the citizens of Bangor, hesitate now to make this additional appropriation of twenty thousand dollars, recommended as it is by the Secretary of the Treasury? I have nothing more to say.

Mr. HIBBARD said: Mr. Chairman, a word in regard to the matter of log-rolling, to which the gentleman from Kentucky has referred in a manner so felicitous and amusing. My recollections of the story of Sir Peter Teazle are not so fresh as the gentleman's, but I remember that when he was laughed at by some of his waggy friends about the attempts of Mr. Surface upon the virtue of his wife, he joined in the laugh with characteristic good nature, rubbed his hands, and said it was "very pleasant." [Laughter.] That is all I can say of the gentleman's illustration. He was very pleasant, but not very pertinent to the matter in hand. [Laughter.] Mr. Surface was baffled in his designs upon Lady Teazle, and I trust the gentleman will fail in his attempts to violate the Treasury. [Laughter.]

The gentleman says I come from near the north pole. Not quite so far up as that, Mr. Chairman, but from a most excellent neighborhood in that direction—a little State which has always stood by the Constitution, maintained economy, and resisted extravagance, asking nothing of this Government but that it will manage its legitimate affairs in a proper way. If that be a crime, I must plead guilty, and let the gentleman make the most of it. Living there, our cool judgments are not driven to the necessity of attempting to sustain our positions upon grave matters of fact and figures by illustrations drawn from comedy nor works of fancy. It was, perhaps, to be expected that the gay and gallant gentleman from Kentucky, living not near the north pole, as he says I do, but under the warm sun of the fervid South, should resort to prurient works of fiction for argument and illustration. There is no accounting for tastes, and no use in disputing about them. The spirit of the play from which the gentleman has quoted seems agreeable to him, and is doubtless congenial with his position upon the questions in issue; though professing to have a good moral, it is not exactly in accordance with some of the notions of the unsophisticated North. I know not how it may be in Kentucky. The gentleman, doubtless, does know, and with him I leave this new matter he has thought proper to introduce. He evidently feels that our present action is getting to be a comedy. Like other comedies, it seems likely to end in "a farce" at last.

I did not charge the gentleman with "log-rolling." There are those whose sensitiveness sometimes induces them to try on coats that were never made for them. The gentleman is pleased to put it on; I did not put it on him. If it fits the gentleman, why let him wear it. It seemed to me that the reading of this list of custom-houses for which estimates were made, the calling over of the roll last night and again this morning, however designed, might have the effect to remind gentlemen interested in these various appropriations that their cause was a common one. It did seem to me that it might have such an effect, and the course of affairs in the committee upon these appropriations I think also indicates something of the kind. There has been more remarkable shaking of hands, and joining together of faces. Some strange meetings of strange bedfellows.

Sir, I have uttered no sentiment here; I discard sentiment. I do not like it, unless it is accompanied with corresponding practice. I do not like to preach one thing and do another; to point one way and stand still like a guide post; nor, like another class of blind guides, to recommend one way and travel a contrary one. If I preach economy, I would practice it. I do not think it our duty to stand here, as the gentleman from Kentucky seems to do, prepared, with eyes shut and mouth open, to swallow everything handed down to us from the other end of the avenue, because it comes to us from there; to pass every item of expenditure because a Secretary recommends it; to vote everything asked for every conceivable purpose, without examination and without question, because, with or without the Secretary's personal consideration, it has found its way into his estimates.

I say, sir, this is no course for statesmen, nor for reasonable men, responsible to the country for all our acts. If adopted, it would abrogate the whole functions, not only of the Committee on Ways and Means, but of Congress, and make us mere automatons, to register the edicts of the Departments. As well, nay, better, that we never meet here at all, than enact such a farce, and call it legislation. It is the business of the Departments to recommend such appropriations as they deem necessary. It is then ours to examine, and to grant such as we think requisite, and to refuse the rest. To differ from a recommendation of a Secretary about a particular item indicates no lack of confidence in that officer. No Secretary will so regard it, and no true friend of his so proclaim it. My own opinion of the character and general policy of the high-minded and incorruptible man at the head of the Treasury Department has been too often expressed, and is too well known by those who know anything of my views, to require me to say that I have lost none of my confidence in his integrity and eminent ability, because I dissent from some of the items that happen to be found in these estimates. The gentleman yesterday seemed to think there had been Democratic favoritism, if not extravagance, because he told us that Democrats in his vicinity wanted jobs, and hence these calls for money. If this be so, and the gentleman disapproves it, why does he not join us in putting down this favoritism and jobbing?

The gentleman has traveled out of the record to intimate, if I understand him aright, that there has been some collusion, or improper management, in the recent election to the presidency of an eminent citizen of my own State, of which I am in some way cognizant. Sir, such allusions have no business here, and I shall not reply to them now. If, at a fitting time and a proper occasion, the gentleman will explain his meaning, and specify his charges, I will assure him those charges shall be promptly met. Then, as now, I fancy he will be compelled to draw for proof and for illustration upon the "School for Scandal."

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question recurred upon Mr. WASHBURN's amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN demanded tellers, which were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and CHURCHWELL were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENTON. I move the following amendment:

For the completion of the custom-house at St. Louis, Missouri, $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, I have to state to the committee that that appropriation is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is not a naked recommendation, but one with reasons given for it, which are printed, and here to be read, if desired. The reasons given by the Secretary are, that the custom-house is now in progress; that it has never yet been restricted by any appropriation made for its completion for any given sum. The appropriations heretofore made were, first, to begin the work—to purchase the ground and the material—then to continue it. That appropriation was made while I belonged to the other end of the building. Afterwards appropriations were made for continuing it. There has never been any restriction—never any limitation—never has there been any exceeding of appropriations.

Nor is it intended now to go beyond the appropriations which have been already made, unless for great reasons given by the Secretary in the recommendation which he has made. The appropriation now remaining applicable to this object, which may be $180,000, will make one of those kind of buildings which are the wonder and astonishment of Europe; not a building to last, but a building to be burned down. It is the astonishment, sir, of the civilized world, that Americans, who have money—money to squander upon every object—when it comes to a building, build houses to be burned down with all their contents, and then begin again and build another for the same purpose.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, says that true economy requires these buildings, in the first place, to be faced with stone, and not with mastic upon bricks, which has been the plan heretofore, mastic being a thing which will not stand in that climate. Some parts of it heretofore were stipulated to be fire-proof, other parts not; and it is to carry out the plan since proposed, of the building being fire-proof throughout, and of durable material, to last through centuries upon centuries, that this application is made. And, sir, why not grant it? What is St. Louis? It was a little French village when I went to the place. What now? A great city, of one hundred thousand souls, and representing a commerce with European cities and a million of people; and that commerce increasing every day.

It was but a few years ago that we obtained from the Congress of the United States the privilege of making it a port of delivery, a part of the district of which New Orleans was the port of entry. It was afterwards extended; so as to pay the duties there; and what have these payments run up to? To $300,000 paid there in the year 1852, perhaps $400,000 now, and increasing constantly. Nor is it for the office of the customs alone that we want the appropriation, but for many other offices. What is the amount of money the United States is now paying in St. Louis as rents for buildings? First, there is the custom-house itself, then the court rooms for the Federal courts, then the post office—a very large establishment—then comes the Indian department, the surveyor general's department, with the two surveyor's offices, sub-treasury, and others, altogether some dozen or fifteen offices in St. Louis for which rents have to be paid by the Government.

Several MEMBERS. "Go on!" "Go on!"

Mr. BENTON. There are no less than a dozen different kinds of buildings for which rents have to be paid now by the Government.

[Here the hammer fell again.]

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] is mistaken somewhat in relation to the legislation that has taken place on this subject. At the first session of the last Congress an appropriation was made for the purpose of erecting a fire-proof building in the city of St. Louis, for a custom-house, post office, &c., "for the completion." The second appropriation that was made was for the construction of a building for custom-house, public treasury, and other offices of the United States at St. Louis, Missouri, in addition to the appropriation made on the 13th

September, 1850, of $25,000, "provided that no part of this sum should be expended unless the sum should complete the building."

So that, Mr. Chairman, there were two appropriations for this purpose. One said that it should not be expended—not a dollar of it—unless it would complete the building; and the other was made "for the completion" of the building. Now, I resisted these appropriations at the outset, because I felt that it was my duty to do so. I believed that they were wrong; and I do believe that they are wrong. But the committee has overruled me in every instance, and I take it for granted they will still continue to do so. However, as the St. Louis custom-house and the Louisville custom-house are rather exceptions to the general rule, it was thought they should be brought specially to the attention of the committee, as was done yesterday. As to the one in relation to Louisville, the estimates and the precise bids were before the House when it passed the last appropriation. It passed it on bids before the House.

I now propose to have the Clerk read a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to the last Congress, showing that on the bids, and on the precise estimates, we appropriated $115,000 for the completion of this work. That is all I propose to do.

The Clerk then read the following communications:

WASHINGTON, February 16, 1853.

DEAR SIR: Under the propositions received by the Department, the new custom-house and post office at St. Louis will require a further appropriation of $115,000, and for the marine hospital, $20,000.

Very respectfully,
Hon. J. F. DARRY.

WM. S. HODGE.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 21, 1853.

SIR: I have the honor to report, that by the terms of the appropriation authorizing the erection of a custom-house at St. Louis, Missouri, the building is required to be fire-proof, and to afford accommodations for the custom house, independent treasury, and other offices of the United States in that city, embracing the post office, surveyor general's office, register and receiver's offices, pension agent's office, and rooms for the United States courts and other officers. That exclusive of the cost of the site, the appropriation for the construction of said building, including the necessary contingent expenses, amounts to the sum of $75,000, of which a balance of $73,978 38 remains unexpended. That a suitable plan for the building, prepared with great care, and with particular reference to its most economical construction, was adopted and proposals invited for its construction; and that the lowest bids for the work, as appears from the report of the superintendents, amount in the aggregate to the sum of $189,789 97; showing a deficiency of $115,811 59.

If the building is to be constructed according to the present plan, it is obvious that a large additional appropriation will be required before any further steps can be taken, and I would therefore recommend, in order to meet all contingencies, that Congress should be asked to appropriate the further sum of $125,000 to complete the building.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
AMMI B. YOUNG, Supervisory Architect.
Hon. THOMAS CORWIN, Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 17, 1853.

DEAR SIR: In addition to the foregoing report, I would state that Mr. Rockwell, the former Commissioner of Customs, after a visit to St. Louis last fall, reported to me that, on a full examination of the plans for your building, and the present post office accommodation, he thought it absolutely necessary to order more room to be appropriated to that purpose, and that in a few years the building would not fully accommodate all the business proposed to be put into it. He further stated that the building could not be erected for the money appropriated, and if made in conformity to those now being erected by private individuals, would cost nearly $200,000.

The amount of accommodation now required is very large, and with the increase of the city in a few years, some of the offices now located in the proposed building would have to be removed to other buildings, in order to accommodate the most important business in this. St. Louis is in one of those locations that the required accommodation will very fast increase; and I think it would be very bad policy to erect a building of this kind there, that would not afford proper accommodation at this time.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,
AMMI B. YOUNG, Supervisory Architect.
Hon. T. F. DARRY, M. C., Washington.

Mr. DEAN. I move to reduce the appropriation one dollar. I do it for the purpose of enabling the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] to continue his remarks.

Mr. BENTON. I avail myself of the opportunity, with thanks to the member who has afforded it, to say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] that this age is progressive. Everything is moving along; and what will not move of itself is carried along by the advancing mass. The gentleman looks to former acts, which related to the building according to its first plans, and were intended for that kind of building which has been superseded by the progress of ideas, and in which mastic and wood must yield to stone and iron. There has also been progress in the arts on this subject; they are firmer, and have been succeeded by another which was for the continuation of the building on the plan which we have at last got adopted. I speak of the last act, which is the one which is upon the progressive principle. The Secretary of the Treasury says that the last appropriation to this work was for continuing its construction, and he puts within a parenthesis "consequently not restrictive." So that there has been no limitation put upon the new plan—no covenant against a new appropriation—no estoppel to ask for this $100,000. It is no longer intended to put up a building to be burnt down, or to rot down. But, as I have said, it is wanted for more than a custom-house—for twelve or fifteen offices, and some of them large. Capacity and durability is wanted—a house large enough for more than a dozen offices, all to be collected within it, and for the purpose of being burnt up in it. Fire-proof is now the idea, and durability the design, and economy to result from it, as well as safety. There has been no restriction since the acts the gentleman read. Since that there has been no limitation; since that the word "completion" has not been used until incorporated in this amendment which I have presented. It is now used—completion is now the word—and if it is adopted now, and at another session anybody comes forward and asks for a further sum, then the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] can spell that word "completion," and nail him down to the $100,000, which this amendment contains.

Sir, I was saying when I sat down before, that not less than ten or fifteen offices belonging to the United States were kept in hired buildings in St. Louis, the rent of which is more than the interest on the cost of the proposed building. It would be economy to erect such a building, which by the law of its creation—by the words in the act which commenced it—is to be made to accommodate all those different offices, enumerating by name the whole of them. Thereupon will cease the enormous rent we are now paying. It will be a piece of economy in the use as well as in the perpetuity of the building to make it as this amendment proposes, and I hope the House will readily grant it, seeing that this amendment contains that word "completion," which is to be a bar to future applications.

The question was then taken on Mr. DEAN's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question then being upon Mr. BENTON's amendment,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and CHURCHWELL were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 56.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RIDDLE. I move to amend by adding the following:

For completing, in a fire-proof manner, the custom-house at Wilmington, Delaware, $12,000.

Mr. Chairman, I do not design to occupy even the five minutes allowed me under the rules of this House. I have already said what I desire to say in relation to this recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. But, sir, I find that my appropriation stands before this committee, as I stand in the House, alone; with no friends to back be, no colleagues to advocate my claim.

I have asked, at the hands of this committee, nothing which the Secretary of the Treasury has not asked for, as a matter of justice and economy to this Government. The question before us is simply whether you will complete this custom-house as it has been constructed to the first floor, in a fire-proof manner, or whether you will construct it in such a manner as will render it liable to be destroyed by fire, as was the one at Portland, Maine.

The Secretary says, in his recommendation, that it will be most economical for the Government to grant the appropriation. But it is in vain for me to repeat the arguments which are urged in the strongest language by the Secretary of the Treasury. If it be the pleasure of the House to strike down the appropriation for which I ask, let the decision be made now, and I will not trouble them again with the matter.

Mr. RIDDLE demanded tellers upon the adoption of the amendment, which were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and CHURCHWELL were appointed.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 39.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHILLIPS offered an amendment, appropriating $64,000 for completing the custom-house at Mobile, and addressed the committee in favor of the amendment. [These remarks will be found embodied with those in a preceding column.]

Mr. WHEELER demanded tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS of Alabama, and WHEELER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 37.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. WADE. I offer the following amendment to the bill:

To complete the marine hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, $25,000.

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to make any special remarks on the necessity or propriety of this appropriation. But I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has reported the amount as necessary for the completion of the marine hospital at Cleveland. I desire to state that the city of Cleveland has between forty and fifty thousand inhabitants, and that it is one of the most salubrious locations on the shores of Lake Erie; that this marine hospital has been located there, and has progressed to a point which needs about this sum to perfect it. It is now in that condition that two thirds of the wards in the hospital are unfinished; the upper portion of the building about the roof is unfinished; the rains and storms beat in under the roof, and render that portion of it, which was destined to have been completed, incapable of occupation by the inmates of this hospital. I wish to impress upon the committee the fact, that at the port of Cleveland during the last year there were 23,400 seamen entered; that that lake country is a nursery for your seamen; that, aside from the fisheries, which bring fisherman from the Atlantic States, there is no part of the United States which compares with the western lakes as a nursery for your seamen.

I would say, further, that such is the condition of the western country during the summer season, that patients for this marine hospital are sent from New Orleans, from St. Louis, and from the Mississippi and its tributaries generally, that they may avail themselves of the salubrity of the atmosphere on the lakes in the summer season. This building is, however, in that unfinished condition that many of the patients who have suitable recommendations for admission there are turned away, because there is no room for them. I cannot tell how much the Government has expended on that building, but it is a fine structure, standing in one of the most lovely locations in that beautiful city.

I want to say to the committee further, that it will be most niggardly economy to refuse this appropriation, having progressed to this point, and let the building go to ruin.

I desire to state that the tonnage of vessels entered at Cleveland last season was 495,000 tons, and that the revenue collected there, by shipment to foreign ports, was $50,000 and upwards.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the amendment under consideration is that in regard to the hospital at Cleveland. I am anxious to get the bill through the committee to-day. Here are some six or eight marine hospitals, for which appropriations have been recommended by the Department, but which the committee have not reported. If the sense of the committee is in favor of them let them manifest it in one vote.

[Many VOICES, "Vote on them separately."]

Mr. HOUSTON. I will state the reason why I voted against the completion of these marine hospitals in the manner and style proposed. In the first place, if gentlemen will look into the subject, they will find that we have long since appropriated and disposed of all the hospital money, which was designed for the comfort and convenience of sick seamen; and that whole class of people are now dependent upon the general treasury for support. We are wasting the money intended for the comfort and convenience of this class in their distresses, and we are wasting it upon the construction of marine hospitals at places which, in my judgment, are not suitable. If gentlemen will look at page twelve of the document I have in my hand, they will find stated the objects sought to be accomplished by all these appropriations. Almost all of them are intended more to beautify and adorn the buildings than to advance the comfort and convenience of the inmates.

On page thirteen of the same document, you will find the annual cost of keeping up these establishments. At some points it costs the Government ten and a half dollars a week for each sick seaman in the hospital. At the last session of Congress, when this question was thoroughly investigated in the House of Representatives, we had before us a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that it costs about double the amount, upon the average, to take care of sick seamen in this way, than when we procure quarters for them in private establishments. That is true now. At Chelsea, Massachusetts, the cheapest point, it costs four dollars and twenty cents a week; and at a point in Florida, it is over ten dollars a week for each sick seaman in the hospital. They range all along between these two amounts.

If we propose to take care of them as we ought to do, let us make such arrangements as will enable the Government to take care of them upon the fund which is raised; and if we cannot do it, let us not take these large amounts for the purpose of building houses for them.

By reference to another page of this same document, you will find that at Cleveland, Ohio, we have had nine different appropriations. It is a very difficult matter to finish the building. The appropriations for the marine hospital at that city have been as follows:

1842, August 29, for site.....	$12,000 00
1845, March 3, for construction.....	8,333 33
1848, August 3, do	10,000 00
1849, March 3, do	6,667 00
1850, September 30, do	8,000 00
do do for furniture.....	7,000 00
do do for grading and filling.....	5,000 00
	20,000 00
1851, March 3, for construction.....	12,909 05
1852, August 31, draining, heating, and watering.....	2,000 00
In all.....	$71,909 38

The appropriations here are no worse than at other places. At St. Louis over $80,000 have been appropriated for the marine hospital there, at different periods; at Chicago, Illinois, over $49,000; at Louisville, Kentucky, over $50,000; at Paducah, Kentucky, over $50,000; at Evansville, Indiana, $25,000; at San Francisco, California, $180,000. So we see by reference to these documents, that we are using that kind of economy which requires the largest expenditure of money to accomplish the end. In the manner in which this expenditure has been made, it is a great waste of money and as one of the Committee on Ways and Means, I thought it my duty to give a vote which would arrest this course of things. The rooms in this building, for which the amendment now provides, are, with very few exceptions, in a comfortable and convenient state, and everything is in readiness to take care of the sick. The physicians, nurses, and cooks are kept by the Government at a cost averaging between seven and eight dollars a week—

Mr. HIBBARD. I move to amend by reducing the appropriation one dollar.

I will consume but a minute of the time of the committee in giving an additional reason to those suggested by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] These estimates have been spoken of in the aggregate as a condition of the system; and now I wish to direct the attention of the committee to the demands for the appropriations which we are now asked to make. By referring to House document No. 5, you will find that at Key West, Florida, for which an appropriation is to be asked, that the average number of patients is only five. We have already appropriated for Key West a large sum of money, to which reference has already been made by the gentleman from Alabama. By referring to page fourteen of the same document, you will find that there are employed at the marine hospital at Mobile, Alabama, one surgeon, one superintendent, one matron, one nurse, one assistant nurse, one house cleaner, one cook, two laborers, one laundress, one assistant laundress, where there was but one patient for the last year. The average number of patients is none. Still we are to be asked for an appropriation to complete this marine hospital, where we have not a single patient. At Paducah, Kentucky, there are employed one surgeon, one superintendent, one steward, and eight employees, where there are no patients at all.

Mr. FULLER. If the gentleman will turn over the page, he will find the average number of patients at Mobile is twenty-seven.

Mr. HIBBARD. I stand corrected as to Mobile, but am right as to the rest. I thought it strange that such should be the fact there. But, sir, Paducah, Kentucky, for which the gentleman from Kentucky desires an appropriation, has no patients. At Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania—another part of this system—the number of patients, none. Key West, average number of patients, five. Now, sir, for a marine hospital at Paducah, Kentucky, where there are no patients, we have already appropriated $51,625. At Cleveland we have already appropriated $71,909, while at the hospital in that place there are an average of twenty-eight patients. At a large number of these hospitals there are no patients at all; at some of them there are a few; at others quite a number.

Now, sir, the whole fact of the matter is, that we need but few marine hospitals, and they should be selected with care, and located at eligible points, where the greatest number of patients will be likely to congregate. They should be located in different portions of the country. Some of them I would have upon the western waters, although there are not, perhaps, so many patients as upon the Atlantic coast; still they are necessary there. I would aggregate the expenditures at the most prominent points, because in that way we shall accommodate the greater number.

I cannot think that this committee will deem any further argument necessary to show the utter inexpediency of these appropriations, a large portion of which are to be applied to points where there are no patients.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLISS. I am satisfied that if this committee can only understand the facts connected with the appropriation which is provided for in the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. WADE,] there will not be a single vote in opposition to its adoption. I deny that the representations of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. HIBBARD,] however true it may be of the circumstances connected with other institutions of the same kind, can have any application to those connected with the hospital at Cleveland. Although it may be true that injudicious appropriations may have been voted by Congress to establish marine hospitals; although it may be true that there may be some of these institutions which have no patients, such a statement is utterly untrue with regard to that at Cleveland, for which this appropriation is sought.

As has already been remarked, it is so situated as to accommodate the whole frontier lying along the great chain of lakes, extending from the West to the East. It is provided with as many patients as in its present incomplete state it can accommodate, and applications, as I have reason to know, are from time to time made for the admittance of more patients than can possibly be received.

I know it is provided with a medical corps, consisting of gentlemen distinguished in science, having all the capacity in that profession that pertains to any other board of a like kind in the country. It was established as a matter of necessity; it was established in accordance with the dictates of humanity; and it has been sustained, from time to time, as has been shown by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, by appropriations, although they were light and inefficient. It is at present incomplete, and the amount already expended to promote the great objects of this institution, is liable to be lost in the niggardly economy which would withhold the small appropriation that is now asked.

I say, again, that if gentlemen of the committee could understand distinctly the circumstances surrounding this application, I cannot believe there is one here who would vote against it.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. FULLER. I move to amend the amendment, so as to increase the appropriation one dollar. What I am about to say will relate to the subject generally rather than to any particular one of these propositions. I have not seen the report of the Secretary of the Treasury this year, showing the collection and disbursement of the hospital fund. Last year, I recollect, $130,000 was collected out of the monthly wages of seamen—twenty cents a month—and the expenditure was just about that sum. Now there are thirteen thousand seamen in the State which I in part represent, and yet there is not a hospital in that State to which they can go to be taken care of in case of sickness. The nearest is at Chelsea, Massachusetts, and it is always found to be crowded. Allusion has been made to the cost of supporting each seaman in hospital. Well, it is true that if you build a hospital, and provide it with a proper staff of officers and nurses, the fewer the number of sick seamen there, the greater will be the expense of each per week; but if, unfortunately, any epidemic prevails by which the number is swollen, it then becomes cheaper. The attention of the Committee on Commerce has been particularly called to this subject, by the sickness which prevailed in the Gulf last season. I would say to the gentleman from Alabama that this is not a question of dollars and cents only. Seamen, when attacked with infectious diseases, cannot be taken into private houses.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman misapprehends me entirely. I do not wish to curtail the comforts of sick seamen at all, and my whole remarks showed it.

Mr. FULLER. Then I stand corrected. I do not wish to do any injustice to the gentleman's argument. I merely want to illustrate the necessity and importance of having houses of refuge to provide for a class of men who are peculiarly subject to epidemic when it prevails, as it did last season upon the Mississippi and its tributaries. I say that when the Government exacts from the wages of these men a tax for this very purpose, it is bound, by every principle of justice, to provide, at convenient points, comfortable hospitals for their accommodation.

Mr. HIBBARD. I did not mean to be understood that I was against all these appropriations for marine hospitals. Far from it. At the hospital at New Orleans they have one hundred and eighteen patients, on an average; at Mobile, the number is twenty-seven. It would seem of doubtful propriety to have two so near each other as those of New Orleans and Mobile.

Mr. HOUSTON. They ask none at Mobile.

Mr. HIBBARD. At Chelsea the number is eighty-seven. I would make no contest about that. At Louisville the number is forty-three. At some points on the Ohio river there should be some of these institutions; and I would not make any contest about that. As to the locality of Cleveland, my remarks may not particularly apply. I am not prepared to say that I would oppose that; but for such institutions as those at Key West, Vicksburg, and others—and I must add the marine hospital in the Old Dominion, which has only ten patients—it seems doubtful whether we should renew the appropriations.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MAXWELL. I move to reduce the appropriation two dollars; and I do it with a view of submitting a remark or two, to prevent prejudice against certain measures I have to urge upon this Congress. I know very little of the merits of the proposition immediately before the committee; but I have been struck with this remarkable fact, in the suggestions which have been submitted, that gentlemen seem to confine their arguments on this subject to the fact, that at this or that place there is a larger or a smaller number of patients. Now, I submit to gentlemen, as men who have the instincts of humanity within their breasts, whether it is not as important that one sick man should be attended as that one hundred should be attended? And if it be true that at Key West, in the State of Florida, because of the unusual good health during the past season, there has been only an average of five patients per week, whether that should be a reason why objection should be made against the hospital there, or at any point along the Florida coast? Those five sick men require treatment, require the kindly offices of the Government, just as much as five hundred or five thousand who may have been carried into hospitals at other points of this Union.

Let me say, in reference to that portion of country which has been so often referred to here, in terms injurious to their interests, that when Florida asks (and the remark is true in regard to the points on the Gulf coast)—when they ask appropriations for marine hospitals, they ask not that which is for their own benefit as much as for the benefit of citizens of other States—particularly of seamen who come to us from the northern States. They have no seamen; but they ask that those who come to their ports, engaged in the commerce of the country, shall be attended when they are sick, as is the case elsewhere; not as citizens of that section, but because they are men who are entitled to the humane consideration of a Government which has undertaken to provide for those encountering the difficulties and hardships which seamen undergo. Sir, if it be right that aid should be given by the Government at a point where there were five hundred sick men per week, it is right that there should be aid given where there are but five sick per week.

I have submitted these remarks, not knowing anything of the proposition immediately before the committee, with a view to draw the attention of its members to the fact that the argument presented on this subject was defective, in directing the mind to the greater or lesser number of men sick at particular points; and therefore not available to strike down measures coming within the reason of the policy, although they may not be called for by the numerical necessity demanding such measures at other favored points. This presents no criterion, as will be seen when it is remembered that some seasons are more afflicted with disease and epidemics than others. Thus much for the present; and I will have occasion to say more when the bills for hospitals at St. Mark's and Appalachicola come up for consideration. I should have said nothing but for remarks made which may tend to prejudice those applications.

Mr. FULLER, (interrupting.) I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida a question. If the season be healthy, the patients may be few; but if there be an epidemic, would they not be very numerous?

Mr. MAXWELL. Yes, sir; and that is a remark which must be made with respect to the southern coast. When there is no epidemic, there may be few patients; but when there is one, then the hospitals are crowded. Key West was fortunately exempt from the epidemic in the past season. It is one of those things which we can thank God for during this season; but at another season we might not have the fortune to be able to do it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say anything more on the subject of these marine hospitals. I have no doubt about their passing; but I think the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. MAXWELL]—and I hope he did it unintentionally—has placed me in his reference to what I said, in a false position.

I did not make my opposition to these appropriations because I desired to curtail the comforts and convenience of the sick seamen. I did not desire to have these appropriations resisted because I was inattentive to that class of our fellow-citizens, but because I believed that this was a waste of money, and did them no good. I do not mean to say that it is a waste of money to build houses for them; on the contrary, I think it is proper and right this should be done. But I would like to ask gentlemen in this House who understand, and who have reflected on this subject—that is, on the building of houses for purposes of this sort—I would like to ask them whether it is necessary to appropriate $100,000 or $80,000 to an hospital in Cleveland, or in any other of the points spoken of in this report? My friend [Mr. ASHE] says he would take $16,000 for them; and that is about the point; and the opposition I make is not to the building of houses; it is not that they ought to be dispensed with—any of them—but it is that we ought to use proper economy in their building; and unless we do that, it would be as well to give it up entirely.

Now, sir, it will not do for gentlemen to say that there are a great many patients in the hospital at one season, and very few at another, when they are reduced to the average of five. Why, if gentlemen look at this table, they will find it is the average for the year. The whole year is taken—the time when there are many patients, and the time when there are few. This gives the average number of patients for the year; and the object of this table was not to show that there were only five patients at Key West, or that there were many or few in any other point; it was to show that the manner in which they are appropriating and expending money on these public buildings is unprecedented and unnecessary; that it is a waste of money which does not redound either to the comfort or convenience of the sick seamen. It shows, at least, that at all points where the Government can use the instrumentality of private establishments, it is necessary that it should do so; and this leads to economy, as well as to the convenience and comfort of the seamen. It is for economy that we should use private establishments when that can be done.

I am not making opposition to any of these, as existing establishments; I am not making opposition which would resist appropriations necessary to finish them, in order to promote the comfort of the seamen. Not at all. They are now in a condition to afford that convenience and comfort which the seamen are entitled to have; which I am at all times, and have ever been, willing to give them.

The gentleman [Mr. MAXWELL] says, however, that if there is one sick seaman he ought to be cared for as well as if there were a hundred. That is all true, sir. One sick man requires to be attended to just as well as that man would if he were one of a class of a thousand. But then I reckon gentlemen will hardly argue that a hundred thousand dollars ought to be appropriated to build a house for that one.

I am not going to curtail one sick seaman's comfort. I am not proposing that we should not take care of him, as well as a thousand. But I do not want to appropriate a hundred thousand dollars for his use, because we can take that money, and with the interest of it, care for him, nurse him, and administer to his wants, ten times as well under the present system.

I do not propose to say anything further, but I do hope that some gentleman will propose in one amendment, for all these marine hospitals, and let them pass all at once, if they must pass. I have no idea that we shall defeat them, and therefore I desire that those of them which are contained in the estimates of the Secretary may be embraced in one amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I accept the suggestion which has been made by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in regard to the manner in which these proposed amendments shall be voted upon. I think the committee can vote upon the whole of them together as well as upon the separate items.

I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment, to cover a recommendation of the Secretary, in regard to an appropriation for the completion of a marine hospital at Chicago. I do it for the reason that the gentleman who represents that district is absent.

The amendment was read, as follows:

For the construction of stone steps and railing to the hospital at Chicago, Illinois, and for grading the grounds, and inclosing the site of said hospital with a suitable iron fence, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary, $8,000.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I propose to offer an amendment to that.

Mr. WASHBURN. I accept of the gentleman's amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

For completing the marine hospital at Vicksburg, $59,000.

Mr. LATHAM offered the following amendment:

For inclosing and draining the site, and for necessary out-buildings of the marine hospital at San Francisco, California, $44,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments offered will be read altogether.

Mr. SKELTON. I rise to a point of order. I would inquire of the Chair if it is not competent for any member of this committee to demand a separate vote upon each amendment? They embrace very different kinds of propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask for a separate vote?

Mr. SKELTON. I do.

Mr. HIBBARD. I rise to a question of order, and it is this: that the amendment relating to Vicksburg is not in order, because it is a new appropriation.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HIBBARD. Is it in order for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WADE], which relates to Cleveland?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is in order.

Mr. LATHAM. I withdraw the amendment I offered.

Mr. WASHBURN. I also withdraw the amendment I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The only question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.]

The question was then taken upon Mr. WADE's amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now offer the amendment which has already been submitted.

The amendment was read, as follows:

For the construction of stone steps and railing for the hospital at Chicago, Illinois, and for grading the ground and inclosing the site of said hospital with a suitable iron fence, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, $8,000.

Mr. WASHBURN. I desire to make no extended remarks upon the amendment which I have offered. It simply follows the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. The importance of that hospital to a city of sixty thousand inhabitants must be well known to every member of this House; and the report states that it has, on the average, twenty-one patients all the time.

The question was then taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LATHAM. I offer the following amendment; and it asks for an appropriation which is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury:

For inclosing and grading the sites for the necessary out-buildings for the marine hospital at San Francisco, $44,000.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. PRESTON. I move the following amendment, in conformity with the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury:

For the construction of hot-air furnaces, fencing, and paving the marine hospital at Louisville, Kentucky, $15,000.

The question was then put on the amendment; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 36, noes not counted.

Mr. PRESTON. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WHEELER and HARRIS were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 48.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FULLER. I have an amendment which I desire to offer; and I do it because my colleague from the Cumberland district [Mr. MACDONALD] is not now present. I offer the following:

For the completion of the marine hospital at Portland, Maine, $80,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a question of order. This is a deficiency bill. The appropriation for which the gentleman's amendment provides is not recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury as a deficiency. I submit, therefore, that the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the hospital for which the appropriation is asked to be an original work, or a building already commenced?

Mr. FULLER. The building has already been commenced, and the amount provided in the amendment is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury as a deficiency.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not at all.

Mr. FULLER. I beg to refer the gentleman to miscellaneous document No. 5, if he doubts the fact of its being so recommended.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have examined the document alluded to by the gentleman, and I do not so find it.

Mr. FULLER. The recommendation is precisely the same in effect as other recommendations of the Treasury Department for deficiencies.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Maine is mistaken. That document purports to give a history of all the marine hospitals that are being built, but it does not recommend this as a deficiency; and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] withdrew a similar amendment, for the very reason that it was not a deficiency.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The gentleman is in error. I only withdrew it temporarily. I intend to offer it again as soon as I get an opportunity.

Mr. HOUSTON. Here are the estimates, and it is not among them. It is not a deficiency, and I object to it.

Mr. FULLER. In reply to the gentleman—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to understand whether the building is already commenced?

Mr. FULLER. It is already commenced, and $30,000 have been appropriated for it.

The CHAIRMAN. If that be the fact, the amendment is in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to document No. 3, page 2971, from which it appears that Congress appropriated $30,000 for this building at Portland, Maine, on August 31, 1852. A site for the building was purchased on the 11th of November, 1852, for $11,000; but the selection not being considered a judicious one, a second commission was appointed to select another site; and their recommendation has not yet been acted upon.

Mr. HOUSTON. This is not a deficiency, and it is not asked for by the Department as a deficiency.

Mr. FULLER. If I understand the position of this case, it stands precisely on the same footing as the Louisville custom-house, where the Government refrained from making the expenditure because the sum appropriated was not sufficient.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the record which decides this matter at once. An appropriation for the Louisville custom-house is asked for in the estimates for deficiencies for marine hospitals, and the one at Portland is not included. The Secretary of the Treasury does not want this sum as a deficiency. He has as much money as he can spend there this year. It is recommended in the estimates for the general, civil, and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The 81st rule is as follows:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law."

The question, whether the appropriation has been recommended by the Secretary or not, of course has no bearing upon the question of order. As the Chair understands the facts of this case, appropriations have already been made for this object, and it is therefore "authorized by law," within the meaning of the rule just read.

Mr. HOUSTON. The point I make is this: not that there has been no appropriation made, but that the work has not been commenced, and that this is no deficiency. This being a deficiency bill, the rule which has been read by the Chair does not apply to the case.

Mr. FULLER. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am stating my point of order; it is this—

Mr. FULLER. I call the gentleman to order. I ask whether a question of order is debatable?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am restating my point of order, because the Chair misapprehended me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be happy to hear the gentleman from Alabama. What is the rule to which the gentleman refers different from the rule read by the Chair?

Mr. HOUSTON. It is this: that it is not competent for the committee to put into a deficiency bill an original appropriation which is not asked for by the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware of any such rule. Will the gentleman from Alabama turn to it and read it?

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no such rule; but the practice of the House has been universally what I have indicated. There has been no case to the contrary. Here are the estimates for the deficiency bill, and here are the estimates for the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. This appropriation for Portland is not in the former, but is in the latter estimates. If the Chair rules that this is in order, then it will be equally in order to put in every single item now in the civil and diplomatic bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama is, that this appropriation is not within the 83d rule—an appropriation "authorized by law." That is the only rule which the Chair finds at all applicable to the subject; and under that rule the Chair thinks that this appropriation is in order, and is "authorized by law."

Mr. HOUSTON. I make the point of order that it is not a deficiency, and cannot go into a deficiency bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a point of order, and state it in this way: that there can be no deficiency—

Mr. FULLER. I call the gentleman from Virginia to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is on the floor to a question of order, and he has a right to state it.

Mr. FULLER. Well, I hope these interruptions will not be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is upon the floor on a point of order, and the Chair will hear what he has to say.

Mr. LETCHER. I say that where no site has been selected, as in this case of Portland, Maine, there can be no deficiency; and therefore it is not in order to make an appropriation in the deficiency bill to meet the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the same way that he did before. It has been established that it is competent for any member of the committee to offer an appropriation relating to any work which has been in progress, whether recommended by the Secretary or not. The Chair rules the amendment in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I appeal from that decision of the Chair.

The question was then put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?" and there was, on a division—ayes 71, noes 33; no quorum.

Mr. COBB. I demand tellers.

Mr. HENN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 49, being a bill to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th June 1854, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Before we adjourn, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up a bill from the Senate, which was passed by the House with some amendments to it. It has been somewhat modified. It is a bill relating to the pay and contingent fund of that body. I propose to take it up and make some disposition of it.

Mr. RIDDLE and several other Members. I object.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I suppose it is in order to move that the House do now proceed to the business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour not having expired, it is not in order.

Mr. DEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce. It is in relation to the security of emigrant passengers, and to alterations of the law in that respect.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection made, it can be presented. The Chair hears no objection to the introduction of the resolution.

It was accordingly presented, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and agreed to.

The House accordingly adjourned at twenty minutes past three o'clock, p. m.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 3, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PRIVATE BILL DAY.

This being the day set apart, by resolution of the Senate, for the consideration of private bills, to which no objection should be made, the following were disposed of:

JOHN G. MACKALL.

The PRESIDENT. The first bill on the Calendar for the consideration of the Senate, is the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of John G. Mackall, deceased.

Mr. BAYARD. That belongs to a class of cases which I think it my duty to oppose.

The PRESIDENT. Being objected to, it goes over.

WILLIAM G. RIDGELY.

The PRESIDENT. The next bill is for the relief of William G. Ridgely.

Mr. BAYARD. That belongs to the same class of cases. I feel bound to oppose it.

The PRESIDENT. It will go over.

ALBERT HART.

The bill increasing the pension of Albert Hart was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to increase his pension to $16 a month, from January 1, 1854, to continue during life.

Albert Hart was a soldier in the Baltimore battalion in the Mexican war. At the storming of Monterey he had charge of the colors of his company, and lost his right arm, but continued to support the flag on his left arm until relieved from duty. His name was placed on the pension rolls at eight dollars a month, which he finds wholly insufficient to support himself and family.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

LAVINIA TAYLOR.

The bill for the relief of Lavinia Taylor was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay her a sum equal to five years' pay of her husband, the late Isaac Taylor, a private in the Army.

Isaac Taylor was a soldier in the regular Army, and was killed in the massacre of Major Dade's command in Florida, on the 28th December, 1835. On learning the death of her husband, the memorialist applied for a pension to the Commissioner of Pensions, and was informed that there was no law providing a pension for the widows of regular soldiers who were killed by the enemy. By indorsements on her memorial it appears that it was first presented to the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions, on the 19th of February, 1847. On the 21st of December, 1847, it was again referred to the committee, and under the same date it appears that the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the subject. A letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, dated December 30, 1847, to the Hon. H. Johnson, then chairman of the Committee on Pensions, says:

"She asks for a special act in her favor, as there is no general law which gives a pension to the widow of a regular soldier of the present military. If the bill which was lately drawn up and sent to you should become a law, no special legislation will be necessary in a case like this."

And in a letter to the present chairman of the committee, dated March 22, 1850, the Commissioner says:

"The bill referred to in my letter of the 30th December, 1847, did not become a law, and consequently this and similar cases remain unprovided for. I respectfully submit that it would be no more than just to allow the petitioner a five years' pension."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

ALLEN G. JOHNSON.

The bill for the relief Allen G. Johnson, of the State of Florida, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid to him the value of certain subsistence stores, turned over by him, as captain of a company of mounted Florida militia, at the time of his being mustered out of service, on the 6th day of January, 1840, at Camp Bailey, Jefferson county, Florida, to J. B. Collins, a quartermaster in the service of the United States, but not credited to him by Collins in his returns to the Treasury Department, the amount so paid not to exceed the sum of $137 23.

Allen G. Johnson was an officer in command of a company of mounted Florida militia, stationed at Camp Bailey, Jefferson county, Middle Florida, where he and his company were mustered out of the service of the United States on the 6th of January, 1840. At the time of the discharge, he handed over to J. B. Harbour, as the representative of J. B. Collins, quartermaster, certain subsistence stores, for which he took the receipt of Harbour on behalf of Collins, for whom he was authorized to act. On applying to the Third Auditor of the Treasury for a final settlement of his accounts, he was not allowed credit for the stores handed over, on the ground that Quartermaster Collins had not credited the claimant therewith in his returns, the Third Auditor remarking, at the same time, that it was strange that Harbour, himself a quartermaster, should have given a receipt in the name of Collins, when he might have receipted for the stores on his own authority.

The only point in the case which, in the opinion of the committee, is worthy of particular consideration, is the question whether the petitioner, Johnson, turned over the stores of which he had charge, as captain, to a person duly authorized to receive and give a receipt for them. This he appears to have done; and, so far as he is concerned, any subsequent omission of duty on the part of Collins, who received them through his agent, Harbour, is a matter of trifling moment. Whether Harbour received the stores as the representative of Collins, or in his own capacity of quartermaster, he and Collins are the parties responsible to the Government, and indemnity should be demanded from them or their securities for any laches in the performance of their duty. The Committee on Military Affairs see no propriety in holding officers of the line, as they are termed, accountable for the non-performance of their duty on the part of those over whom they have no control, and the especial business of whom it is to take charge of, and account for the property of the Government committed to their keeping, under the penalty of their bonds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

ADAM D. STEUART.

The bill for the relief of Adam D. Steuart was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid to Mr. Steuart, a paymaster of the United States Army, $150, the amount paid by him as a fee to Ashley and Ringo for prosecuting a suit at law for the recovery of $2,000 in specie, stolen from on board the steamboat Tom Boling, while the specie was in his charge, and being transported for account of the United States to Little Rock, in the State of Arkansas, in June, 1834.

Paymaster A. D. Steuart shipped on board the steamboat Tom Bolin, in June, 1834, two boxes of specie, containing $1,000 each, and which belonged to the United States, for Little Rock, for the purpose of paying the troops of the United States in Arkansas. The boxes were delivered by Paymaster Steuart to the clerk of the boat, to whom the contents of the boxes were made known; on the passage the money, while in the custody of the officers of the boat, was stolen; on the arrival of the boat at Little Rock the money was missing, and the clerk of the boat was charged with the theft, and finally confessed that when the boat last stopped to take in wood before reaching Little Rock he threw the boxes containing the money out of the cabin window into the river, marking the place by certain trees, to know where to look for them. Colonel Steuart, with some friends, took the clerk to the place, and, after much search, part of the money was found. The captain of the boat refused to pay the balance; but having sold the boat, of which he was part owner, Colonel Steuart, by advice of counsel, libeled her, which prevented the transfer of the property; and to remove this incumbrance, the captain returned the whole amount stolen by the clerk. This proceeding made it necessary for Colonel Steuart to employ counsel, which he did. The fees of the attorneys amounted to $150, which Colonel Steuart paid, and presented a voucher therefor to the War Department for allowance; but it was regarded by the accounting officers as a disbursement not authorized by any existing law, and disallowed. It is for this $150 so paid that Colonel Steuart now applies to Congress to have refunded to him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

WILLIAM SENNA FACTOR.

The bill for the relief of William Senna Factor, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct $3,707 to be paid to him, as indemnity in full for property of Rose Factor, destroyed by order of the American officers of the United States Army, in the Seminole war of 1836, and for property taken by such officers for public use in the war; with the provision, however, that the Secretary of the Interior shall first be satisfied that Billy Senna Factor is the legal representative of Rose Factor, deceased.

Billy Senna Factor, Rose, his mother, and Nancy, his wife, were free persons of color, residing near Mount Vernon, Florida, in a portion of the country exposed to the incursions of the hostile Seminoles. They owned considerable property; all of which was destroyed by the orders of the United States troops, to prevent it falling into the hands of the Seminoles, or by the hostiles, on account of the well-known fidelity of the family to the fortunes and interests of the United States.

Rose and Billy were often employed as interpreters, and were taken by the United States officers in command to Tampa Bay. They were compelled to abandon most of their property to destruction, and to get the protection of the United States forces; and, finally, in 1840, they were emigrated to the country west of Arkansas, as Seminole negroes. Rose died, leaving Billy her son and heir. They were incompetent to prefer their claim for indemnity, on the ground that they were supposed to be slaves. The committee were satisfied, however, that the board convened by Colonel North, to value certain negroes to be emigrated to Arkansas were mistaken in supposing them to be slaves.

The letters of General Taylor, General Jesup, and other proofs put it beyond doubt that they were undoubtedly free in point of fact, with no persons claiming to be their owners. Billy now resides in Van Buren, Arkansas, and no such claim has ever been made there. The suspicion that they might originally have been fugitives from the States probably arose from the fact of their speaking the English language. Their claims consist of three items, covering the losses respectively of Rose, Billy, and Nancy Factor, of the several sums of $3,307, $1,750, and $1,025. The evidence shows that Rose lost all her property, by its destruction under the orders of the United States officers. The property of Billy and Nancy was abandoned, and they fled for protection to the American camp; and in all probability it was destroyed by the Seminoles, as it was never recovered.

This does not embrace two mules and two horses pressed by the United States officers for public use, and valued at four hundred dollars, to which he is entitled. The committee reject all that part of the claim which is for property destroyed by the Seminoles in a state of war, as no such losses ever constitute a legitimate claim on the Government. The correct value of the property of Rose and Billy, taken for public use, and destroyed to prevent its capture or occupation by the enemy, amounts to $3,707, for which the bill is reported.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

BENJAMIN S. ROBERTS.

The PRESIDENT. The next bill on the Calendar is the bill explanatory of the act for the relief of Benjamin S. Roberts, upon which the Committee on the Judiciary have made an adverse report.

Mr. FOOT. The occasion of the adverse report grew out of the fact that a like bill had been passed by the House of Representatives, and concurred in by the Senate. Having been disposed of in that way, the Committee on the Judiciary reported adversely upon this bill.

The PRESIDENT. The question will be on concurring in the report of the committee.

The question was taken, and agreed to.

RICHARD FITZPATRICK.

The bill for the relief of Richard Fitzpatrick, reported from the Committee of Claims, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to require the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle and adjust his claim for the use and occupation of his land on the Miami and New rivers, in Florida, during the Seminole hostilities, as a military post, by order of officers of the United States, and for wood cut on the lands for the use of the military or naval forces, and for any other property taken and used, by order of officers in command at those places, for public purposes or defense; and to direct that the amount so found due, upon sufficient and competent evidence, be paid to him, with the proviso, however, that nothing contained in the bill shall be construed to authorize payment for property destroyed by the Indians.

Colonel Fitzpatrick submits "an estimate of losses and damages sustained by him at his plantation on Miami river, near Cape Florida, by the Seminole Indians;" and an account for the occupation of his premises by United States troops, and for wood and other property taken by the troops, amounting in all to $60,320, for which he asks payment.

Colonel Harney, United States Army, certifies that he was in command of the troops in the south of Florida for a considerable time during the Seminole war, and had his headquarters at Fort Dallas, which is located upon the property of Richard Fitzpatrick, who is a citizen of Florida, and that whatever was found useful on the lands of Mr. Fitzpatrick was freely used for the benefit of the United States, and that there was a considerable quantity of wood cut off the land of Fitzpatrick, and used on board of the steamboats in the service of the United States, it being more convenient to take wood at that place than any other on that part of the coast of Florida.

General Jesup, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of War, dated January 13, 1841, says that Fort Lauderdale, on New river, and Fort Dallas, on Miami river, were established by his orders some time in February or March, 1838, and that both forts are said to be on the lands of Colonel Fitzpatrick.

He says, that timber for building and for fuel, for the use of the troops, and for the steamboats in the public service, has been cut at both forts; and that Colonel Fitzpatrick is justly entitled to a reasonable rent for his land, and compensation for the timber cut for the use of the public.

General Jesup adds, that the buildings and other property charged in the account were destroyed by the Indians before the lands were occupied by the troops; and it appears, from the affidavit of the petitioner, that his plantation was abandoned to the Indians in January, 1836, two years before the occupation by the United States troops; and that they took his stock, and destroyed his fruit trees and other improvements. The committee concur in opinion with General Jesup that the claimant is entitled to compensation for the use of his land, and for the fuel, timber, and other property, taken and used by the United States troops; but they are not prepared to sanction the principle that the Government is to be held responsible to remunerate its citizens for losses sustained by the ravages and depredations of the savage tribes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by SIDNEY WEBSTER, his Private Secretary, announcing, that on the 2d instant he had approved and signed "An act to provide a place for the holding of the courts of the United States in the southern district of New York, and for other purposes."

DON B. JUAN DOMERCQ.

The bill reported from the Committee of Claims, for the relief of Don B. Juan Domercq, a Spanish subject, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to examine and investigate the claim of Don B. Juan Domercq, a Spanish subject, for a quantity of tobacco belonging to him, and taken and used for purposes of defense, by order of Colonel Childs, at the siege of Puebla, in Mexico, in 1847; and to allow and pay him for so much of the tobacco, not exceeding seven hundred and twenty-one bales, and at a price not exceeding twenty-four dollars the bale, as shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the Secretary, to have been destroyed or lost in consequence of the tobacco having been taken and used as aforesaid. It also proposes to direct the Secretary of War to allow and pay Domercq damages for the injury done to eight hundred and twenty-three bales of tobacco returned to him after being used in barricading the streets, &c., of Puebla, provided the amount allowed shall not exceed one dollar per bale.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

JAMES W. LOW AND OTHERS.

The bill for the compensation of James W. Low and others, for the capture of the British private armed schooner Ann, during the late war with Great Britain, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to James W. Low, William Driskill, ——— Southerland, and ——— Stenchen, or to such persons as may be legally authorized to receive the same, as heirs or legal representatives, the sum of $2,570 30, that being the amount paid into the Treasury of the United States, and placed to the accounts of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, in consequence of a suit, entitled "The United States vs. the schooner Ann and cargo," in the district court of Maine, December, 1814, the schooner having been risen upon and captured, by the above named persons, from the British, and delivered to the proper authorities of the United States in the State of Maine. The money is to be paid to James W. Low and his associates aforesaid, their heirs or assigns, in the following proportions: to James W. Low, for having planned the enterprise and directed the capture of the vessel, as first officer of the prize, eight parts; to William Driskill, as second or assistant officer, four parts; and to Southerland and Stenchen, as seamen or sailors, two parts each.

James W. Low, in October, 1814, being then on board the British vessel Ann, with the aid of two others on board, captured the vessel and cargo, and brought it as a prize into a port in the State of Maine. The vessel and cargo were sold under a libel by order of the district court, and the sum of $5,818 received. Of this sum, after deducting the expenses of the suit, there remained a balance of $5,140 61; of which $1,927 63 was paid to the collector, and $642 57 to the surveyor of the port of Thomastown—being one half; and the balance, $2,570 30, was paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The amount paid to the collector and surveyor purported to be under the authority of the non-importation law. None of the parties who captured the vessel have been able to give their personal attention to the vindication of their rights, and have never received their share of the proceeds. By the act of Congress of June 26, 1812, letters of marque, prizes, and prize goods in case of the capture of an enemy's vessel by a privateer, the captor was entitled to the entire amount received.

In this case there was not, and of course could not be, any commission of marque issued; but as the captors were American citizens who had been previously captured by the British, and entered this vessel with a view of capturing her, and in advance declared their intention to be such, they were most clearly entitled under the provisions of that act to the whole proceeds; inasmuch, however, as half the amount was paid to the collector and surveyor of the port, and the other half into the Treasury, the committee only recommend the payment to the parties of the amount in the Treasury.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

PURSER T. P. M'BLAIR.

The bill for the relief of Purser T. P. McBlair was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the accounting officers of the Treasury in adjusting his accounts to allow him the sums paid by him as purser of the United States steamer Princeton, to William Taylor; acting boatswain, to John Coale, acting carpenter, and to Armstrong Flomerfelt, acting sailmaker, who were employed on the steamer by its commanding officer, by authority from the Secretary of the Navy, and which sums were disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, for the reason that the persons to whom the payments were made were not included in the number permitted by law, of officers of the grades to which they were respectively appointed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

JOHN G. CAMP.

The bill for the relief of John G. Camp was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle his suspended accounts for mileage, as late marshal for the middle district of Florida, in the same manner that similar accounts are now settled, with the proviso, however, that the amount therein charged does not exceed what is now allowed by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

SAMUEL H. HEMPSTEAD.

The bill for the relief of Samuel H. Hempstead was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to pay him $1,800 for extra services rendered by him in defending the title of the United States to certain lands in Arkansas.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

THOMAS CHAPMAN.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Thomas Chapman, formerly collector of the port of Georgetown, South Carolina, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct $13,457 55 to be paid to the parties, being the share (to which Thomas Chapman was entitled, as collector) of the cargo of the Swedish ship Diana, condemned for a breach of the non-intercourse act, which was decreed to be forfeited by him, in consequence of his having been examined as a witness in behalf of the claimants.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

ISAAC VARN, SEN.

The bill for the relief of Isaac Varn, sen., of Duval county, Florida, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to require the Secretary of War to examine and adjust his claim for the use and occupation of his property, for wood and timber cut from his land, and for other property belonging to him, and taken and used by the United States troops, between the 1st of April, 1836, and the 1st of July, 1841, and to direct the amount so found due, upon competent and sufficient evidence, not exceeding $5,000, to be paid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

RICHARD KING.

The bill for the relief of Richard King was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to confirm him in his title to two hundred and forty arpens of land on the eastern bank of the Ouachita river, in the parish of Caldwell, Louisiana, which was conveyed by the claimant of the Maison Rouge grant to Bagwell Bailly, in 1818, for cutting a road through the grant, and has remained in the possession of, and in cultivation by, Baily and his successors to the present time, and is now a part of the plantation of King, on which he has resided for many years; with the proviso, however, that it shall amount only to a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

WILLIAM BLAKE.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of William Blake. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to cause the pension allowed to William Blake, on the 14th of March, 1845, to be increased to $13 per month, and that the increase of pension shall commence from that date.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I should like to hear the report read, in order to show on what grounds this increase of pension is sustained.

The report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives was accordingly read.

It appears that William Blake served as sergeant in the company commanded by Captain V. R. Goodrich, in the eleventh regiment of infantry, during almost the entire period of the war of 1812. He received a wound from a ball in his right ankle at the battle of Chippewa. He was with his company in the battle of Lundy's Lane, where all his superior officers in the company were either killed or wounded, and in the midst of the fight he took the command, and behaved most gallantly.

He was afterwards wounded near Fort Erie, being still in command, by the bursting of a shell thrown by the enemy. By these wounds he was disabled for some time; but after being wounded, discharged the duties of commander of the company, frequently going upon crutches to do so.

He was placed on the invalid pension roll in March, 1845, at the rate of $8 a month. It seems that in 1814 an ensign was the lowest commissioned officer of a company; and under the act of 1816, if he, in the absence of his superiors, commanded a company, and was wounded while commanding, he would receive a pension of $13 per month. The committee think William Blake is certainly entitled to as much as an ensign would have received under like circumstances.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am satisfied.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

BISHOP AND ARNOLD.

The bill for the relief of George G. Bishop and the legal representatives of John Arnold, deceased, was read a second time.

It proposes to enact that the letters patent granted to John Arnold, (a citizen of the United States,) on July 15, 1829, for a new and useful improvement in a machine for forming a web of cloth, of wool, hair, or other suitable substances, without spinning or weaving; and also the letters patent granted to Arnold, and George G. Bishop, (also a citizen of the United States,) on October 20, 1836, for a new and useful improvement in the same machine, shall be renewed, revived, and extended for the term of fourteen years from and after the passage of the act, with a proviso that all persons now enjoying the lawful use of the said invented machine, or any part thereof, so patented, and the purchaser of any such machine, or any part thereof, may continue to use the same notwithstanding the provisions of this act.

Mr. BADGER. I ask that that bill may lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BRIGHT.) It will go over.

SOLAR COMPASS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar is one to enable the United States to make use of the solar compass in the public surveys.

Mr. BAYARD. Is that a private bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in the list.

Mr. BAYARD. I object to its consideration as not being a private bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then it will go over, under the rule.

DAVID MYERLE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar is one for the relief of David Myerle.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. That bill may be passed over to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go over.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The hour of one o'clock has now arrived. That was the time which was fixed for the special order of the day; and therefore, for the purpose of going on with the debate which was suspended the other day, I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders of business, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the Nebraska bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHASE. Mr. President, I propose to offer an amendment to the substitute reported by the Senator from Illinois, from the Committee on Territories. It is to strike out from section 14 these words:

—"was superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, and"

So that the clause will read:

"That the Constitution, and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Nebraska as elsewhere within the United States, except the eighth section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March 6, 1820."

Mr. CHASE proceeded to address the Senate. He elaborately discussed the subject in a speech which occupied two hours and a half in the delivery. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President—

Mr. BADGER. I will ask the Senator to give way for a moment. I wish to make a motion that ought to have been made earlier in the day, that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MASON. I hope not. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bell, Cass, Chase, Clayton, Everett, Fish, Foot, Hamlin, Jones of Tennessee, Norris, Seward, Shields, Smith, Stuart, Sumner, Wade, and Walker—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Benjamin, Bright, Brodhead, Butler, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Hunter, Jones of Iowa, Mason, Pettit, Pratt, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toucey, Weller, Williams, and Wright—25.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to address the Senate at this time, although I desire to give my views upon the question as it has been presented in the bill, and also to reply to some of the positions assumed by the Senator from Ohio. The Senate is already jaded, and I do not desire to proceed to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 3, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, with certain correspondence between this Government and the Austrian Chargé d'Affaires; furnished in compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th ultimo.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, it was ordered that such report, and the accompanying documents, be laid upon the table and printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the changes which have been made within the last year in the manner of keeping the revenue, and as to how far Assistant Treasurers have been made available for the deposit of moneys, and as disbursing officers for the General Government; furnished in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 22d December last.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, it was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated 30th ultimo, asking for an additional appropriation of $15,000 for the general and incidental expenses of the Indian service in the Territory of New Mexico, during the current fiscal year; and recommending the making of such appropriation.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, the communication and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a report from the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, exhibiting, in a tabular form, the pay and allowances of the several officers of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1853; furnished in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 7th December last.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and be printed.

It was so ordered.

EMIGRANT PASSENGER LAW.

Mr. DEAN. Mr. Speaker, just before the adjournment of the House yesterday, I moved to refer the joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York, on the subject of the safety of emigrant passengers and the regulation of emigrant ships, to the Committee on Commerce.

Since the House adjourned I have been informed, by members of the Senate, that on the 7th of December last a special committee was raised in the Senate on this subject. That special committee consists of Senators FISH, HAMLIN, SHIELDS, and others, whose names I do not now recollect. They have addressed circulars to various ports all over the Union, and have received answers. It is a matter of great consequence. I would state to the House that my object now is to move the reconsideration of the vote by which the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and to move that they be referred to a special committee, to be raised in this House to cooperate with the one in the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider will be entered, but it cannot be considered now, for the reason that there are already two motions to reconsider pending, on one of which the previous question is resting. The motion must be postponed until after these two are disposed of.

Mr. DEAN. Then the motion will be entered?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I asked the consent of the House yesterday evening to take up Senate bill in relation to the pay and emoluments and contingent fund of that body. My friend from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] objected, under a misunderstanding, which has been removed. I think that the bill, in its present form, will be acceptable to the House, because there are no principles involved in it to which the House can take exceptions. Under these circumstances, I propose that it would be respectful to the Senate to take up and act upon the bill; I therefore ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the bill referred to.

Mr. MACE. I object.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MADISON PARTON.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not now in order. A motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to adopt an amendment proposed to House bill for the relief of Madison Parton; which amendment was proposed by the Committee of the Whole House. The previous question was ordered to be put. The consideration of the matter, with the previous question thereon, was, by unanimous consent, postponed until this day, and that is the first business in order.

Mr. DEAN. I made the motion to reconsider that vote. I do not desire to discuss it; but only to state to the House—

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. DEAN. The motion to reconsider is debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The previous question was ordered upon the bill, and there was a motion pending to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to adopt the amendment of the committee. It has not been, in any form, taken from before the House.

Mr. DEAN. I ask that the amendment which was rejected by the House may be read, in order that the House may understand it.

Mr. HILLYER. I ask that both the bill and report may be read. The report is short.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be reported to the House.

The amendment was to strike out the words as follows:

—"together with interest thereon from said 8th day of February, 1838."

The SPEAKER. That amendment was rejected by the House, and the pending motion is to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. DEAN. Upon that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This is a motion to lay upon the table a motion to reconsider, which is connected with the bill, and is not a final vote upon it. May it not carry the bill with it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HILLYER. I ask that the bill and report may be read, for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. If not objected to the bill and report will be read for information.

No objection being made, they were read by the Clerk.

Mr. DISNEY. Will the Chair be good enough to state the precise motion before the House?

The SPEAKER again recapitulated the history of the action of the House in reference to the bill under consideration, as above reported.

Mr. DISNEY. Has the previous question been called upon the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The previous question is resting upon the bill.

Mr. DISNEY. I only desire to say that there is a precedent precisely in point in this case. It involves the principle of the Galphin case.

The question now being upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, it was put, and decided in the negative.

So the House refused to lay the motion upon the table.

The question then recurring upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to concur in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, it was put, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 80, noes not counted.

So the vote was reconsidered.

The question next recurred upon agreeing to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole House, striking out the provision in the bill, allowing interest upon the claim.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is the amendment debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not, the previous question having been ordered.

The question was put, and the House agreed to concur in the amendment—ayes 80, noes not counted.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and being engrossed, was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would remind the gentleman from Ohio that the bills passed through committee, and reported to the House last Friday, have not yet been disposed of, and this is again "objection day." There have, I believe, been no new bills put upon the Private Calendar since last Friday, and I therefore suggest to him whether it would not be better to dispose of the bills reported last week?

Mr. EDGERTON. In answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, I will say that there are now upon the Private Calendar some five or six cases that were not upon it last Friday.

Mr. JONES. There may be a few.

Mr. EDGERTON. They can undoubtedly be disposed of without objection.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman can pursue his own course about the bills; but I think the House ought first to dispose of the bills reported last week.

The SPEAKER. There is a number of private bills on the Speaker's table.

Mr. EDGERTON. As the House well knows, this is "objection day," and the last there will be for four weeks. There are a few cases on the Calendar to which there can be no objection, and which may soon be disposed of in committee. They will then take their places on the Speaker's table, along with the bills reported last week.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but you will put those bills in advance of the bills reported last week, and if they cannot all be disposed of to-day, you will throw over the bills reported last week until another private bill day.

The question was then taken on Mr. EDGERTON's motion, and it was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. HIBBARD in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the first business in order was Senate bill (No. 2) "to indemnify the State of Indiana for the failure of title to a township of land granted to said State on her admission into the Union in 1816."

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to submit to the committee that it would be substantially useless to call over the bills to which objection has been made heretofore. I therefore move to postpone the consideration of those bills, and take up the Calendar where we left off last Friday.

Mr. EDGERTON. I will state to the gentleman from New York, that we passed entirely through the Calendar on Friday last; but probably some gentlemen who made objection to bills last week may, from examinations since made, be willing now to withdraw their objections.

Mr. CLINGMAN. No doubt of it.

Mr. EDGERTON. I therefore think that it would be better to commence at the beginning of the Calendar, and go through with it.

Mr. HAVEN. I certainly desire to defer to the chairman of the Committee of Claims, who has these matters mainly in charge. I will adopt any suggestion he desires to make on the subject, and withdraw my motion.

Mr. HENN. It may be that those who objected the last private bill day are not now present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from New York has withdrawn his motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I give notice that I shall object to all the bills that were objected to last Friday.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that several bills were objected to last Friday because the reports accompanying them had not been printed; and that if those reports be now printed the objection falls.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that objection must be made to the bills separately, as they come up.

Mr. JONES. I beg the Chair to enter me as objecting, then, to each one as it comes up.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to the bill before the committee?

Mr. JONES. I do.

The following bills were then taken up, and objected to, as indicated below:

No. 51. "A bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe." [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.]

No. 58. "A bill for settling the claims of the legal representatives of Richard W. Meade, deceased." [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

No. 59. "A bill for the relief of Samuel Colt." [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.]

No. 63. "A bill for the relief of Charles Lee Jones." [Objected to by Mr. PERKINS, of New York.]

The report of the committee, accompanying the latter bill, was read through.

[Mr. ORR having, in the absence of the Speaker, temporarily taken the chair, a message was received from the Senate, by the hands of Mr. MACHEN, its Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the House, entitled "An act to satisfy claims for bounty lands;" and also a bill entitled "An act to provide for the accommodation of the United States courts in Massachusetts."

[A message was also received from the President of the United States, by the hands of SIDNEY WEBSTER, Esq., his Private Secretary, informing the House that he had signed certain bills.]

The following bills coming up in order for consideration, were objected to as indicated below, and were laid over, under the rules:

No. 98. "A bill for the relief of Henry Lewis, of Clinton county, Indiana." [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.]

No. 99. "A bill for the relief of Captain George Simpton, of Galveston." [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of New York.]

No. 103. "A bill for the relief of Ferdinand Clark." [Objected to by Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana.]

No. 104. "A bill for the relief of Adolphus Meier & Co., of St. Louis." [Objected to by Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana.]

No. 105. "A bill for the relief of Wilson & Brothers, of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri." [Objected to by Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana.]

The next bill coming up in order for consideration was—

No. 107. "A bill for the relief of Robert Grignon."

The bill—which was read by the Clerk—provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to the legal representatives of the Menomonee tribe of Indians, or their assignees, the sum of $19,000, in full satisfaction of their claims against the United States, arising out of the treaty with the Menomonee tribe of Indians on the 3d of September, 1836.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to object to this bill, but I suggest that the words "or their assignees" be stricken out. If it is not, we may be involved in a great deal of trouble. We do not know who are their assignees.

Mr. ORR. The amendment made by the committee when last in session, which was to strike out the words "Robert Grignon," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the legal representatives of the Menomonee tribe of Indians, or their assignees," was suggested by my friend from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the words "or their assignees" had better be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the words mentioned by the gentleman from Alabama were included in an amendment adopted the other day. If so, it is not in order to move to strike them out.

Mr. SKELTON. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. There is.

Mr. SKELTON. I desire to have it read.

The Clerk then read the report.

Mr. WALSH objected to the bill; and it was laid over, under the rule.

House bill (No. 108) "for the relief of George G. Bishop, and the legal representatives of John Arnold, deceased," next came up in order.

Objection being made by Mr. CLINGMAN, it was laid over.

House bill (No. 123) "for the relief of Charles Staples" next came up in order for consideration.

The bill and report were then read by the Clerk.

It appears, in this case, that the petitioner enlisted as a sergeant, on the 10th of December, 1812, into the company commanded by Captain Oliver Hessick, belonging to the regiment of Colonel McCobb, in the service of the United States, in the last war with Great Britain.

It appears from the testimony of the witnesses in the case, that from severe exposure he became sick, and unable to perform duty; from which sickness, after several months' confinement, he partially recovered; that the disease, however, left him an invalid.

It is further in proof that the petitioner was honorably discharged, and that he, together with other witnesses in the case, are of good reputation.

The committee therefore recommend that his name be placed on the pension rolls of the United States, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 1st day of January, 1853, and to continue during his natural life.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it pass.

House bill (No. 125) "for the relief of Mrs. Harriet Leavenworth, widow of brevet Brigadier General Henry Leavenworth, late of the United States Army," next came up in order for consideration.

The bill and report were then read by the Clerk. It appears in this case that Henry Leavenworth forsook a lucrative practice at the bar, in New York, and entered the United States Army as captain of the ninth infantry during the war of 1812; was promoted major August 15, 1813; breveted lieutenant colonel July 5, 1814, for distinguished and meritorious services in the battle of Chippewa; breveted colonel July 25, 1814, for gallant conduct in the battle of Niagara, in which he was wounded; retained as major in the second infantry, peace establishment of 1815; promoted lieutenant colonel in the fifth infantry, February 10, 1818; breveted brigadier general July 25, 1824, for ten years' service in one grade; promoted colonel in the third infantry, December 16, 1825; and died at Cross Timbers, Southwestern Territory, July 21, 1834, while commanding the troops in that quarter; that, during this long continuance in the Army, he performed numerous and highly important services to his country—having established military posts in the Indian country, and at one time commanded a military expedition against the Aricara Indians; that he stood high in the estimation of the Secretary of War, as regards prudence, courage, and civic as well as military attainments; that he came to his death from bilious remittent fever, contracted while in the line of his duty as commander of an expedition against the Pawnee Picts, and that his death was hastened by anxiety of mind, and a too arduous desire to advance the objects of his country intrusted to his command; that Harriet Leavenworth, the petitioner, is the widow of said Henry Leavenworth, is advanced in age, in infirm health, and has pecuniary claims pressing upon her, which she is unable to meet.

The committee therefore recommend that the Secretary of the Interior place the name of the said Harriet Leavenworth upon the pension rolls, and cause her to be paid the sum of $37 50 per month, for and during the term of five years, commencing February 1, 1853.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to strike out $37 50, and insert in lieu thereof $30 per month. The committee were laboring under a mistake when they inserted the amount.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana, what rank General Leavenworth held?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know what his rank was. The general law would give his widow $30 per month—that is the highest half pay given to widows.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

The question was then taken upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

House bill (No. 131) "for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Gerard" coming up next in order on the Calendar, was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. MACE. Read the report.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the report, when—

Mr. BISSELL said: I perceive that the report is very lengthy, and suggest, unless otherwise requested by some member, that its reading be dispensed with.

The reading of the report was dispensed with.

Mr. BISSELL. As that case seems to have slumbered already about sixty years, I think there would be nothing wrong in requiring it to lay over a little longer, at least for a few days, and therefore object to its consideration to-day.

The bill was laid over.

The following bills next came up in order, and were objected to as indicated below:

No. 173. "A bill for the relief of Mrs. Helen McKay, widow of the late Colonel Eneas McKay, deputy quartermaster general United States Army." [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.]

No. 174. "A bill for the relief of D. C. Cash and Giles U. Ellis." [Objected to by Mr. MACE.]

No. 110. "A bill authorizing the payment of the balance of the property accounts between the United States and the State of New York, for military stores in the war of 1812." [Objected to by Mr. MACE.]

The bill of the following title next came up in order:

No. 176. "A bill for the relief of Pamela Brown, the widow of Major General Jacob Brown, late of the United States Army, deceased."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the bill?

Several MEMBERS. Read the report.

The Clerk read the report of the committee.

Mr. JONES, of New York. Mr. Chairman, as the sum provided by this bill is so small that it is hardly worth while to vote it, and as I understand that a Senate bill has been sent to this House giving the widow of General Brown fifty dollars per month, I ask that the consideration of the bill be postponed until after the whole facts are before the House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does the gentleman from New York object to the bill?

Mr. JONES. I do object for the reasons stated.

The bill next on the Calendar for consideration was House bill (No. 180) "for the relief of William B. Edwards."

The Clerk read the bill, which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of William B. Edwards on the pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence 1st January, 1854, and to continue during five years.

The CHAIRMAN. To this bill there is an amendment pending, which provides that the pension shall date from January, 1850, instead of 1854, and that it be during natural life, instead of five years.

The bill and amendment were read.

The question was taken on the adoption of the amendment, which was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House.

The next bill coming up in order for consideration was a bill (No. 182) "for the relief of Daniel Steenrod."

The bill, which was read, provides that the petition and papers of the petitioner be referred to the Secretary of War, and that he be authorized to appoint an umpire to hear evidence and ascertain and fix what is justly and equitably due to the petitioner, and pay the same out of the Treasury.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected; and the bill was laid over under the rules.

The next bill coming up in order for consideration was No. 188: "A bill for the relief of Anthony G. Willis, deceased."

The bill, which was read, provides that there shall be paid to the heirs of Anthony G. Willis the sum of $251, as compensation for the use, by the United States, of a wagon and team during the last war with Great Britain.

The report was then read, from which it appears that Anthony G. Willis was, in 1814, the owner of a wagon and team in Kentucky, and that he had one Benjamin T. Rowe employed in driving said team; that at Lexington, Kentucky, Captain George Stockton, an officer of the United States Army, pressed said wagon, team, and driver into service; and that they were carried beyond Dayton, in Ohio, towards the Canada line, and subsequently back to Nashville, Tennessee, laden with wounded soldiers of the regular Army; that said wagon, team, and driver were kept in the active and constant employ of the Government till the services amounted to the sum of $251, and that Captain Stockton gave a certificate for that sum; that the certificate was sent on to Washington for payment by Mr. Zane, the Representative in Congress from the district in which Willis lived, and that the accounting officer rejected it because it contained an interlineation; that every effort was made to have the voucher corrected, but that, owing to the distance at which Willis lived from Captain Stockton, and the fact that Stockton was absent from home when the agent of Willis went to see him, it was not done until Willis died, leaving his children all minors, and wholly incapable of transacting business. The administrators subsequently endeavored to get a proper voucher, but with like want of success. The family and their friends have been endeavoring from that day to this, through the various Representatives from that district in Congress, to get the claim allowed and paid; but all in vain. That said Willis was poor, and having a large family, the denial of this just demand was a peculiar hardship. It is also fully proven that the voucher was lost: it being left at the house of Stockton for correction.

Mr. LETCHER. I would inquire of the gentleman who reported this bill why this bill is not made payable to the administrator or executor?

Mr. BISSELL. The gentleman who reported the bill is not here. I presume, however, it is a mere omission, and probably an amendment embracing the case pointed out by the gentleman had better be inserted in the bill.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to amend the bill so as to strike out the word "heirs," and make the sum payable to the executor or administrator.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it pass.

House bill (No. 189) "for the relief of John S. Jones and William H. Russell, surviving partners of Brown, Russell & Co," next came up for consideration.

The report was read by the Clerk.

Mr. EDGERTON. I object to the bill.

Mr. BENTON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection for one moment, and allow me to say a word in explanation of this bill. I think I can satisfy him that it ought to pass.

Mr. EDGERTON. A bill of this importance, involving a question of contract, ought to be discussed in the House. I therefore insist on my objection.

Mr. FLORENCE. Oh, withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. EDGERTON. Well, I will do that.

Mr. BENTON. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for withdrawing his objection, even for a moment. What I have to say to the committee is, that this bill does not direct anything to be paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman that if debate arises, the bill goes over.

Mr. BENTON. I believe I am only doing what it is usual to do here—making an explanation; that is all. The bill authorizes the proper accounting officers to examine the accounts in this case, and pay what the actual losses may have been. The case is an extraordinary one. Nobody could be found except these contractors and another set who went at the same time, to undertake to carry these supplies to Santa Fé at the commencement of the winter. They undertook to bind themselves to no given time, but to all practicable dispatch. The two trains proceeded, and they had arrived within forty odd miles of Santa Fé, into the mountains there, when there came on one of those terrible snow storms which destroy all animal life exposed to them, if shelter is not obtained in the groves of timber, or what are called in that country cañons—deep hollows; and all travelers in that country, the moment they see the approach of one of these storms, make for a grove of timber, or cañon, in which they can obtain shelter. Well, in this case, both the trains stopped at the same time in one of these cañons. This claimant went on and represented his condition to the officer in command, and that officer ordered him to come on, saying that if he did not, the train should be brought in at his expense. Under that order he undertook to move, and lost every animal that he had. The other train, not subjected to that order, remained, and not only saved every animal, but went on a few days afterwards, when the storm subsided, and sold every ox they had in Santa Fé. This destruction was occasioned by the order of the officer and the threat that he would have the train brought on at the expense of the contractor if he did not come on.

Mr. EDGERTON. I renew my objection to the bill. The bill accordingly lies over.

House bill (No. 190) "for the relief of William Hawkins" coming up next in order, was objected to by Mr. LETCHER.

House bill (No. 193) "for the relief of Alton Nelson" stood next in order upon the Calendar. The bill and the report were read.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

House bill (No. 195) "for the relief of Sarah K. Jenks, and the legal representatives of Hartshorne R. Thomas, in the matter of the brig Jane," came up next in order for consideration.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This is one of those old Spanish claims rejected by the Board of Commissioners under the Florida treaty of February, 1819, and ought to lay over. I object to its consideration to-day.

The bill was accordingly laid over.

The bill (No. 196) "for the relief of Gilbert C. Russell" coming up in order for consideration, was objected to by Mr. WALSH, and laid over.

The bill (No. 199) "for the relief of Thomas C. Greene" came up next in order.

The reading of the report of the committee was called for.

Mr. HUGHES. No report was made in this case, because the preamble recited all the facts of the case. The bill merely authorizes the correction of an error on the part of the Government, and is reported in pursuance of the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. LETCHER. Is there no conflict?

Mr. HUGHES. None at all.

Mr. LETCHER. Is there nobody else claiming the land?

Mr. HUGHES. Nobody, sir. It is a mere change of location.

Mr. WALSH. As the bill gives rise to discussion, I object.

The bill was laid over under the rule.

The bill next on the Calendar for consideration was Senate bill (No. 76) "authorizing Victor Morass to relinquish certain lands, and to enter the same quantity elsewhere."

The Clerk read the bill and the accompanying report.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, there is evidently not a quorum present; I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Mr. Chairman, the Chair can count the committee, and see whether there is a quorum present, if there be no objection. There are but five ayes on the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is somewhat in doubt as to that.

Tellers were called for, and ordered. Messrs. WHEELER and CHURCHWELL were appointed such tellers.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 3, noes 97.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum voting, the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk then called the roll, after which several members desiring to have their names entered as present—

Mr. HOUSTON said, I rise to a point of order. It is, that no gentleman, who was not within the bar when his name was called, can have his name recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order well taken.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The custom has been to allow the names of those who were present to be entered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the reading of the rule in relation to a call of the roll.

The 196th rule was then read, as follows:

"Whenever the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or the Committee of the Whole House, finds itself without a quorum, the chairman shall cause the roll of the House to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the Chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal."

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Now read the rule requiring members to be within the bar, and we shall see that it is confined exclusively to voting; and unless members are excluded by it, they have the right to have their names recorded.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This course is certainly contrary to the uniform practice under this rule. The practice has been, whenever the committee finds itself without a quorum, to call the roll; and when it has been called, the Chair listens to no addresses made to it, but immediately makes his report to the House. There is no calling over the absentees, as in the case of a call of the House.

Mr. BAYLY. I ask for the reading of the rule requiring members to be within the bar.

Mr. JONES. That rule does not apply to this case.

Mr. BAYLY. That is the very reason why a member has a right to have his name entered.

Mr. JONES. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that if a member is within the bar when his name is called, he has a right to have his name recorded.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was not within the bar when my name was called; I was in the Senate at the time. If the Chair decides that I have not a right to answer to my name, I wish to take an appeal. I will state the reasons upon which I base my appeal. It is that the only object of the rule is to ascertain, before the committee report, whether there is a quorum present or not. Now, the committee has made no report; and if there is a quorum present, as a matter of course, the object of the rule is accomplished.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The committee found itself without a quorum.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We have a quorum.

Mr. JONES. The committee cannot ascertain that. The rule requires the roll to be called, and the Chairman to report the same to the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the Chair decide that I have no right to take an appeal upon a point of order?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. If my recollection serves me right, it has been customary to call over a second time the names of those who have not answered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair knows of no such rule.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee [Mr. HIBBARD] reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had under consideration the Private Calendar, and made progress therein; but having found itself without a quorum, had ordered the roll to be called, and directed him to report to the House the names of the absentees.

A quorum being present, the committee again resumed its session, (Mr. HIBBARD in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The bill next in order is Senate bill No. 76, but there was a motion pending that the committee rise.

Mr. WHEELER. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DAWSON. I renew the motion.

The question was then taken, and the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business in order before the committee is Senate bill (No. 76) "authorizing Victor Morass to relinquish certain lands, and to enter the same quantity elsewhere." The bill has already been read by the Clerk, and if not objected to, will be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. WALSH objected; and it was laid over.

Senate bill (No. 73) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Joshua Kennedy, deceased," next came up in its order for consideration; but being objected to by Mr. LANE, of Indiana, was laid over.

Senate bill (No. 127) "for the relief of John Fagan" next came up in order for consideration.

The bill and report were then read.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I wish to make a simple statement in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. EDGERTON. I object to any bill which gives rise to discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the bill must be laid aside.

House bill (No. 25) "for the relief of Grafton Baker" next came up in its order for consideration.

The bill and report were then read.

The report was read by the Clerk, from which it appears that in the summer of 1852, William Carr Lane, who was at that time Governor of New Mexico, went to the Mesilla district to take possession of the same; that he issued a proclamation, and claimed jurisdiction of the country until the boundary line between Mexico and the Territory of New Mexico should be established by Mexico and the United States. The claim of the United States to jurisdiction was resisted by military force by the authorities of the State of Chihuahua. The Governor of New Mexico deemed it advisable to lay the whole subject before the President of the United States as soon as possible; and for that purpose he employed the petitioner as bearer of dispatches to the President of the United States; the Governor being at that time three hundred miles south of Santa Fé, where he employed Grafton Baker to convey a communication upon the subject to Washington city, to be delivered to the President.

Mr. Baker performed that service in about thirty days; and the Secretary of State could not pay him for his services, because there was no fund from which the expenses of Mr. Baker could lawfully be paid.

A letter from William Carr Lane, late Governor of the Territory of New Mexico, after stating the circumstances on account of which he deemed it advisable to lay the subject of the Mesilla district before the President of the United States, represents that he was then three hundred miles south of Santa Fé, and that it would have been imprudent to have trusted a communication of such grave importance to the uncertainties of that mail route; that it was, therefore, intrusted to the care of the Hon. Grafton Baker to be delivered, for which the compensation claimed was but reasonable.

A letter from W. L. Marcy, Secretary of State, represents that the claim of Mr. Baker for his expenses as bearer of dispatches from Governor Lane, of New Mexico, having been considered just and reasonable, would have been allowed and paid by the Department, if there had been any funds at its disposal from which, with propriety, the payment could have been made.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

A joint resolution "directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust the accounts of William Woodbury, late pension agent at Portland, Maine," stood next in order upon the Calendar.

The joint resolution and report were read.

Discussion arising, the joint resolution was objected to by Mr. WALSH, and laid over.

House bill (No. 237) "for the relief of Mary Deany, widow of the late Lieutenant James A. Deany, of the United States Army," stood next in order upon the Calendar.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mary Deany upon the pension roll of the United States, and to cause to be paid to her the sum of fifteen dollars per month for a term of ten years, commencing January 1, 1853; provided, that in case of the marriage or death of said Mary Deany, the pension hereby granted shall be paid to her two children, or the survivor of them.

The report was read by the Clerk.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

A bill (No. 238) "for the relief of John S. King, of Virginia," came up next in order.

The bill and accompanying report were read through.

Mr. LETCHER. I would like to know from the gentleman who reported that bill the reason for going back to January, 1853?

Mr. ORR. Why do they not go to the Pension Office, if the facts be as stated?

Mr. LETCHER. That is true; I object to the consideration of the bill to-day.

The bill was accordingly passed over.

Bills of the following titles coming up next in order, and being objected to as indicated below, were laid over:

No. 239. "A bill for the relief of Hiram Moore and John Hascall." [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.]

S. 125. "An act for the relief of Ezra Williams." [Objected to by Mr. GREENWOOD, after the bill and accompanying report had been read through.]

The bill next on the Calendar for consideration was Senate bill (No. 90) "for the relief of Charles Cooper."

The Clerk read the bill directing the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to pay to Charles Cooper, of Bangor, Maine, the sum of $300 in full for interest due to him from the United States.

Mr. WALSH objected; and the bill was laid over.

The bill next on the Calendar for consideration was Senate bill (No. 91) "for the relief of James Dunning."

The Clerk read the bill, directing the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to pay to James Dunning $255 98 in full for interest due to him from the United States.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected; and the bill was laid over.

The bill next on the Calendar was House bill (No. 240) "for the relief of Thomas S. J. Johnson, of the Territory of New Mexico."

The Clerk read the bill, which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Thomas S. J. Johnson the sum of $4,800 for the value of thirty-two large road wagons taken by the officers of the United States Army, and appropriated to the public use.

The Clerk read the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. ORR. I wish to ask the gentleman who reported this bill why the quartermaster did not make compensation directly to this person?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman who reported the bill is not present.

Mr. ORR. I wish to understand the facts somewhat more fully; therefore I object to it.

The bill was accordingly laid over under the rule.

The next bill which came up in order for consideration, was House bill (No. 241) "for the relief of the administrators of Oliver Lee, deceased."

The bill was read in extenso. It provides, among other things, for the payment to the administrators of Oliver Lee, deceased, of the sum of $580 32, for the reasons therein stated.

Mr. FENTON. I move to amend, by inserting after the words "cents" the words, "with interest thereon, to be computed from the 30th day of August, 1844."

Mr. HENDRICKS objecting, the bill was laid over, under the rule.

Senate bill (No. 139) "for the relief of Charles A. Kellett" coming up next in order for consideration, was objected to by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, and laid over under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that there is another Senate bill, not upon the Calendar, which the clerk will report.

The title of the bill was read, as follows: "A bill for the relief of Joseph Mitchell."

The bill and report were read in extenso.

Mr. WALSH. As the bill appears to be a bounty upon desertion, I object.

The bill was accordingly laid over under the rule.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the committee rise.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had under consideration the Private Calendar, and directed him to report to the House, with a recommendation that it pass, House bill (No. 180) "for the relief of William B. Edwards," with an amendment; and also that they had directed him to report without amendment the following bills, with a recommendation that they pass:

House bill (No. 123) "for the relief of Charles Staples;"

House bill (No. 125) "for the relief of Harriet Leavenworth, widow of the late Brevet Brigadier General Leavenworth;"

House bill (No. 193) "for the relief of Alton Nelson;"

House bill (No. 235) "for the relief of Grafton Baker;" and

House bill (No. 237) "for the relief of Mary Deany, widow of the late Lieutenant James A. Deany, of the United States Army."

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. ORR. I move that when this House adjourns, that it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 101, nays 50.

So the motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The question first in order is on the bill reported last Friday from the Committee of the Whole House, for the relief of Benjamin Rowe, to which the following amendment was made:

Strike out the words "five years," and insert in lieu thereof "during his natural life."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say to the House that this is to make the bill correspond with the pension laws of the United States. The committee which reported the bill, by some mistake inserted five years, instead of for life, as they should have done.

Mr. KERR. We, in this quarter, do not understand the amendment at all. I ask the Chair to explain the state of the question.

The SPEAKER. This is a proposition for a pension. The bill, as reported, provides a pension for five years. It is proposed to amend by striking out "five years" and inserting "for life."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The bill is to grant a pension. In cases like this, where the person was in the military service, in the line of his duty, it has been the invariable practice to grant him a pension for life. Through inadvertency, or from some cause, the person having the bill in charge inserted a clause providing a pension for five years instead of for life. The five-years' pensions have been confined exclusively to another class. I know nothing about this case except from the report; but that is the principle upon which we have heretofore acted.

The question was taken; and the amendment agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Is it competent for the House to vote upon the remaining bills reported from the Committee of the Whole, en masse?

The SPEAKER. That course can be pursued by unanimous consent only.

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

The following bills were then taken up, and severally ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and having been engrossed, were read a third time, and passed:

A bill for the relief of Henry L. Halstead;

A bill for the relief of Benjamin Hammond, of the State of New York; and

A bill for the relief of Henry J. Snow, of Rome, in the State of New York.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. These bills were all reported from the Committee of the Whole House without objection. I propose that they should be read by their titles, and passed en masse.

Mr. WHEELER. I withdraw my objection to that course.

The following House bills, reported on Friday last from the Committee of the Whole House, were then taken from the Speaker's table, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and were subsequently read a third time, and passed:

"A bill (No. 124) for the relief of Lemuel Hudson;"

"A bill (No. 126) for the relief of George S. Clafin;"

"A bill (No. 127) for the relief of James F. Green;"

"A bill (No. 128) for the relief of Thomas Frazer;"

"A bill (No. 129) for the relief of Cornelius H. Latham;"

"A bill (No. 130) for the relief of Samuel W. Brady;"

"A bill (No. 134) for the relief of Fayette Mauzy and Robert G. Ward;"

"A bill (No. 170) for the relief of the legal representatives of the late John E. Bispham;"

"A bill (No. 175) for the relief of John O. Mears;"

"A bill (No. 177) for the relief of Lyman N. Cook;"

"A bill (No. 179) for the relief of Emelie Hooe, widow of Captain Hooe;"

"A bill (No. 181) for the relief of John Hamilton;"

"A bill (No. 183) for the relief of the Utica Steam Woolen Company;"

"A bill (No. 184) for the relief of Gray, McMurdo & Co.;"

"A bill (No. 191) for the relief of George W. Gibson;"

"A bill (No. 192) for the relief of Parmelia Slavin, widow of John Blue, deceased;"

"A bill (No. 194) to provide a pension for Silas Champion;"

"A bill (No. 200) to confirm to Hercules L. Dousman his title to farm lot No. 32, adjoining the town of Prairie du Chien, in the State of Wisconsin;"

"A bill (No. 201) for the relief of Aaron Stafford;" and

"A bill (No. 202) for the relief of Hezekiah Johnson, of the town of Bridgewater, in the State of Vermont."

The following House bills reported to-day from the Committee of the Whole House, without amendment, were then taken from the Speaker's table, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and subsequently read the third time, and passed:

"A bill (No. 123) for the relief of Charles Staples;"

"A bill (No. 193) for the relief of Alton Nelson;"

"A bill (No. 235) for the relief of Grafton Baker;" and

"A bill (No. 337) for the relief of Mary Deany, widow of the late Lieutenant James A. Deany, of the United States Army."

The following House bill, reported from the Committee of the Whole House, with an amendment, was then taken from the Speaker's table:

"A bill (No. 125) for the relief of Harriet Leavenworth, widow of the late brevet Brigadier General Leavenworth."

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out "$37 50," and insert in lieu thereof "$30;" so that the bill shall provide for the paying of $30 pension per month, instead of $37 50.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This bill is in violation of all the general pension laws of the country. It is an exception which I think is wrong. If such cases are to be provided for, there should be a general law passed; so that benefit may be received by the widows of soldiers who die in the United States service in time of peace, as well as the widows of those who die under these circumstances. If the principle involved is to be recognized at all, let it be recognized by Congress in a general law. I therefore move that the bill be laid upon the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think this is one of the most meritorious cases that can come before Congress. I move to amend the bill by striking out five years, and inserting ten years. I do it upon this ground: Half pay has been given to widows under general laws. Last year we passed a bill to give an additional five years. We might as well say ten years at once, as that at the expiration of five years, five years additional shall be given.

Mr. JONES. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, as he says that pensions have been given for ten years, whether the widow of a soldier who died the same day, and in the same camp as General Leavenworth, can get a pension under any law now in force in this country?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If as meritorious a case as this of General Leavenworth be presented in favor of any of the soldiers who died at the same time, I have no doubt Congress would pass upon it favorably.

I will add, before I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, that this case does not come strictly within the pension laws. If it did, and if, under the general law, adequate relief could be given, it would not be here. It is one of the most meritorious cases, in my judgment, that could come before Congress. This man, by his exposure in the service of the country, lost his life. He encountered dangers as great as many did in battle. I am not disposed to discuss the question further; but if the gentleman has any further questions to propound, I shall be glad to answer them.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has not answered the question which I put to him. I inquired whether, under the laws to which he referred, the widow of any soldier could get a pension? I take it upon myself to say that she could not; and, sir, there is no case within my recollection where the widow of any soldier, under similar circumstances, has ever had a pension bill passed for her benefit.

It is for an officer. And what is the merit in this particular case? An officer who was favored by a commission in the Army of the country, a profession which he chose for himself, and one which he preferred to all others—to any certainly in civil life—he serves in it, and in time of peace, and in the course of nature, he dies, as we must all die. And because he had been favored all his life, his widow must be made the peculiar favorite of Congress, to the exclusion of all others—the general laws of the country overlooked—and because he was an officer, this peculiar favor is wanted.

Sir, I say that if we are to adopt this principle of giving pensions to the widows of those who die in time of peace in the service, make the law general. When you have such a case, let it not be a case of special favor and privilege. Extend the benefit alike to the soldier who is commanded as to the officer who commands.

Mr. McMULLIN. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the favor to have the report of the committee read before I take my seat.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is it a long report?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not very long.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Did not we hear it read just now?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then what is the use of having it read again?

The Clerk read the report.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion which I made to amend the bill; and before I sit down, I move the previous question.

The report shows the fact that General Leavenworth was ordered by the Government on an expedition against the Indians, and that while there he lost his life through the exposure incident to that service. In such a case Congress, at the last session, gave the widow of General Worth $50 per month for life.

This bill proposes to give to the widow of General Leavenworth $30 per month, for five years. I move the previous question.

The House divided upon the call for the previous question, and there were 77 in the affirmative and 28 in the negative—no quorum voting.

Mr. ORR. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe there is a quorum in the House, and I—

Mr. ORR. I made a motion that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina insists upon his motion to adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Orr] will let me make an appeal to him to withdraw his motion for a moment. There is a bill upon the Speaker's table which, it seems to me, we ought to pass. It is the bill which relates to the manner of disbursing the contingent fund of the Senate. There are some Senators who have not drawn a single dime since they came to this Congress. This bill from the Senate, to which I refer, has been upon our table for a week, and I appeal to the House to take it up and dispose of it in some way.

The SPEAKER. Is the motion to adjourn withdrawn?

Mr. ORR. I withdraw it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now ask the House to take up that Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, it will be taken up.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object.

Mr. ORR. I then renew my motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly adjourned until Monday next.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 4, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. SEWARD. I am requested to present the petition of six hundred citizens of the State of New York, residing in the county of Monroe. They state that they know of the privations and sufferings which were endured by the soldiers of the war of 1812—the second war of independence—and they think that the survivors and their heirs are entitled to some relief at the present period. The petition prays Congress to grant to each one of those soldiers who may survive, and to the representatives of each one who is deceased, one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands. I move, therefore, that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER presented the memorial of the Fox and Wisconsin Improvement Company, praying to be allowed an additional grant of land, and to locate the portion of lands unlocated of a grant made under an act of Congress approved August 8, 1846, for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BAYARD presented a memorial of certain citizens of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, praying a further appropriation to complete the piers on the easternmost side of Reedy Island; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRIGHT presented a petition of the rector and members of the vestry of Rock Creek parish, in the county of Washington, District of Columbia, praying that provision may be made by Congress for the establishment and support of a public school in the parish of Rock Creek; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of Oliver Towles and others, praying to be allowed seven years' half pay of captain, as the heirs and legal representatives of Captain Oliver Towles, deceased, who was slain by the enemy in the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented sundry memorials of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of the Nebraska bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, fourteen memorials, numerous signed, of citizens of Philadelphia, against the removal of the United States Mint from that city; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN presented the memorial of the Bethlehem Baptist Association, at Enterprise, Mississippi, praying that provision be made in our treaties with foreign countries to secure religious toleration to American citizens who may be resident therein; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLEN presented the petition of Christopher Spencer, praying remuneration for the sufferings and loss of property of his father during the war of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. SEWARD presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of the city of Cleveland, in the State of Ohio, in favor of the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented a petition of certain citizens of Iowa, praying Congress to permit William Rees to establish a normal settlement on the public lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SUMNER presented a remonstrance of three hundred tax-paying citizens of Claremont, New Hampshire, against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FISH presented a petition of citizens of Clinton county, New York, praying Congress to grant one hundred and sixty acres of the public land to each of the soldiers of the war of 1812, or his legal representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CASS presented a memorial of citizens of Philadelphia, praying a modification of the bounty land law, so as to grant one hundred and sixty acres of land to the soldiers of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of Elizabeth S. R. Saily, of New York, praying that the pension granted to her as the widow of Captain Samuel L. Russell, of the Army, may be continued; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to present the petition of John S. Wilson, a citizen of the State of Alabama, formerly a citizen of the State of Missouri, asking to be reimbursed the amount of purchase money of a section of land entered by him in the land office at St. Louis, with the interest accruing thereon. He entered this land, it appears, in 1822, and was afterwards divested of his right by one claiming under a Spanish grant. The title, it appears, was afterwards confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. Under these circumstances he asks to be reimbursed the amount of the purchase money and interest. I ask that the petition may be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

It was so referred.

Mr. CLAY also presented a petition of citizens of Tusculumbia and its vicinity, in the State of Alabama, praying that the compensation of the postmaster and the clerks in the post office in that town may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

THE MISSOURI COMPROMISE.

Mr. FISH. Mr. President, I am desired to present to the Senate the proceedings of a public meeting, held in the city of New York, to express the opinions of those citizens adverse to the enactment by Congress of any act repealing the Missouri compromise. The meeting was numerous, and most respectfully attended. From respect to the parties who participated in that meeting, and the great importance of the subject, I desire that the proceedings may be read.

The Secretary was proceeding to read the proceedings—

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have no particular objection to the reading of these resolutions. I have read the proceedings of that meeting, and I presume every Senator has read them. What I wish to suggest is, that if we are to have all petitions and memorials read at length, the whole day will be consumed. Why should we make an exception in this case to the general rule? As I have said, I have no particular objection to the reading of this memorial; but this course is a departure from the usage of the Senate on this subject. I prefer that the established usage shall be adhered to. If I present any memorials on the other side, I shall not ask to have them read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. NORRIS in the chair.) Does the Senator object to the reading of the memorial?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I object to this departure from the rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question will be on allowing the memorial to be read.

Mr. SEWARD asked for the yeas and nays on this subject, but they were not ordered.

The question being taken, the Senate refused to allow the paper to be read.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. SEBASTIAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers of William Field, clerk of the United States district court for Arkansas, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. FISLII, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers of Elizabeth Marsh, only child of Lieutenant Jonathan Metcalf, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Parsey Elmore be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of William P. Ackers and Julia Ackers, legal representatives of William Yool, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, in order that the petition and papers might be presented in the House of Representatives; which was agreed to.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. HUNTER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the settlement of certain public accounts.

Mr. BADGER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill making an appropriation for the removal of obstructions at the mouth of Cape Fear river.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

On the motion of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, the Senate resumed the consideration of the special order of the day, being the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. DIXON addressed the Senate, and in the course of his speech he replied to the argument delivered yesterday by the Senator from Ohio.

[His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. WADE next obtained the floor, and moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Monday.

The motion was agreed to by a vote of 23 yeas to 17 nays; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bell, Brodhead, Butler, Cass, Clayton, Dawson, Everett, Fish, Foot, Houston, Jones of Tennessee, Norris, Sebastian, Seward, Smith, Stuart, Sumner, Thomson of New Jersey, Toucey, Wade, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Benjamin, Brown, Clay, Dixon, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Gwin, Mason, Pettit, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, and Weller—17.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of Executive business.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 6, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

Hon. THOMAS J. RUSK, of Texas, appeared in his seat this morning.

INTERNATIONAL WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I hold in my hand, and now desire to present, a memorial of the American Geographical and Statistical Society, signed by their distinguished officers, among whom are George Bancroft, as President, and Henry Grinnell, as Vice President, in which they set forth that the weights and measures now in use in the United States, from their variety, complexity, and uncertainty, are calculated to mislead and perplex large numbers of the people; that serious embarrassments daily occur in our foreign commerce from the want of a common international standard; that the importance of a simplification of weights and measures has frequently engaged the attention of eminent statesmen at home and abroad; and that, at this time, it is occupying the attention of the British Government and of other Governments on the continent of Europe and of South America; that the present moment seems auspicious for a common effort among the leading nations in this direction; and also to establish a common meridian line; and that our Republic, from its character and position, is favorably circumstanced for organizing such a movement. The memorialists, therefore, pray that Congress will take into consideration the propriety of a thorough revision of our national weights and measures, and the expediency of inviting the other nations, by a scientific congress, or in some other way, to secure the establishment of an international standard.

Such is the prayer of this memorial; and allow me to add, that in its accomplishment there will be a new triumph of civilization, and a new bond of peace, a new instrument of daily convenience and happiness.

This subject does not properly fall within the province of one of the standing committees; but, on former occasions, resolutions touching weights and measures have emanated from the Committee on the Library; and I beg now to move the reference of the memorial and accompanying documents to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that it had passed the following bills; which were read a first and second time by their titles, and referred to the committees annexed:

Mr. FOOT presented documents in support of the claim of the children of Leonard Baker to a pension for services during the war of the Revolution; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRIGHT presented a report of the proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Georgetown, District of Columbia, protesting against the erection of any more bridges below Georgetown harbor; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMLIN presented several memorials signed by citizens of Maine, praying that the bounty land law may be so altered as to grant to those soldiers who served in the war of 1812 one hundred and sixty acres of land, or, if deceased, to their widows or children; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BENJAMIN presented the memorial of the Jefferson and Lake Pontchartrain Railway Company, praying that the terminus of that railway on the lake be made a port of delivery; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, presented the memorial of Thomas Conner, praying a pension on account of an injury received in the military service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FISH presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, recommending that provision be made at the assay office in that city for coining as well as assaying the precious metals; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, presented the memorial of S. R. Addison, a passed assistant surgeon in the Navy, praying to be allowed the difference between the pay of passed assistant surgeon during the time he performed the duties of surgeon; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MALLORY presented the petition of John W. Kelly, praying indemnification for loss sustained in consequence of the abrogation of a contract by the Post Office Department for the transportation of the mails; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey, presented the memorial of Sarah Somers Carson, nearest surviving relative of Richard Somers, who fell at Tripoli in 1804, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented a letter from Alexander Ramsey, including papers in relation to the charges of malfeasance in office preferred against him; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAWSON presented the memorial of the Hephzibah Baptist Association, of Georgia, praying that provision may be made in our treaties with foreign countries to secure religious toleration to American citizens who may be resident therein; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BUTLER presented a memorial of D. McManus, recommending the establishment of a corps of chaplains in the Army, similar to that of the Medical Department; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALKER presented a petition of citizens of Ontonagon county, Wisconsin, praying the establishment of a mail route from Appleton, via Centre and Ellington, to Bovina, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Also, a petition of citizens of Green Bay and Depere, praying the establishment of a port of entry in that part of the State of Wisconsin, or that it may be attached to the Milwaukee district; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the petition of Theresa Dardenus, praying indemnity for losses sustained in consequence of an erroneous sale of land by the land officers at Little Rock to her late husband, Abraham Dardenus; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented three petitions of citizens of Iowa, praying that a grant of land may be made to the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, to aid in the construction of the Great Western Air-Line railroad, from Fort Wayne to Council Bluffs; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JAMES submitted an additional document in relation to the claim of the heirs of Uriah Jones to a pension; which, with their petition on the files of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers in the case of the stone masons and laborers employed on the extension of the Capitol be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, in order that they may be presented in the House of Representatives.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Ethan A. Allen, legal representative of Colonel Ethan Allen, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the following memorials and papers from the files of the Senate: memorial of the executor of Carter Page, praying the commutation due the deceased as a Captain in the Army of the Revolution; petition of Anna Royall, widow of Captain William Royall, of the Revolutionary Army, praying a pension; and the petition of the heirs of Charles Lewis, praying seven years' half pay.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the memorial of Edwin James, senior, and Edwin James, junior, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That the petition of the heirs of John Underwood be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. BRIGHT, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to establish a court for the settlement of claims against the United States, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom were referred the following petitions, submitted adverse reports in each case; which were ordered to be printed:

Petition of the heirs of Abraham Hunt, praying compensation for revolutionary services.

Petition of the administrators of Joseph Torrey, and of William Johannot.

Petition of the heir of William Russwurm, praying interest on commutation pay.

Petition of the heirs of Dr. John Morgan.

He also, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the heirs and executors of Samuel Prioleau, praying indemnity for property destroyed by order of General Lincoln, during the revolutionary war, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the widow of William Riley and others, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill to provide for the settlement of the claims of the officers of the Revolutionary Army; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Sally T. B. Cochrane, widow of the late Lieutenant R. E. Cochrane, United States Army, praying compensation for a horse lost in the military service, reported a bill for her relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred documents relating to the claim of Colonel A. G. Morgan, of Missouri, for military services in Florida, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Colonel A. G. Morgan; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill granting the right of way, and a portion of the public lands, to the State of Florida, to aid in the construction of a railroad across the peninsula of that State, reported it back without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill giving a right of way, and granting alternate sections of certain public lands, to the State of Florida, to further the construction of certain railroads therein specified, reported it back with amendments.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a resolution relative to the Maison Rouge and De Bastrop grants, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to grant the right of preemption to certain purchasers and settlers on the Maison Rouge grant in the event of the final adjudication of the title in favor of the United States," approved January 27, 1851; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military

Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Captain L. C. Easton, assistant quartermaster in the Army, praying that he may be credited with certain public money of which he was defrauded by his clerk, reported a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the memorial of George Barrell and S. V. S. Wilder, on behalf of themselves and others, praying confirmation of their title to certain lands purchased of the Indian tribes in 1791, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

THE GUANO TRADE.

Mr. PRATT. I am requested to present to the Senate resolutions passed by the Legislature of Maryland on the subject of the trade in guano. The impression very generally prevails among the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent that there is a monopoly at present in this trade; and their desire is, through the instrumentality of the Federal Government, to prevent the continuance of that monopoly. I am bound to say that I believe that that very general impression is erroneous. I desire, however, that the resolutions may be read and printed for the use of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture, which, I hope, will take the subject in hand, and, after a thorough investigation, at least give the people of the country all the facts, so as to enable them to understand the matter.

The resolutions were read, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. MASON gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for liquidating and paying certain claims of the State of Virginia," approved July 5, 1832, so as to extend the provisions of its third section to embrace all that class of officers provided for by the law of Virginia passed 29th May, 1779.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HUNTER, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the settlement of certain public accounts; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ARKANSAS JUDGES.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for conferring circuit court jurisdiction upon the judge of the district court for the judicial districts of Arkansas, and for the increase of the salary of said judge.

DAVID CARTER.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and are hereby, instructed to investigate the matter of the valuation of the claim of David Carter, a Cherokee Indian, and report thereon to the Senate.

ELIZABETH C. SMITH, A FEMALE SOLDIER.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Mrs. Elizabeth C. Smith, to report a bill for her relief, granting three months' extra pay for her services in Mexico. She was enlisted as a private, served eight months before her sex was discovered, and, I believe, was then honorably dismissed. She has never received her pay.

The bill was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Several SENATORS. Read it the second time now. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. It was my intention to ask that the bill might now be put upon its passage.

The bill, by unanimous consent, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay her for her services as private in company D, of Colonel Gilpin's regiment of Missouri volunteers, from December 16, 1847, to May 14, 1848, in which she served during that time in male attire, and under the assumed name of Bill Newcom, as well as three months' extra pay, provided for by the fifth section of the act approved July 19, 1848, in the same manner as if she had properly been mustered and regularly discharged. It also proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to issue to her a warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, in accordance with the ninth section of the act approved February 11, 1847, for her services, as if she had served out the full term of her enlistment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. President, I desire to ask a simple question. I am not personally acquainted with this soldier, [laughter,] but as the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SHIELDS] was, I believe, on that line in the Mexican war, I desire to know whether she was under his command. [Laughter.] I hope the Senator will enlighten us on that subject, and we shall be better able to dispose of this bill. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I was not fortunate enough to have this lady under my command; but I have no doubt she performed her duty very faithfully in the command under which she served. I hope that report is satisfactory to the Senator. [Laughter.]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read a third time, and passed.

THE SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. SHIELDS. The joint committee on the part of the Senate and House of Representatives, in relation to the rescuers of the steamer San Francisco, have directed me to report a joint resolution manifesting the sense of Congress towards the officers and seamen of the vessels and others engaged in the rescue of the officers and soldiers of the Army, the passengers, and the officers and crew of the steamship San Francisco from perishing on the wreck of that vessel.

The joint resolution was read a first time.

Mr. SHIELDS. There will be no opposition to the passage of the resolution. It is one perhaps that ought to be proceeded with immediately; and I therefore ask for its consideration at the present time.

Mr. GWIN. I would rather that it should go on the Calendar. I was a member of the committee, and I do not agree to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT. As its second reading is objected to, it must go upon the Calendar.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then I move that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN. I give notice that it is my purpose to present a report embodying the views of the minority of the committee.

GEORGETOWN GAS-LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to consider the bill to incorporate the Gas-Light Company of Georgetown, which was reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRIGHT. The bill is a long one, and unless Senators desire its reading, it will be unnecessary to go through with the whole of it. I will state that it is a copy of a bill of a similar character which passed for the benefit of this city. I hope no Senator will ask for its reading.

By unanimous consent the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. PRATT. I would inquire of the Senator whether this bill contains the clause of personal liability on the part of the stockholders for any debt which may be incurred by the corporation?

Mr. BRIGHT. It does to the amount of stock subscribed. The last section of the bill will explain that. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

"SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That each of the stockholders in the Georgetown Gas Light Company shall be held liable, in his or her individual capacity, for all the debts and liabilities of the said company to an amount equal to the capital stock held by them respectively: Provided, That such liability shall be confined to the stockholders who were such when such debts were contracted or liabilities incurred."

Mr. PRATT. I do not think the section is very clearly worded. I do not know whether the intention is to make a liability to the amount of the stock, and in addition to it, or whether it is only a statement of what would be the fact any how, that the stock should be liable for the debts. I presume that the intention is to make the individual stockholder liable for the amount of stock he holds—suppose him to hold $1,000 worth of stock, that that stock is to be first liable for debts, and then he is to be individually liable for one other $1,000.

Mr. BRIGHT. He is clearly not to be liable beyond the amount of stock he may own at the time the liability takes place. As I stated, this is a copy precisely of the charter which passed for the benefit of this city.

Mr. PRATT. Then I do not see the use of the section at all; for the stockholder would be liable to the extent of his stock any how.

Mr. BRIGHT. Then, as a matter of course, the Senator ought not to object to it. No injury can result to the stockholder if that be the proper interpretation given to the section.

Mr. PRATT. Everybody knows that to the extent of the stock of a corporation, in its corporate capacity, the corporators are liable. If the bill intends now to create an individual liability beyond that corporate liability, that is a question which I apprehend should be brought to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will state to the Senator that it does not, and was not so intended. Does the Senator object to the passage of the bill? If so, I must postpone its consideration until another day.

Mr. PRATT. I do not.

Mr. BRIGHT. Then I ask for its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. HAMLIN. This day was assigned for the consideration of the bill making indemnity for French spoiliations. There is, however, another special order on which I suppose the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] is ready to speak. I therefore only desire to give notice that I hope, in the morning hour, to-morrow morning, I may be able to ask and obtain a vote on the bill, or if not to-morrow, on the succeeding day.

WILLIAM SENNA FACTOR.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Last Friday we passed a bill for the relief of William Senna Factor. I observe that in the body of the bill the word "Billy" is used instead of William. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill may be amended by striking out "Billy" and inserting "William."

By unanimous consent, the amendment was ordered to be made.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE SENATE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that the House had receded from their 1st, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 7th amendments; had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to their 6th amendment, and insisted upon their 2d amendment to the bill of the Senate "to regulate the disbursement of the contingent fund of the Senate, and for other purposes."

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. CHASE to strike out from section 14 the words:

"—was superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, and—"

So that the clause will read:

"That the Constitution, and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Nebraska as elsewhere within the United States, except the eighth section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March 6, 1820, which is hereby declared inoperative."

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, it is not without embarrassment that I rise to debate any question in the Senate of the United States, for it is well known that I lay no claims to being a debater of general measures that come under consideration.

I have generally contented myself with the less ostentatious, but perhaps not less useful, duty of endeavoring to inform myself upon every question that presents itself, and attending to the affairs of the committees to which I belong, leaving others to debate such questions as may from time to time arise. But on the present occasion, sir, I should be doing violence to my own feelings, and I should be recreant in the duty which I owe to the great State which I in part represent, if I did not rise here, and endeavor, with what feeble powers I possess, to stay the progress of the measure now under consideration; for, in my judgment, there, never has been a measure of more serious import to the people of the United States. I hope it will be debated by abler men than myself; I hope the enormities of the proposition will be set forth in colors that cannot be misunderstood here or elsewhere; for it involves a question of good faith, which, in my judgment, is material to the perpetuity of the union of these States. It can involve no less a consideration; for I do not believe, after such an act of perfidy committed in any section of the country, or by all sections of the country, that this Union can long survive it.

I can remember when the Missouri compromise was entered into. I have some recollection of that period, though I was then a very young man, and I can remember how anxiously the people of that part of the country to which I belong looked to the progress of that question through Congress. I remember the fearful struggle that took place between the different sections of the country, and how anxious our forefathers were lest it should prove utterly disastrous to the union of the States which they then cherished. That was some thirty-four years ago; and the Missouri compromise has been regarded, so far as I know, from that time to this, as having a character not much less important or sacred than that of the Constitution itself. During all that period of time until the present, I have not known a man bold enough to come forward and question its propriety, or move its repeal. And why is that movement made now? When I came to this Congress I little thought that such a question would be precipitated upon the people. We passed through a sectional excitement, which some believed endangered the union of these States, in 1850. I had no serious apprehensions at that time; but many good men—many eminent statesmen, thought there was danger. The excitement, however, subsided, and good feeling was restored between all sections. A time of peace, we were told, had come; and for the four last years I have heard but little else from the political press than that these dangerous, difficult, and delicate questions had been all settled, to the mutual satisfaction of everybody, and were to be concurred in and abided by at all hazards. They were to be a finality; and were not to be questioned, here or elsewhere. In this all the Government organs concurred; and from day to day, I believe, all such papers have set forth the glories of the compromise of 1850, and hurled anathemas at any that should question its propriety in any particular.

Why is it, then, that at this time it is not only called in question, but a more sacred compromise, that lies far back, is called up and questioned, that it may be annulled? What has transpired? What new light has burst forth upon the people of the United States, that they come forward at this time and demand this great and hazardous measure? I should like to hear from the chairman of the Committee on Territories what new light has burst on these United States that requires this new clause in the bill which he reported? We all know that it is not a year since a bill to establish a territorial government in Nebraska passed very quietly through the House of Representatives, and came into this body; and that when the time of the Congress was cut short by the Constitution, the chairman of the committee was on his feet urging the Senate, at the top of his voice, to pass that bill. Did it occur to him then that the legislation of 1850 had superseded and annulled the great compromise of 1820? I heard no such statement at that time; but I heard the President of this body, the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. ARCHISON,] who lives in that section of the country, in his own person taking the benefit of that compromise. I recollect very well what he said upon the subject, and no man could be more vigilant than he was to find some crevice through which he could escape from the compromise. But he told you that he had considered it well; he told you that he had looked all around it, and he said he saw that it was all wrong. He affirmed that we had committed two great errors; first, when we permitted the ordinance of 1787 to be applied, and, secondly, when the Missouri compromise was passed; but he said these things are done, they are facts that are irremediable, and they must stand. I submit to them, for there is no getting out of them, and therefore I am willing to pass the bill.

I ask again, then, what new light has sprung up? I heard all that the chairman of the committee had to say on that subject, but I am still in darkness. Then why, sir, I again ask, has he introduced a clause which is calculated to excite the Union to madness? Can any reason be given for it that did not exist on the 4th of March last, when he was urging us to pass the bill without the exceptionable clause? No, sir; no, sir. If any such reason exists he has failed to tell us what it is. Whence shall we seek for knowledge, since the committee has failed to enlighten us? If no reason can be given, we may ask, what motive could prompt a step so hazardous? When men will not frankly disclose their motives, we are driven to an examination of their conduct; and we seek to satisfy our craving for knowledge by tracking out the manner in which they have arrived at their conclusions. If there had been any reason that would bear the light for the clause which is now exciting so much attention, might we not reasonably have expected to find it in the deliberate report that the committee had given us?

Mr. President, this conspiracy to overturn this old time-honored compromise, this old guarantee of liberty, is not yet six weeks old. It has been hatched somewhere within that time. I am not going to look back into the history of the opinions of the chairman of the committee, for I know that they have been exceedingly mutable. I know, at Chicago, some years ago, he preached a doctrine not precisely in accordance with what he has lately preached here. But that is entirely unimportant. I do not now pretend to show what his opinions are or have been; but here we have the authentic account of opinions, that some Senators entertained at the time the report was made.

Before I quote from this document, may I be permitted to ask whether they believed, at the time they made that report, that the legislation of 1850 superseded the old compromise of 1820? Did any such idea enter into their imagination? No, sir; not at all. They placed the bill that they then reported upon entirely different grounds; and although they had occasion to remark upon this same question, they said it was an important and delicate one, that eminent statesmen had not dared to touch, and they would not do it. That is the sense and spirit of what is contained in the report of the committee. They say, on these subjects:

"They involve the same grave issues which produced the agitation, the sectional strife, and the fearful struggle of 1850. As Congress deemed it wise and prudent to refrain from deciding the matters in controversy then, either by affirming or repealing the Mexican laws, or by an act declaratory of the true intent of the Constitution, and the extent of the protection afforded by it to slave property in the Territories, so your committee are not prepared now to recommend a departure from the course pursued on that memorable occasion, either by affirming or repealing the eighth section of the Missouri act, or by any act declaratory of the meaning of the Constitution in respect to the legal points in dispute."

That, Mr. President, is what that committee thought about four weeks ago. They had no doubt deliberated upon this subject, and in this report we have the joint wisdom of the whole committee embodied, so far as we know, for I have heard no dissent from it. They reported a bill in accordance with that opinion; and is it not strange, unaccountably strange, that these experienced genplemen, statesmen, and Senators should have entirely changed their ground, and assigned no reason for the change? Within less than twenty days afterwards they get the bill recommitted to themselves, but they have made no additional report. They do not tell us why they have changed their minds, or that any extraordinary occurrence has authorized the change which has been made in the amended bill, which now contains the very provision which they before stated they carefully refrained from touching. But, sir, notwithstanding their extraordinary silence, they have discovered that the legislation of 1850 had, in some mysterious manner, superseded the most stern and stubborn law of Congress, which was formed upon a compromise as sacred as could be made between conflicting sections of this Union, and concurred in on all hands for at least one third of a century; and yet they flippantly tell us that it is all overturned, all superseded by the compromise legislation of 1850, and hence they embodied this provision in their bill, and ask for its passage. Now, as a lawyer, I hardly know what a man means when he tells me that an act of legislation is superseded by a principle. I thought it took an act of Congress to repeal, or annul, or suspend, a former act. I did not understand how that could be done by a principle. I do not know, however, but there may be some new means discovered by which a stubborn law of Congress—one of the most solemn acts of legislation, hardly less solemn than the Constitution of the United States itself—may be annulled, and repealed, and suspended, by a principle which some gentlemen pretend to have found in the legislation of 1850, called "the compromise;" legislation in which not a single principle can be made out, as I will attempt, very soon, to show.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I can save the gentleman the necessity of arguing upon a point upon which he is evidently laboring under a misapprehension. I stated distinctly, the other day, that my position was: That so far as the country covered by the Missouri compromise was embraced within the limits of Utah and New Mexico, the acts of 1850, in regard to those Territories, rendered the Missouri compromise inoperative, and that so far as the territory covered by the Missouri compromise was not embraced in those acts, it was superseded by the great principle then established. In other words, I contend that by the acts of 1850 a great principle of self-government was substituted for a geographical line; and hence, by the use of the words "superseded by," I mean which was "inconsistent with" the compromise of 1850. If the gentleman prefers the words "inconsistent with," I will put them in with a great deal of pleasure, and that will avoid all the trouble in regard to the use of the word "supersede."

Mr. WADE. The Senator made a very simple declaration in his speech upon this point, and I have it here. After all the verbiage of the speech of the honorable Senator from Illinois, it is summed up finally in one idea, and he says so himself. He says upon this point:

"Sir, in order to avoid any misconstruction, I will state more distinctly what my precise idea is upon this point. So far as the Utah and New Mexico bills included the territory which had been subject to the Missouri compromise provision, to that extent they absolutely annulled the Missouri compromise. As to the unorganized territory not covered by those bills, it was superseded by the principles of the compromise of 1850. We all know that the object of the compromise measures of 1850 was to establish certain great principles, which would avoid the slavery agitation in all time to come. Was our object simply to provide for a temporary evil?" &c.

That, he says, was his precise idea. It was that the Missouri compromise was annulled to the extent to which Congress, in running the boundary lines of New Mexico and Utah, might take for the sake of convenience any little piece of territory which was covered by the Missouri compromise. That certainly was a truism; but the idea that the acts to organize Utah and New Mexico repealed or superseded the Missouri compromise as to the remainder of the territory acquired by the Louisiana cession, is an idea from which I am glad to see that the gentleman now recedes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not at all.

Mr. WADE. Well, the Senator says he does not recede from his former position. What does he mean, then, by saying that the Missouri compromise was superseded by the principles of the compromise measures of 1850? Suppose you run a line with your neighbor, and the line has become uncertain, and in order to straighten it you run another, and in running this other line may possibly take in a little land that belonged to him, or you may leave out a little belonging to yourself; but you make a line, and then after you straighten it, if you find you entered wrongfully on his land, the principles of running that line superseded his title to the balance, and therefore you can lay title to the whole of his land, if I understand the gentleman; for he says he does not recede from the positions taken in his bill—not in his report, for it is said there he never would give such an opinion. He informed us, in the report, that there was a matter too grave even for Congress to decide, and much too grave for a committee, and therefore they would not do it; and yet in nineteen days afterwards they come in with what is equivalent to a total repeal of the compromise.

Now, Mr. President, I want to know if that act was superseded, if that legislation was inconsistent with this, or if it furnished any occasion—when all sections of the country are at peace, when everything is progressing to the satisfaction of all, and a state of entire good feeling between all sections happens to exist—for throwing a firebrand in here at this time? I know not what the motive can be. I care but little what it is. The deleterious effects of this attempt to repeal that compromise will be felt, not only now, but long after the present generation are in their graves.

I will not answer for the consequences of the legislation of this day, sir; but I anxiously desire to inquire if nothing can be established in this Government? Is there nothing too sacred to be overhauled for some miserable party or other purpose?

Who was it that had the settlement of the Missouri compromise at the time it was made? Was it done by statesmen inferior to those of the present generation? I think not; for there were giants in those days, as great as those of the present. There, sir, stood John C. Calhoun in the Cabinet, advising upon that act. There, too, was Mr. Crawford, and there was Mr. John Quincy Adams. I think that they might, with reasonable propriety, be adjudged to comprehend the work they were doing.

Again I say to my friends from the South, who with me have fought many a political battle shoulder to shoulder—though far distant from each other—who have triumphed in a mutual triumph—even though we failed to elect your great chief, [referring to Mr. Clay,] when we attempted to elevate him, as he deserved, to the highest office in the world, that he, too, took part in this compromise, and I am mortified to see that his successors here are endeavoring to blot out the work that his patriotism had performed. Why, sir, he is scarcely in his grave before another generation comes up that knows not what he had done, and some even pretend that in what he himself did, in 1850, he seemed to concede that the compromise of 1820 was not to be lived up to. I was not here in 1850, but I have read the debates of that period, and I have endeavored to inform myself on that subject; and I tell the gentlemen, notwithstanding all they may argue and all they may say on this subject, there is not a word, nor a syllable, that goes to indicate that any one supposed that anything was done then to overthrow the time-honored compromise of 1820. Not one word, sir; but, on the contrary, if they could recur to this compromise, they indorsed it and reaffirmed it in 1850 beyond all gainsaying. No doubt of it. Sir, I was amazed when I heard the chairman of this committee stand forth here, and pretend that in some manner the legislation of 1850 had superseded the compromise of 1820, and that the Missouri line was blotted out, or repudiated; when, on the contrary, so careful were they in all their legislation not to touch it at all, that they referred to it in terms, and reconfirmed and reestablished it. I will not take up the time of the Senate by reading that provision, although I have it here, for I presume every one has read it. By the resolutions annexing Texas, the Missouri compromise line was alluded to, and in terms maintained. The provision was, that in the territory above 36° 30' there should be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except for the commission of crime. Those resolutions expressly referred to the line of 36° 30' as the Missouri compromise line. Then to make assurance doubly sure, in the compromise bill organizing New Mexico, that legislation is referred to, and it is said there shall be nothing so construed as to impair that clause. So far, then, from overturning it, or superseding it in any possible way, they most deliberately turn their attention to it, and for fear any construction of the kind might be drawn, such as the Senator now sees fit to draw, they made a stern provision against it.

But, sir, I need not refer further to the speech of the Senator from Illinois. My colleague [Mr. Chase] so entirely pulverized that speech that there is not enough of it left upon which a man can possibly hang an idea. [Laughter.] In fact, there was nothing to begin with; and surely there is nothing left of it. It was a bare afterthought, permit me to say. After the report of the committee had been made, and the bill had been altered, it was necessary to get up some other reason or pretext than was set forth in the report, in order to show why it was proposed to repeal the Missouri compromise. I do not like to be uncharitable—I do not like to be compelled to argue in that way; but when I see these crooked tracks, what inference can I draw? Most assuredly, that the committee had no determinate, settled purpose as to the necessity of altering this compromise when they first reported. They had no good and sufficient reason to propose a repeal of it; for if they had they would have said so at once. Now, how are we to view this matter? Can we view it in any other light?

Here is a Territory large as an empire; as large, I believe, as all the free States together. It is pure as nature; it is beautiful as the garden of God. There is nothing now to prevent us doing with it what will minister to the best interests of the people now and hereafter. Our forefathers expressed their opinion as to what was best to be done with it. They believed it should be fenced up from the intrusion of this accursed scourge of mankind, human slavery. They have done this effectually in this Territory. Shall we undo their work? The southern States have had the benefit of the Missouri compromise, and I now appeal to my southern Whig friends whether we of the North did not pledge our constituents that you were honorable men; that you would stand by all the guarantees of the Constitution, and all the duties which properly devolve upon you; and that, above all, the chivalry of the South would never be attempted, by any fancied or real interest, to abandon the terms of any compact, when they had received the benefit on their side, and when its terms remain to be fulfilled by them.

This is a doctrine which I have frequently preached. My amazement was very great when I heard that any of these gentlemen were in council with the enemy. I feared that something had taken place which ought not to have taken place. I felt strong in heart to appeal to them against any fancied interest which they might conceive themselves to have, for their duty is plain and palpable. Did not our forefathers make a compact? Did they not make it after a fearful struggle which was dangerous to this Union? I say, was there not such a compact made? And in the whole history of our legislation, I appeal to you, has there ever been one more sacred or more binding upon you? Have you, southern Senators, not had the full benefit of it? Have you not enjoyed it now for thirty years? Has any northern man stepped forward to impair your rights in that compromise? No, sir, it is not pretended; and now the period is drawing near when that part of this great bargain which is beneficial to us at the North is approaching, and I call upon you as honorable men to fulfill it. Shrink not from it. Do not tell me that your constituents will not sanction you in doing what you know to be right. I believe that your constituents are honorable men. I believe they will understand the motives which impel you to do your duty, notwithstanding you might have some fancied influence the other way. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Dixon] told us that this came from the North, and therefore the South were absolved from their obligation. I must say I think you understand well that the North know nothing about this base conspiracy to betray them. When did it come up? Did you let it go before the people, that they might pass upon the question? Why, sir, in the Presidential election, triumphant as the Democracy were, I ask any gentleman of the North, suppose you had staked the election of Mr. Pierce upon this question, how many votes could he have received in the North? Not one. You gave us no notice of any such thing. The people of the North, even now, do not know what nefarious projects are afoot here in the Capitol. You of the South are not absolved, because one or two men, very honorable men, stand forth here and say "I am ready to go in and make this monstrous proposition." Sir, in the days of the Revolution, Major Andre was hung by the neck until he was dead, for accepting a proposition not more base than this, which is a gross betrayal of the rights of the whole North. And yet that is the only reason which the Senator from Kentucky gives why he should vote for this bill. He will not pretend to tell us that he would abrogate and violate the great pledge which has been kept on the part of the North, unless northern men stood here authorized, as he thinks, to relieve them from that pledge. I tell him that they are not authorized to do any such thing. I tell him that those whose agents they are, know nothing about this, and do not know what treason to the North is hatching here.

My colleague stated the other day that it was a matter of fact, which everybody knew, that the peculiar interest which we had at the North to prevent slavery encroaching upon this great Territory, is, that the moment you cover it over with persons occupying the relation of master and slave, the free man of the North cannot go there. He announced that great truth in this body. Gentlemen know it to be a truth, and they do not gainsay it. Gentlemen know that the high-minded free man of the North, although not blessed with property, has nevertheless a soul, and that he cannot stoop to labor side by side with your miserable serf. He never has done it—he never will do it. It was an unlucky word from the gentleman from Kentucky when he said, if he cannot labor in that way, let him go somewhere else. Is that the democracy of the Chairman of the Committee on Territories? Let him tell the yeomanry of Illinois—the hard-fisted laboring man of that great State—that this is the principle upon which he acts; that this Territory is to be covered over with slaves and with masters, and that his proud constituency are to go out there and work side by side, degrading themselves by working upon a level with your miserable slaves. Let him do so, and it is a declaration which I think will tingle in the ears of Democracy, and the people will come to understand that you are legislating for the privileged aristocracy of the South, to the exclusion of the whole North.

How is this? We are told that the slaveholder must go into this Territory. Why? Because, says the gentleman from Kentucky, it belongs to the States, and those who hold slaves have just as good a right to immigrate into it and take their property with them, as any other person has. Now, we have seen that these two interests are antagonistical; they cannot both stand together. If you take your slaves there, I tell you the proud laborer of the North, although he has no capital, except his ability to draw from the earth his support by honorable labor, will never consent to work side by side with your miserable serf and slave. Then, there being an antagonism between these two principles, which is greatest in numbers? According to the present census, all the slaveholders in the United States do not amount to four hundred thousand. What number of free laborers are there who ought to have the benefit of this great Territory? Probably fully thirteen millions are to be offset against about four hundred thousand. If you take any considerable number of slaves into this Territory, you as effectually blast and condemn it for all the purposes of free immigration as though you should burn it with fire and brimstone, as Sodom and Gomorrah were once consumed. Every man understands this.

Immigration does not go into slave States. Immigration cannot abide there. But is there any constitutional difficulty upon this subject? Senators from the South say they can go into this Territory and take their property with them. Now why should they be let in there with what they call their property? Am I obliged, as a member of the Government of the United States, to acknowledge your title to a slave? No, sir, never. Before I would do it, I would expatriate myself; for I am a believer in the Declaration of Independence. I believe that it was a declaration from Almighty God, that all men are created free and equal, and have the same inherent rights. But, thank God, the Government of the United States to which I belong does not anywhere compel any man to acknowledge the title of any person to a slave. If you own him, you own him by virtue of positive law in your own States, with which I have nothing to do, and with which I never have had anything to do. Sir, I hear the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] talking to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DIXON,] and I wish it to go forth that the gentleman from South Carolina says, why should not the free laborer work with the slave? Is he not his equal? Is that the opinion of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir; and your associate, too, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. DIXON. The Senator, if I understood him, said he was a believer in the Declaration of Independence, and in the doctrines of God, which declare that all men are equal. Does the Senator mean that the slave is equal to those free laborers that he speaks of in the North?

Mr. WADE. Go on.

Mr. DIXON. I desire him to answer that question.

Mr. WADE. Certainly; certainly. The slave, in my judgment, is equal to anybody else, but is degraded by the nefarious acts and selfishness of the master, who compels him, by open force and without right, to serve him alone. That, sir, is my doctrine. When you speak of equality before the law, or equality before the Almighty God, I do not suppose you [addressing himself to Mr. DIXON] stand one whit higher than the meanest slave you have. That is my judgment, and probably it is the judgment that you will understand in the last day, though you will not understand it before.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator allow me to ask another question?

Mr. WADE. Yes, sir; as many as you please.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator consider the free negroes in his State as equal to the free white people?

Mr. WADE. Yes. Why not equal? Do they not all have their life from Almighty God; do not they hold it of his tenure? When you speak of wealth, riches, and influence—if that is what you mean—they are generally poor, without influence, perhaps despised among us as well as with you; but that does not prevent that equality of which I speak. I say, in the language of the Declaration of Independence, that they were "created equal," and you have trampled them under foot, and made them apparently unequal by your own wrong. That is all there is of it. That is my doctrine. I do not go into the States, be it known; I never went there to ask any questions of you; but I believe your legislation is all wrong, and as wrong for you, even, as it is for your slaves; for when I contrast the prosperity of the States where this wrong and outrage is indulged in with the prosperity of those where the free and just principles of the North prevail, what is the manifestation of these principles upon the apparent welfare of the societies in which they prevail? This is a question which, if it were not involved in this controversy, I should not argue at all; for I do not wish to do anything which will excite ill feeling here; but I cannot shrink from anything that is pertinent to the issue. The question is whether, in that fair field, large as a continent, we shall now plant human slavery; or whether we shall leave it as our forefathers left it—fenced off forever hereafter. That brings up the whole question. If slavery is right—if it comports with the best interests of mankind, slavery unquestionably should be fostered, encouraged, and upheld by our legislation. I am with you there, if you will meet me upon that issue. If you will make it appear that your principle works better than ours, let us not only carry it into Nebraska, but let us carry it to the ends of the earth; let us send missionaries out to herald forth the blessings of human slavery, and introduce it into countries where it does not now exist, if you can find such. I am for doing the greatest good to mankind.

But how is this? Look at the Old Dominion herself. It is not more than sixty years ago, hardly has the age of one man passed away since the Old Dominion was a head and shoulders higher, in every particular, than any State in this Union, not only in the number of her population, but in her riches and wealth, and the importance of all that pertained to her. Why, sir, at the time your Constitution was framed, so apparent was this that Edmund Randolph, I think it was, refused to sign the Constitution of the United States, alleging as a reason that it was all wrong. The State of New York, said he, will have as much influence in the Senate of the United States as Virginia itself, under this Constitution. It is all wrong. The small States will be on a par with the large States. It ought to be grounded, either upon property, or upon the number of white male inhabitants.

That is what he said at the time, and that was the condition of things at the time. Now look on old Virginia. Does she not lie in the fairest part of this continent? Is there any other State that exceeds her in the fertility of her soil, in the salubrity of her climate, in all that pertains to the material welfare of man? No State in this Union probably could compare with her. And now, during one age of man, how does she rank according to the last census? Why, from number one she has sunk to number five. What has produced this? That great statesmanship of which she boasts so much, and upon which she sometimes, as I think, takes airs to herself? Is that the principle? Have your principles of statesmanship advanced you thus? Why, sir, your statesmanship is Africanized, and you want to Africanize this whole Territory. That is what you are after; and if it is right, you should do it. But, really, the policy of this Government now differs but a little from what it is in Africa, from Guinea to Timbuctoo. We are about the same in principle. There they are opposed to any general system of internal improvement; they are opposed to any general system of education. I do not know that they carry it quite as far as they do in some other places, where they whip and imprison women who undertake to teach the poor. I am not quite certain that they undertake to carry it to that extent; but, nevertheless, so far they go side by side; and when you come to raising children for the market, they can vie well with each other. But they seek to extend the market for human beings; and hence the object of this bill. Their object is to enhance and extend this market; and I say it does not consist with the welfare of this Union to do so. I say that to fill the interior of this continent with that kind of chattels is to blast the fairest prospects of every man who has ever entertained the highest hopes of the progress of his country, and hence it is that I stand here as one to oppose it.

You may call me an Abolitionist if you will; I care but little for that; for if an undying hatred to slavery or oppression constitutes an Abolitionist, I am that Abolitionist. If man's determination, at all times and at all hazards, to the last extremity, to resist the extension of slavery, or any other tyranny, constitutes an Abolitionist, I, before God, believe myself to be that Abolitionist. So I was taught, and I shall not probably very soon swerve from the faith of my forefathers in this particular. It is idle to cry "Abolition" to me. To me it is an honorable name. Not, sir, that I ever went with that particular party; but I did not differ from them on these points; but because they did not make their opposition effectual, in my judgment; for I would have gone with those who would have reached your institutions, wherever the Constitution gave us a right to reach them, without trenching one hair's breadth where we had no right. There I do not undertake, and never shall undertake, to trench, upon them. I admit that in the States you have full control over it. You may do with it as seems to you good. You never found me, you never found the party to which I belong in the North, pretending to do anything adverse to your right to make such laws and regulations with regard to this institution as you please. We hoped, like all other men, that you would see that the system did not work to your best advantage; we were in hopes you would see that a gradual system of emancipation, just such as made the vast difference between the progress of the State of New York and old Virginia, would wake up every sensible man to follow in the track, and to do likewise. We hoped that, but we claimed no right to interfere. You must do with this as seems to you good.

I regret, Mr. President, that this question has arisen here now, for I believe all will bear me witness that I have not been factious here. From the first day I took my seat in this body, resolutions touching slavery, in a manner exceedingly offensive to men of the North, were urged upon us day after day, week after week, and month after month, well calculated to stir the blood of a northern man, and yet I sat under it. While it was a matter in the abstract, I cared nothing about it. Your finality resolutions that were debated here so long, all that you could say here or elsewhere, your determinations to resist all agitation of this subject, never stirred me to opposition; but when you come in here, by law attempting to legalize slavery in half a continent, and to bring it into this Union in that way, and when, in doing so, you are guilty of the greatest perfidy you can commit, I must enter my indignant protest against it. Sir, what will be the consequence of passing this bill? Does not any man see that its first effect will be to render all future compromises absolutely ridiculous and impossible? for if one as solemnly entered into as this, as faithfully lived up to as this, shall be thus wantonly broken down, how, when a matter of difference again arises between us, shall we compromise it? Shall we have any faith in each other? No, sir; no. Where is your compromise of 1850? Why it is just as effectually gone as the compromise you now seek to repeal. They both stand together. One guarantees the other. They are linked together by the same legislation. To repudiate one is to repudiate both. And do you believe, sir, that we shall keep our hands off that portion of the legislation of 1850 upon which the South now relies as giving an equal chance for slavery in New Mexico and Utah, and which is exceedingly offensive to the North, as that was free country when we conquered it? Suppose a prodigious excitement pervades all the northern States. Suppose they come in here to say to the South: "You have led the way in repudiating compromises, and, as there is no further trust to be reposed in one section of the country or the other, we sternly demand a repeal of all those laws which are for your benefit, as you have gone foremost in doing away with that portion which were made for us." What shall then be said? What plea can you put in to me, when I come here backed by my constituents, demanding that now, inasmuch as the South have come up as one man and have taken away all the guarantees on which we and our forefathers relied to guard this great domain against the encroachments of slavery, inasmuch as it has been ruthlessly trampled under foot by a few treacherous men not consulting with their constituents, that you shall repeal all the compromise laws, the fugitive slave law included, which you hold of consequence to you? Has any northern man offered such a proposition? I know you complained that we do not submit with as much resignation to your fugitive bill as you would be glad to see. Well, sir, we do not. I agree to that. Why do we not? It is because the northern mind, imbued with the principles of liberty, is unable to see the force of your claim and title to the slave. I grant that the Constitution of the United States contains what you call a compromise; but it is scarcely more sacred than the one under consideration. So far as the inclinations of the people will go, so far as their feelings will go, you have a faithful execution of that law; but if you demand that against which human nature itself revolts, you must take it with such objections as naturally will arise. In general your law has been enforced; but what will be said when you have thrown down the gauntlet on the other side, and told us that compromises for our benefit mean nothing at all? Have you not got now three slave States out of the Louisiana purchase nearly as large as the rest of that territory, and are you not enjoying it? Has any man from the North ever said it should be taken from you? No, sir; not a lip of it, not a word of it. Is not freedom to be considered as well as slavery?

But, sir, I would rather put this question on broader principles than these compacts, sacred as they are, and from which no man who violates them can escape with honor. However, as I have intimated already, this is a great question of human rights. Now, if there is not really any difference between liberty and slavery, then all that our fathers have done; all that the Declaration of Independence has set forth; all the legislation in England and in this country to further and guarantee the principles of human liberty, are a mere nullity, and ought not to be lived up to. This may be so, but we have been taught differently.

Gentlemen have argued this question as though it were a matter of entire indifference whether the continent is to be overrun with slavery, or whether it is to be settled by freemen. I know that those who hold slaves may have an interest in this question; but when you consult this matter in the light of States, or communities, there can be but one answer to it. If there is any other, as I said before, if both are to stand and fare alike, then human liberty is a humbug, and tyranny ought to be the order of the day. But, Mr. President, this is also an exceedingly dangerous issue. I know the Senator from Kentucky said he did not think there would be very much of a storm after all. He was of opinion that the northern mind would immediately lie down under it, that the North would do as they have frequently done, submit to it, and finally become indifferent in regard to it. But I tell the gentleman that I see indications entirely adverse to that. I see a cloud, a little bigger now than a man's hand, gathering in the north, and in the west, and all around, and soon the whole northern heavens will be lighted up with a fire that you cannot quench. The indications of it are rife now in the heavens, and any man who is not blind can see it. There are meetings of the people in all quarters; they express their alarm, their dismay, their horror at the proposition which has been made here. You cannot make them believe that the thing is seriously contemplated here. How is it? You of the South, all of you, propose to go for repudiating this obligation. Do you not see that you are about to bring slavery and freedom face to face, to grapple for the victory, and that one or the other must die? I do not know that I ought to regret it, but I say to gentlemen you are antedating the time when that must come. It has always been my opinion that principles so entirely in opposition to each other, so utterly hostile and irreconcilable, could never exist long in the same Government. But, sir, with mutual forbearance and good will, with no attempt on either side to take the advantage of the other, perhaps we might have lived in happiness and peace for many years; but when you come boldly forth to overthrow the time-honored guarantees of liberty, you show us that the principles of slavery are aggressive, incorrigibly aggressive; that they can no more be at ease than can a guilty conscience. If you show us that—and you are fast pointing the road to such a state of things—how can it be otherwise than that we must meet each other as enemies, fighting for the victory; for the one or the other of these principles must prevail.

I tell you, sir, if you precipitate such a conflict as that, it will not be liberty that will die in the nineteenth century. No, sir, that will not be the party that must finally knock under. This is a progressive age; and if you will make this fight, you must be ready for the consequences. I regret it. I am an advocate for the continuance of this Union; but as I have already said, I do not believe this Union can survive ten years the act of perfidy that will repudiate the great compromise of 1820.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate upon this subject. Perhaps I have said all that I have to say upon it. I wished to enter my protest against this act. I wished to wash my hands clean of this nefarious conspiracy to trample on the rights of freemen, and give the ascendancy to slavery. I could not justify my course to my constituents without having done so to the utmost of my ability; and having done so, I shall leave this issue to you to say whether it is safe, right, and reasonable for any fancied advantage, to incur such enormous perils.

I know gentlemen think all is calm, and I know they will preach peace. I wish there was real peace, for I do not delight in contention. I have endeavored not to be a contentious man here. I have endeavored even to abide by your compromises, which I did not exactly like.

But I have overlooked one thing that I ought to have said. The Senator from Illinois deduces some great principles from the compromises of 1850. So he says in his speech. Now, from the very nature of those compromises, it was all but impossible that any particular principle could be deduced from them. There were several antagonistical subjects, about which there was dispute; and, indeed, there can never be much of a principle drawn from a compromise of antagonistical principles. That is not the place to fix a principle. There was California—she had adopted a constitution, and sought to be admitted into the Union. Here was Texas wishing to have her boundary adjusted with New Mexico. Here was the District of Columbia, in which the North contended that slave-markets should be abolished.

Perhaps there were no two men who agreed in all these propositions. Some were for permitting California to be admitted into the Union. The whole North thought it ought to come in; but did you then stand upon the doctrine of non-intervention? Here was a State organized with a free constitution, knocking at your doors for admission. Where, then, was this great doctrine of non-intervention in the South? Where did it find any advocates then? Why, sir, the State of Georgia, I recollect, passed her resolutions, and among other points which she said would justify her in dissolving the Union, one was the admission of California into the Union. There, sir, was non-intervention with a vengeance! The whole South stood in opposition to her entering this Union with a free constitution. Was that non-intervention? And yet the gentleman says, one great principle that he deduces from the legislation of 1850 is non-intervention. So far from that, I should suppose it was intervention of the very highest character, to shut a State out of this Union, to resist her approach here as long as it could be done, and never to yield to it till some consideration could be given for it. A principle of non-intervention, says the gentleman, growing out of such a state of things as that! But, the gentleman also said that he offered to extend the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific, and he says the anti-slavery feeling rejected it, and therefore he is going to take vengeance upon us, and come up into the North with his slavery doctrine. How was that? The Missouri compromise was a restriction upon slavery; but the territories which we acquired from Mexico were already, by a decree of Mexico, free from slavery; therefore your line, when you proposed it, was to extend slavery, not to restrict it. There is no analogy in the principles at all. One restricted slavery, and the other extended slavery. What would be said of me if I should undertake to deduce a principle from the action of Congress in 1850 in respect to the District of Columbia? You abolished the market for slaves here, and declared that they should not be brought into the District for sale. Then I might say, on the gentleman's doctrine, that you had settled a great principle; that you should not have slave-markets anywhere else, and it would be just as logical as the principles which the gentleman deduces from some other of those compromise measures. The fact was, that there were a great many real or fancied interests antagonistical to each other; and while hardly any man agreed as to the settlement of them all, they got together, as men settle other controversies—they undertook to arbitrate and to compromise. Although they did not agree to any one thing in particular, they said, we will take these measures as a whole; they are the best we can do, and therefore we will submit to them; and having submitted, we will abide by them.

The idea of a compromise of course presupposes that the disputing parties have not got all that they were contending for. How then can you deduce principles from such a state of things as that? No one thought of doing it, but one who was contending for the overthrow of even this last compromise, without giving any reason why he had done it; for I am sure if there was a reason adequate to such an exigency as this, it would be easy either to state it on paper or otherwise; but it has not been stated.

Mr. President, I will not prolong this discussion. In my desultory way I have said all, and more than all that I intended to say. I am satisfied with having entered my protest against this measure. If gentlemen adopt it, they must take it with all its perils. I trust freedom will ultimately come out of the conflict triumphantly.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. President, I had not desired or intended to trouble the Senate with anything which I could say upon this subject, and I greatly prefer now that some other gentleman should take the floor. I will yield readily and cheerfully to any of the friends of this bill, whether from the North or from the South, who may now wish to take the floor; but, sir, if no other Senator will rise now and enter his protest against the doctrines which have been proclaimed here to-day, there is at least one who dares to do it.

It must occur to you, Mr. President, and to every Senator upon this floor, that the speech of the Senator from Ohio, who has just taken his seat, is one of the most remarkable which has ever been delivered in the Senate of the United States. He is here representing, in part, one of the sovereignties of this Confederacy. He comes here to discuss a grave question, a question which he himself says involves nothing more nor less than the peace, quiet, and happiness of the country, and the very existence of the Union itself. Methinks a Senator thus impressed with the solemnity, and the vast importance of the question, would have approached it with calmness and deliberation, and a fixed purpose to investigate and ascertain the truth, and to come to just conclusions. But I submit to himself, and to you, sir, and to every Senator here, how far that gentleman has accomplished his purpose, and how far his speech went to elucidate any great principle, fact, or policy.

His speech from the beginning to the end, with the exception of a few flings at the committee, was a tirade of abuse and denunciation of an institution which has descended to us from the fathers of the Republic. Before he talked about the scourge and the curse of slavery, before he said that it was to go, with its contaminating touch, to mar the beauty of that garden of God, that Eden which he represents this Territory to be, he should have asked himself the question, from whence came this blighting curse? The fathers of the Republic—men, some of whom gave their lives and their fortunes, and pledged their sacred honor to the maintenance of the great principles on which this Government is predicated—are the authors of this pestilence, this curse, this blighting scourge, which the Senator thinks comes down like a sirocco from Heaven to wither and blast the fortunes of this great land. Sir, it seems to me that if the dead could rise from the grave, the spirits of those revolutionary sires and patriots would rise up with indignation to rebuke such an assault upon their memories.

The Senator says that this nefarious plan is to be consummated; and by what instrumentality, he inquires, is this great wickedness to be achieved? By a conspiracy as foul, as odious, as infamous, as any that is recorded in the annals of history. And who are the conspirators? Honorable Senators here, acting upon their own responsibilities—acting upon the same high responsibility upon which the Senator from Ohio acts—honorable Senators here who are alike responsible to the God who made them, and the Constitution which they have sworn to support, and to the great principles of human right and human liberty. They are accountable alike with the Senator from Ohio, to all the responsibilities that attach to honorable men. They are the conspirators against the honor, the peace, the dignity, and the perpetuation of these glorious institutions of ours. How far so gross an insinuation may comport with the courtesy due from one Senator to others, I leave that honorable Senator to judge for himself.

But, sir, he says there is one thing which strikes him with pain, astonishment, and regret. What is that? He turns to us upon this side of the Chamber, and tells us that in other days, which are past and gone, we stood side by side, shoulder to shoulder, fighting in a common cause. Yes, sir, we did; and I beg that honorable Senator to do me, and to do others, the justice to say, that, in that struggle, we never put our shoulders with his in an invasion against the rights of any portion of our common constituency and country. If he considered the association which has bound us together as members of the great Whig party to imply that I had any affinities with the doctrines which he proclaims here to-day, I now and forever eschew any such understanding, intention, or purpose.

I have fought with him, and I shall be proud to fight with him, for the great principles of the Whig party; but I utterly deny that it ever was, or ever can be, a principle of the Whig party, to inveigh against the institutions of the country which have descended to us from our fathers. I utterly repudiate and scorn, and—to borrow language from a source not the most reputable—I spit upon and despise any such doctrine as that, when applied to the Whig party. We have fought for the principles of the Whig party. I expect to fight for them as long as I am able to fight at all.

But the gentleman from Ohio says it must have been a strange spectacle to find Whigs associated with northern Democrats in caucus upon this great question. It may appear strange to that honorable Senator that gentlemen, differing on great and important subjects, may agree upon some one subject; and that, agreeing upon that one subject, they may, with propriety, meet and confer together, as patriots, upon that one question. It may be strange to the Senator, but I can tell him there is nothing remarkable in it. When the time comes for warring upon the chairman of the Committee on Territories as a politician, I hope to be ready to give him as many blows as the Senator from Ohio; but when that gentleman—I care not what may be his motives, I have nothing to do with his motives; they may have been selfish; they may have been unpatriotic; they may have been treasonable, or patriotic, I care not which—comes out for the right, I will stand by him, and vindicate him in the right, and no party lines, no party affiliations, no party tactics, no screw, or lash, shall ever force me into any other position.

There are, however, some very strange things in this world. There are some things which are stranger to my mind even than spiritual rappings, and I cannot comprehend them. When I heard the Senator from Ohio [Mr. CHASE] the other day in a well tempered, and I will do him the justice to say, an able speech, arguing this question, and when I heard him inveigh against any infringement upon the sacred principles of the compromise measures, I confess that I was somewhat astonished; and I was not prepared to suppose that the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE], who has addressed us to-day, would follow in the same channel. From hearing those honorable gentlemen vindicating the purity, the immaculate purity, the sublime perpetuation, and the obligation forever to hold those compromise measures sacred and inviolable, one would have been led to believe that they themselves were the boldest champions of some compromise somewhere and at some time. Why this holy reverence; why this profound, sacred, religious devotion on their part to compromises? Where and when did it arise? Will you pardon me, Mr. President, and gentlemen of the Senate, for reading a few lines by way of refreshing the memory of gentlemen. It is a very strange and extraordinary piece of history, and I think will strike the Senators from Ohio themselves with profound astonishment. Here is a proviso, which was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill at the first session of the last Congress:

"Provided, That no such allowance shall be authorized for expenses incurred in executing the act of September 18, 1850, for the surrender of fugitives from service or labor, which said act is hereby repealed."

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] offered that proposition at the long session of the last Congress; and who in this Senate Chamber do you suppose stood up, and upon their responsibility, before God and the country, voted to repeal one of the compromise measures of 1850? Certainly it was not the Senator from Ohio. No man could believe that after his speech, and his professed regard for compromises. But, sir, unfortunately for him, and unfortunately for his consistency, when the vote came to be taken upon that proposition, those gentlemen who are now standing up and worshipping with all the holy zeal of idolatry at the shrine of compromises, did what? Did they vote for the proposition to repeal the fugitive slave law? There were but four Senators in this body who did. Who were they? The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] the then Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] and both of the Senators from Ohio. And yet they talk about plighted faith! They talk about the sanctity and the inviolability of compromises; and here they are upon the record before God and the country as voting to repeal one of the compromise acts of 1850. I tell the gentlemen that before they come to read us lectures of morality upon the subject of adherence to compromises, they had better obliterate this record, for it stands out against them in bold relief. Consistency, consistency, whither hast thou fled!

More than this, the Senator from Ohio who has addressed us to-day, becomes really eloquent, and I will say patriotic, for I do not question his patriotism. I think upon this subject he is radically wrong; but it is not for me to question his patriotism. He tells us he sees a cloud in the northern horizon. It is now a little larger than a man's hand, but it is gathering and thickening; and I almost imagined from his description, that I saw the vivid angry flashes of the lightning of an indignant and outraged people. I certainly thought that I heard the deep-toned thunders of that muttering and swelling of the people which is to alarm, intimidate, and overwhelm the base conspirators who dare to molest the compromise of 1850.

When the Senator spoke to us about clouds, and storms, and tempests, and lightning, and hail, and rain, and all the terrors of the gathering tempest, he reminded me of a very profane verse which I once met with at the Mammoth Cave. I will repeat it here, not justifying its profanity, but saying that that part of the Senator's speech to which I refer reminded me most forcibly of it. I was once at the Mammoth Cave in Kentucky. It is a place which seems to impress everybody who visits it with a sublime idea, and with all the perceptions of poetry. Some man had been in the cave, and when he came out he went to the register and wrote down his views of the Mammoth Cave in these words:

MAMMOTH CAVE.

"God Almighty, what a spot!
In summer cold, in winter hot;
Ye Powers above; great God, I wonder!
—Andrew Jackson! hell, and thunder!"

[Laughter.]

This is the best commentary upon that part of the gentleman's speech which I ever saw. But then the gentleman became serious, and warned us of the danger which lies in our path. He says that if we intend to open this question, if we intend to provoke this war, the consequences shall be upon our own heads. I hope he did not mean to alarm us, and drive us from our propriety by force. When he spoke in this way I inquired of myself, is there danger now, and had we not better flee this Capitol at once? We are warned that if we provoke this war the consequences must be upon our own heads. What are those consequences? Certainly the Senator does not appeal to our personal fears. He is too respectful for that. Then he appeals to our patriotic fears, and to our devotion for the honor and interests of the country. I tell the Senator that though I may be of what he chooses to term a band of conspirators, I shall labor, as I ever have labored, to preserve the peace, the harmony, and the happiness of all these glorious States. I have never, by any word or act of mine, done anything to outrage the honor, to infringe the rights, or to wound the susceptibility of any portion of this country. I have never been sectional in my feelings. I have never been exclusive in my devotion to any particular section.

Sir, my honorable colleague will bear me witness, that through my whole political life I have been devoted faithfully and honestly to the vindication of the great principles of the Whig party—involving questions of policy which we knew and believed were not so essential to the interests of our immediate constituency, but which were deemed of vital importance to the interest and prosperity of the North. We have stood together and fought together for ten or fifteen long years to maintain and vindicate the rights and interests of the North. Now, I can tell the Senator from Ohio, and every Senator, and all men here and elsewhere, that we seek to make no aggression upon the North; but I tell him more, that we know our rights, and, knowing them, we mean to maintain them at all hazards and to the last extremity. Do not try to scare us out of them. Reason with us, if you will, but, for Heaven's sake, do not alarm us.

Mr. President, I was satisfied to let this question alone. As I told the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories, and as I have expressed myself everywhere when I have given my opinion upon this subject, I was content to let this matter stand as it was, because, in my judgment, there was nothing practical in it. I have never supposed that slavery was likely to go into the Territory which it is now proposed to organize; and although I have believed and believe now, that the restriction imposed by the act of 1820 was unequal and unjust, and ought never to have been adopted, yet, as it had been adopted, the South, as far as I know, were willing for the sake of peace, and for the sake of harmony, to bear this wrong, until such time as a returning sense of justice on the part of the North would induce them to do justice to their brethren of the South. I have looked forward to that time, and I thank God it has arrived. I thank God that period has come when the North has been aroused to a sense of the injustice which was inflicted on the South by the compromise of 1820.

It will not do for the Senator from Ohio, or for anybody else, to stand up and warn us against an infringement of this compact, as he is pleased to call it, and invoke the great names of the illustrious patriots of that day, who, in a self-sacrificing devotion to the honor of the country, and driven by a wild spirit of dark and bloody fanaticism, to lay on the altar of their country a portion of the rights of their constituency, for the sake of harmony, for the sake of peace, for the sake of the Union, and for the purpose of preserving the glorious institutions of the country; it will not do for that Senator to warn me and other gentlemen, by the shades of those departed sires. No man living reveres the names of those illustrious dead more than I do. I revered them when they were living, and I venerate them now that they are dead. But when I am called upon to act for myself; when I am called upon, on all my responsibility as a Senator, representing an honorable constituency, I must vote for myself, and not for the dead. It is no imputation on their memories to say that they were forced by a combination of circumstances to make this surrender on the altar of their country. It is no argument with me why I should do the same thing now, when there is no such necessity impending over us.

I should like to submit now a few questions to the Senators from Ohio. They, I suppose, recognize—indeed I do not apprehend that any sensible man can deny—the fact that the Constitution at the time of its formation did recognize the existence of slavery. Every man admits it. The Senator himself admitted it just now in his speech. The Constitution recognizes the existence of slavery, and a right of property in slaves. I wish to know from the Senator from Ohio how he can get rid of that provision? He says he does not propose to get rid of it, but proposes to leave that matter to the States.

Now, I have another proposition to submit to him. The Constitution maintains, from beginning to end, a perfect equality among all the citizens of the United States. It never intended that there should be a distinction between the people of New York and the people of South Carolina. The Constitution declares a perfect equality among the people of the different States of the Union. The right of property in slaves is recognized by the Constitution. A perfect equality among the citizens of the States is manifestly the intent throughout the whole Constitution. Then, again, the territories of the United States, purchased out of a common fund, by the expenditure of the common treasure, are declared to be the property of all the people of the United States. Now, putting these three facts together, let the Senator tell me how he can escape this constitutional question? Taking these three facts together, I ask the Senator to tell me what becomes of the principles of justice, when he turns round and says the people of the North will say to the people of the South, "You shall not enjoy an equal participation in this common territory?" If the gentleman can answer that question, I shall be happy to hear him.

The three propositions to which I have alluded are all contained in the Constitution; and yet the Senator charges the South, and the friends of this measure, with a conspiracy; nay more, he went so far as to say that it was an act of treason as dark and as atrocious as that of Arnold. Sir, was such a reckless declaration ever before made in the American Senate? The Constitution declares what are our rights; and when we ask for them, the Senator stands back and says, Here is a law passed thirty-three years ago; its age makes it venerable; and if you dare say in contravention of its provisions that you are equal to the other portions of the people of the United States, you are as guilty as Arnold, who perpetrated treason against his country. If you tell me that this compromise is a third of a century old, I tell you our rights are as old as the Constitution itself, for they are guaranteed by the Constitution.

But, sir, I should like to submit another question to the Senator from Ohio. He says that this curse, this terrible scourge of slavery, is to go into this fair Eden of Heaven; and he regards it as a great outrage upon the rights and the honor of the North. Now, I wish to know if the people of the North, under the Constitution, have any right to deny to me the enjoyment of the territory of the United States, which is the common property of the people of all the States? Can they deny to me the right to carry my property there? It will not do for the gentleman to appeal to a "higher law." It will not do for him to go back to the Bible, and say that this is not right. We are not sworn here to legislate ecclesiastically. If he wishes the question of right, settled in this way, let him go to the ecclesiastical courts. We are here to legislate under the Constitution of the United States, and according to the provisions of that Constitution. That is our power; that is the authority under which we act. Then the Senator says we have no power to carry our slaves to this Territory—that the interdict is right. I wish to know if he would submit to a restriction that he should not carry his property there?

Mr. WADE. Does the Senator wish an answer now?

Mr. JONES. Any time when it suits the Senator—now or when I am through.

Mr. WADE. The Senator can go on for the present.

Mr. JONES. I put that question to the Senator; I put it to every northern man. Have I not the same right to say that he shall not move into the territories of the United States with his particular property, as he has to say that I shall not move there with my property? If we were to propose that the man of Massachusetts should not carry his machinery there, what would the Senator from Ohio think of that? Would he not invoke the spirits of the dead to rise up in judgment against such an unholty exercise of power? Yet he asks us to submit, tamely to submit, to a restriction which he would scorn and spurn as an outrage on his rights.

But, sir, if Congress has power to say that slavery shall not exist in any Territory, by parity of reasoning they have the right to say that it shall exist there. Will the gentleman pretend to say that we could pass a law saying that slavery should exist there? He would resist that to the bitter end; but when we simply propose to say that it may or may not exist, according to the election of the people of the Territory, he denounces the proposition as a great innovation on the rights of the North. What right has the North in this territory more than the South? Did they pay more for it? Did they contribute more to it? Are they more responsible for it? Not a whit. We do not ask for anything but equality. If we are equal, we insist that we shall enjoy all the rights and all the immunities which belong to the condition of equality in this country; and we will maintain this demand.

There is another objection, in my mind, to the compromise of 1820. It is one to which I wish to call the particular attention of the Senator from Ohio. The Constitution of the United States declares that, "this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." Now, let us look for a single moment into the treaty under which this territory was acquired. I claim the attention of the Senate to one thing in the treaty, which has struck me with great force. I do not know whether it has occurred to other Senators or not; but there is an article in the treaty made between France and the United States, by which the very territory in dispute was ceded to this country, which declares:

"ART. III. The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

Here is a Constitution which declares that a treaty shall be the supreme law of the land, and here is a treaty in which it is positively declared that the rights of property should be respected in the Territory thus ceded. Slavery did exist in that very Territory at that time; and any law of Congress abrogating the treaty, is, in my judgment, null and void. The treaty declares that the inhabitants of the Territory shall be protected in the enjoyment of their property. Slaves were recognized as property, under the Constitution. The Constitution provides that the treaty shall be the supreme law of the land. How gentlemen can get around this point is something which I have not yet been able to perceive.

Both the Senators from Ohio, in answering the point made by the Senator from Illinois, who charged that the Missouri compromise was proposed to be extended throughout the Territories of the United States to the Pacific ocean, and which was rejected, by northern votes, excuse themselves by saying that slavery did not exist there at that time, and that, therefore, to interfere with it would be to legislate slavery into the Territories. If that argument is worth anything, it must work both ways. Those gentlemen excuse themselves for voting against the extension of the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific ocean, because at the time of the acquisition of the territory from Mexico, slavery did not exist there, and they would not agree to legislate it in there. Well, sir, slavery did exist at the time of the acquisition of the Territory of Nebraska, and you now propose to turn round and legislate it out. What sort of equality is it? What sort of frankness, fairness, liberality, or patriotism is manifested by such a course? You take shelter under that fact in one Territory, and turn round and deny it in another. If it justified you in voting against the extension of the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific, you admit that you violate that sacred principle in this Territory of Nebraska, where slavery did exist at the time of its acquisition, and where it was expressly provided that it should be protected.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. CHASE] who addressed us a few days ago, thought that it was very strange that this bill should be supported by members of both parties, who stood pledged to the Baltimore platforms, in which it was declared that the question of slavery was settled by the acts of 1850, and that all agitation upon the subject should cease. He arraigned the friends of this measure, by saying: You are here to violate that sacred pledge, and to agitate that question. Before that honorable gentleman, and those who act with him, can arraign us, they must first vindicate themselves. I want to know if either of the Senators ever concurred in those platforms? I want to know if either of them gave to those measures his assent or approval? Both of them may have acquiesced, but the record shows that they did not even acquiesce, because here is the recorded vote of each of them in favor of repealing one of those very compromise measures of 1850. But, sir, as for platforms, it matters not with me. I do not think there is any great virtue in platforms one way or the other. The only question before us now, is this: Is there a conflict between the compromise measures of 1850 and the compromise of 1820? I will not pretend that the compromise measures of 1850 repealed the compromise of 1820, because I do not think it is maintainable; but this is what I do assert and maintain, and what I think I can prove, that the spirit, the intention, and the principles of the compromise measures of 1850 are inconsistent with the act of 1820. In what does that inconsistency exist? It consists in this: The act of 1820 prohibits, not only during its territorial existence, but forever, the introduction of slavery into the territory north of 36° 30'. It is a perpetual, unending, undying prohibition. The whole spirit of the acts of 1850 declares that this is a question which the people themselves have a right to settle. The doctrine contained in the act of 1820 directly invades and positively infringes upon the rights and sovereignty of the States.

I have been endeavoring to satisfy the Senator from Ohio. I doubt very much whether I shall ever be able to convince him of his error. I should be most happy to do it, however. I should esteem it one of the proudest triumphs of my life if I could only break the fetters which seem to environ the mind of that honorable Senator, who, in all his personal relations, is one of the most estimable gentlemen I ever saw. I say I should esteem it a proud triumph if I should be able, by any means, to introduce a little light into his mind—to produce some enlargement of the generous feelings which I know he possesses on other subjects. But I confess I have very little hope of doing it. I have never known fanaticism to be cured by violence, by denunciation, or by any other means. It is one of those evils which, when it fastens itself upon the mind, and heart, and conscience, is as undying as the man himself. I have no hope, therefore, of convincing him; but I do hope to satisfy him of a few plain truths, the principal of which is, that the acts of 1850 are in spirit antagonistical to the doctrines of the act of 1820.

The compromise measures of 1850 are antagonistical to the act of 1820, in one great principle at least. The acts of 1850 accord to the States the right to settle this question under their constitutions; the other puts a perpetual and never ending interdiction on slavery. Again, by the act of 1820, in all that portion of country lying north of 36° 30', slavery is prohibited forever; no enjoyment of equal rights by the South was ever to be obtained there. The doctrine of non-intervention on the part of the Federal Government was not advocated at that time, and seemed then to find no existence in the public mind; but it pervades every part and parcel of the whole series of compromise measures of 1850.

The Senator says it is a monstrous outrage that, after we of the South have enjoyed our share of the contract, we shall now, when the time for the North to come in for their share has arrived, step forward and say, "No; you cannot do it." Will the honorable Senator tell me what the South have got by the compromise of 1820? They got no more than what the compromise measures of 1850 declared to be the inalienable right of the people in every State of the Union. The States which were formed out of the Louisiana cession came in with constitutions permitting slavery, which they had a right to do, and which the compromise measures of 1850 declared that all the States have a right to do. Not only have we not received more than we were entitled to, but we surrendered, by that act, a great deal to which we were entitled. In this vast territory, which the Senator himself says is an empire, slavery did exist, and was recognized by treaty previous to the act of 1820. We had no power to annul that treaty, and yet the Senator taxes us with injustice for accepting a relinquishment on the part of the North of what they had unjustly deprived us. He says it is a monstrous conspiracy on our part if we accept back the rights which were extorted from us thirty years ago by pretensions never founded in justice or equity.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I say to the Senator from Ohio, and to all men, that I have had no motive connected with this measure other than an honest desire to vindicate what I believe to be the rights and the interests of the people whom I have the honor, in part, to represent on this floor. "Tis strange, 'tis passing strange" to my mind that that honorable Senator should expect me, or any man representing the South, to refuse to accept an act of justice which has been long, long delayed. Sir, I can tell the honorable Senator, that if the storm which he seems to invoke does come—and it is one which I would deprecate—if one so unworthy as myself dare send up one political petition to the Throne of Heaven, it would be to preserve us from the wildness of reckless fanaticism, whether of the North or of the South, and to preserve pure, spotless, and untarnished, to the latest generation, this glorious inheritance of public liberty which we now enjoy.

I am as much devoted to the Union as any man. I have ever been devoted to it. I shall continue that devotion; but if we are to hold our position in the Union at the expense of our rights and of our honor, it would be a dearly-bought treasure. When gentlemen stand up here and inveigh against us, and against the South, and hold up their hands in holy wonder and astonishment at this outrage which is about to be committed on the North, and tell us it is treason to the North, my thoughts run back to the days of chivalry. When the gentleman spoke in such language, I went back, in my mind, to the days of the crusaders. I imagined that the gentleman saw some mighty spectre—some awful, terrible thing, coming down upon us. I thought that the hordes of the infidels were upon us—that they were entering this sacred Capitol—this holy sanctuary of American liberty, and were about, with sacrilegious hands, to lay hold of the ark of our political safety. I said to myself, peace, my friend, peace; peace, be still; be not alarmed. There are no hordes upon you. We intend to inflict no wrong upon you. We intend to take from you no right which you enjoy under the Constitution. All we ask—all we expect—all we hope for is, that you will recognize us as your equals. To ask from us to consider ourselves as less than your equals, would be to ask us to sign our own sign-manual to an article acknowledging our inferiority and our infamy. Sooner than do that, I would pray the God of Heaven that the earth might open and swallow me and mine in its deepest vortex. I have done, Mr. President.

Mr. WADE. The Senator from Tennessee propounded to me some questions which I had undertaken to answer in my previous remarks; but he did not seem to understand the argument which I attempted to make with regard to the prohibition of slaves entering into this Territory. I am aware that the territory was purchased by the United States, and belonged to the Government of the United States, and, of course, the United States had power to do with it as they saw fit. But I attempted to show to the gentleman—and he did not attempt to answer that at all—that the Constitution of the United States did not compel me to recognize a title in slaves. The Constitution always speaks of them as persons, never as property. They are slaves by virtue of the laws of the State or local jurisdiction where they are; and the moment they get out of that, as I understand the law of the land, they cease to be slaves.

Mr. BADGER. Unless they run away.

Mr. WADE. The Senator from Tennessee says that we aim at the South particularly. Not at all. Men in the northern States may own slaves, if they keep them in a jurisdiction where slavery exists. The Missouri compromise is not aimed at the southern States, but is aimed at a species of property which it was thought not proper to admit within this Territory.

The gentleman asks whether a law can be passed to prevent a man taking his property into the Territories? Why, certainly; we have such laws now. If I am a manufacturer of gunpowder, of fire-arms, or of whisky, I cannot take it into this Territory under the laws as they now exist. Congress, therefore, does make laws prohibiting persons from taking certain species of property into the Territories. It does not make any difference whether I live in a free State or a slave State, I cannot take those articles there. So if I happen to own slaves, no matter whether I live in Ohio, or Kentucky, or Tennessee, if this compromise is to stand as a law, I cannot take them there. It is not aimed invidiously at any one particular State, or particular person.

I believe now that I have answered all the questions to which the gentleman wished me to give an answer. I have given him my judgment, that the Constitution of the United States does not recognize slaves as anything but persons.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the Chair.) The question before the Senate is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. CHASE,] which is to strike out of section fourteen these words:

—"was superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, and"—

So that the clause will read:

"That the Constitution and laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Nebraska as elsewhere within the United States, except the 8th section of an act preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March 20, 1820, which is hereby declared inoperative."

Mr. DAWSON called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered.

Mr. CASS. I did not understand the amendment distinctly. I wish to know how the clause will stand with this amendment?

Mr. WALKER. It will then stand as a simple repeal of the act of 1820, without the recital that it has been superseded by the compromise measures of 1850.

Mr. BADGER. It is a repeal without a reason. That is all.

The question being taken, upon the amendment by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Cass, Chase, Everett, Fish, Foot, Hamlin, Seward, Smith, Stuart, Sumner, Wade, and Walker—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bright, Brodhead, Butler, Clay, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Hunter, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Norris, Pettit, Sebastian, Shields, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Toucey, Weller, and Williams—30.

Mr. WADE. I now move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert, as a substitute, the bill which was passed by the House at the last session; and on this amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The question now pending is upon the substitute offered by the committee. It is not in order to move to amend one substitute by inserting another in its place.

Mr. BADGER. The question before the Senate is on the substitute reported by the Senator from Illinois from the Committee on Territories, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot.) The Chair is aware of that fact, from the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois. The Chair was treating it as an original bill; but the question is still pending upon an amendment, in the form of a substitute for the original bill, reported by the Committee on Territories. That substitute, however, is open to amendment.

Mr. BADGER. Certainly; that is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The question on the adoption of my substitute will raise the very point involved in the proposition of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On that ground, the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, in the judgment of the Chair, is not in order as a substitute for the substitute which is now pending. Upon the rejection of that substitute, another might be offered; but the very question now pending is on agreeing to the substitute reported by the Committee on Territories for the original bill.

Mr. WADE. I call for the yeas and nays upon that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BADGER. I have been necessarily absent from the Senate during the earlier part of the day, and therefore I desire to know whether any amendment has been made this morning in the substitute reported by the Senator from Illinois from the Committee on Territories.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can inform the Senator from North Carolina that no amendment has been proposed, and therefore none has been voted upon except the one offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. CHASE,] which has just been rejected by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will ask the Chair whether, in the event that the substitute now pending shall be voted into the original bill, it will then be open to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Most clearly not, in the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. PETTIT. Then it must be subject to amendment now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Whatever amendment is to be offered to a substitute, must be incorporated into it before its adoption as a substitute.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I will now move an amendment to the same clause to which the Senator from Ohio moved his. I move to strike out the words "which was superseded by," and to insert in their place "which is inconsistent with." The clause will then provide that the Constitution and laws not locally inapplicable shall have the same force in the Territory as elsewhere, except the 8th section of the Missouri act, "which is inconsistent with the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, and is hereby declared inoperative." This is the express idea conveyed by the original words, but I prefer to make it plainer.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I am glad that the honorable Senator from Illinois has moved this amendment, because it will enable me to explain my position. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and against the clause in the bill as it now stands. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, because it conveys my idea; but the present language of the clause does not. The clause, as it now stands, asserts that the principles of the compromise measures of 1850 superseded the compromise of 1820, and is therefore inoperative. Now, I consider this an entire logical fallacy, and I have so explained to the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Douglas.] The principle of the compromise of 1850 does not supersede the compromise of 1820. It is not superseded at all, as a legal question. The action of Congress is required before it can be superseded. If a principle is established a law to-day—to wit: that whites shall vote in a Territory, and you establish the principle to-morrow that blacks shall vote in another Territory, you furnish a motive for the legislation, on the ground of wisdom and consistency, to adhere to it and carry out your principle; but you do not supersede the other; there is no superseding about it. Therefore, I wished to put out of the clause the provision saying that the principles of the compromise measures of 1850 superseded the compromise of 1820. Now, the honorable Senator has put it upon such grounds that I can support it. I do believe that the principle of the compromise measures of 1850 is inconsistent with the continuance of the compromise of 1820; but I could not vote for the other declaration, for the simple reason which I mentioned; that it led, in my mind, to a logical fallacy. To express my idea in a word, I would prefer that the Senator should say, in express terms, that the compromise of 1820 is declared null and void. That would be plain and unequivocal.

Mr. BADGER. It seems to me that there is some logical inaccuracy in the position of the honorable Senator from Michigan. He admits, if I understand him aright, that the legislation of 1850 was inconsistent with the Missouri compromise of 1820. If inconsistent with it, it certainly supersedes it; yet he says he is unwilling to vote for the declaration that it supersedes it, but he is willing to vote for a declaration that it is inconsistent with it.

Mr. CASS. I do not consider it as any logical error on my part, for this simple reason: The former act is not superseded at all, but is inconsistent with the latter, and the principle of the latter act now requires that the Legislature should carry out its latest action and be consistent. Nothing is superseded until there is some action by the Legislature. Legislative action is wanted, and the principles of the action of 1850 furnish the motive.

Mr. BADGER. Why, Mr. President, either the legislation of 1850 is consistent with the legislation of 1820, or it is not. If it is consistent with it, then it has no effect upon it. If the latter is inconsistent with the former, then the latter, being the latest act of legislation, succeeds the former, and overrides and annuls it. I do not mention this in any disposition to raise a question of this nature, but I would suggest to the Senator from Illinois, whether it would not be better for him to select some term which is free from the objections to either of these. Let him say the act of 1820 was inappropriate to, or unnecessary, after the legislation of 1850. Would it not be better to use some term of that kind?

Mr. CASS. I must confess, without recurring to that subject at all, that I had rather say at once that the compromise of 1820 is unconstitutional.

Mr. BADGER. That is another question.

Mr. CASS. I believe it is.

Mr. BADGER. I do not.

Mr. CASS. I always have believed so; and therefore I think it better to say so, if we believe so, and I desire upon my vote to say so. I can vote for the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Illinois without any difficulty.

Mr. DOUGLAS. We see that the difference here is only a difference as to the appropriate word to be used. We all agree in the principle which we propose now to establish. As this is a very delicate question, and as it is important to ascertain which is the exact and appropriate word, and as either of the phrases now suggested does not exactly suit my idea, I wish to take a little time to consult as to which word best suits the members of the Senate, to carry out the idea which we are intending to put into practical operation by this bill. If any one is ready to address the Senate to-morrow, he can now obtain the floor; otherwise I shall move that the Senate adjourn, with a view of proceeding to vote to-morrow morning upon this question; but I shall myself respond to such attacks as have been made upon the bill. If any other gentleman proposes to take the floor, I prefer that he should do so now, in order that we may know who is entitled to it in the morning.

Mr. HUNTER. I rise to suggest to the Senator from Illinois that he should postpone his motion to adjourn until we can take up, by general consent, a bill of the Senate which has come back from the House, in relation to the mode of paying the members of the Senate. I ask the general consent of the Senate to take up that bill now.

Mr. BADGER. Let it stand until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will require the unanimous consent to proceed with that bill at this time.

Mr. WALKER. For the purpose mentioned by the Senator from Virginia, I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow. It will then come up at one o'clock as the special order.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to say, before the question is taken upon that motion, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois, that it shall be with the understanding that the question on the passage of the bill shall be taken to-morrow, that whatever other gentlemen may do, I shall desire to make some remarks upon the subject under consideration.

Mr. STUART. I will ask the leave of the Senate to make a remark—not that I am not satisfied with the vote which I have given, because I always intend to vote so that it shall not need explanation; but as it has been suggested that there is no difference between declaring that the legislation of 1850 is inconsistent with the legislation of 1820 upon this subject, and in declaring that that of 1850 superseded that of 1820, I wish to suggest a difference which I think most clearly exists. The compromise of 1820 was in reference to all the territory received under a particular authority, lying north of 36° 30'. Now that legislation cannot be superseded by any other legislation that does not refer to the very same subject—that precise territory. But in principle, the legislation of 1850 may be inconsistent with it. That is to say, the compromise measures of 1850 are generally understood to leave the question of local legislation to the people occupying the Territory. In another respect that legislation declares that States, when formed out of the territories therein legislated upon, may come into this Union with or without slavery, as the people forming the constitution may wish and declare. In principle, therefore, this is different legislation from that which excludes, by an act of Congress, slavery north of a certain line of latitude; but it no more supersedes it than Congress would supersede a law passed for the State of Ohio, by passing another different in principle for the State of North Carolina. The words are different. The meaning is different. To supersede an act is to render it inoperative—to substitute something else in its stead, acting upon the same subject, and not upon a subject that is entirely different.

All I have now intended to do is simply to furnish a reason for the vote I have given; and that I should not have done, if reasons had not been assigned elsewhere, and a commentary been made upon them by the honorable Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not deem it very important to continue the discussion on this point, after the notice which I have given, that I shall modify the words so as to meet the objection that Senators make as to the meaning of the words "superseded by" and "inconsistent with." I think the Senator from North Carolina has made that point so clear as to render it unnecessary to say much upon the subject. The whole argument on this point rests on this mistake: It is supposed that we contend that the Missouri compromise was superseded by the enactment of the acts of 1850. I say it was superseded by the principles of those acts. How? The compromise of 1820 rested on the principle of a geographical line, north of which there was to be no slavery, and south of it there might be. The compromise of 1850 obliterated the line, and rested upon the principle that the people should do as they pleased on both sides of the line, and come in the Union with or without slavery, as they pleased. It was on that idea that a principle was substituted for a geographical line. If it was, I supposed it should be declared; and it was to obviate any technical exception upon that word—I think it is an appropriate one—that I propose to modify it, in order to make it clear what we do mean—that is, that in all territorial organizations hereafter we shall organize them on the principle that the people are to do as they please, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. I can prepare an amendment that will express that idea so clearly that our friends will all be satisfied.

Mr. CASS. I will read from the Dictionary:

"Supersede. [Super and sedeo, to set.] Literally, to set above; hence to make void, inefficacious, or useless, by a superior power, by coming in place of; to set aside; to render unnecessary; to suspend."

I take it the act of superseding does itself destroy something else. Therefore I repeat to my honorable friends from North Carolina and Illinois, that the establishment of a principle, as my colleague has said, on one subject, does not supersede an existing one on another.

Mr. BADGER. I think it is impossible for my excellent friend from Michigan, even with the assistance of his colleague, and the Dictionary thrown in, to sustain his position. Either these laws relate to the same subject, or they do not. If they do, the maxim of law is clear and unmistakable that a subsequent law, inconsistent with prior laws, repeals them. That is clear beyond all dispute; and if they do not relate to the same subject, then the latter neither supersedes nor is inconsistent with the former. There may be a propriety in making a new law to conform, in relation to one subject, to what has been declared by another law in relation to another subject. But the very moment you introduce a provision in which either the law or the doctrine of the law passed to-day is inconsistent with the law or the doctrine of the law passed yesterday, the later law necessarily supersedes the one passed previously. Of that I think there can be no question.

Mr. CASS. I cannot let the honorable Senator off yet. I deny in toto his assumption.

Mr. BADGER. You are mistaken; you are to get off. [Laughter.]

Mr. CASS. To illustrate the matter by a given case, I say if you pass a law, and establish a Territory to-day where blacks are to vote, and a law existed yesterday that whites only should vote in other territories, the principle black to-day does not supersede the principle white of yesterday, without positive legislation.

Mr. BADGER. That is clear enough, if they are not inconsistent; if inconsistent it does.

Mr. CASS. What makes any principle inconsistent, but the application of a different one by the Legislature? and that would be a ground for appealing to the consistency of the Legislature to establish a new law. All that I maintain is, that the principle established by one law cannot annul the positive enactments of a former law. If, in this case, the former is in fact superseded by the latter, what is the use of declaring the former inoperative? If it is superseded and rendered inoperative, why do you not stop there?

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the question will be put on the motion to postpone.

Mr. BADGER. I hope my friend will not endeavor to supersede us. [Laughter.] Let us understand what the motion is first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. BADGER. My friend from Michigan has suggested that he will not let me off. Why, he has entirely mistaken this question. It was a question whether I would let him off [laughter] for averring that he would vote against one amendment, and for another upon a distinction that involved no sort of difference. That is the point of the matter.

Mr. BUTLER. Where is Crabbe's Synonymes? That may settle the matter.

Mr. STUART. I beg leave to say to the honorable Senator from North Carolina that I hope he will not speak of me as coming to the aid of my distinguished colleague.

Mr. BADGER. I thought you did; and I thought he needed it.

Mr. STUART. I am inclined to think that the country is of opinion that he does not need any assistance from anybody, and especially not from me. Nor, sir, am I disposed to undertake a system of tactics that shall change the issue. I rose on my own account, not to aid my colleague. The issue is the one which I stated—whether the legislation of 1820 is "superseded," to take the Senator's own words, or rendered inoperative on account of the legislation of 1850. And now, sir, to test the sincerity of the Senator's statement—I do not mean the sincerity in his mind, as a moral assertion, but as a legal assertion—let us, if that be so, strike the provision out of the bill, and see whether it will be decided by the adjudication of the courts of the country that the general legislation of 1850 repeals or annuls, to use the Senator's words, the legislation of 1820. We will meet him there—or I will; I speak for myself. I will meet him there, and with perfect contentment.

I ask the Senator, as a lawyer, distinguished as he is, if a client were to apply to him asking the question, whether since the legislation of 1850, in his opinion, he could safely hold his slaves in the Territory of Nebraska in defiance of the law of 1820, he would advise him that he could? The Senator will understand me, not taking anything into consideration other than the legislation of 1850, the naked question is presented to him: "Do the compromise measures of 1850, by their effect, so modify the law of 1820 that I can hold my property in slaves within the Territory of Nebraska?" Would the Senator give that opinion? If so, I am mistaken, entirely mistaken, in saying that there is any difference between using the language that the legislation of 1850 supersedes that of 1820, and using the other language that it is inconsistent in principle with it. My idea is, that that of 1820 is applied to one subject, that of 1850 to another subject, to wit, other territories.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, the honorable Senator has himself entirely shifted the issue. I have expressed no opinion whether the legislations of the two periods are inconsistent with each other, or whether the latter supersedes the former or not. I have said nothing upon the subject; therefore the case which is put to me does not affect my position at all. My position is this: If the legislation of one period applied to one subject, and the legislation of another period applied to another subject, then there can be neither inconsistency nor supersession. If they apply to the same subject, then if there be inconsistency, there is supersession.

Mr. STUART. No doubt of it.

Mr. BADGER. Therefore I said that my honorable friend from Michigan—if he will allow me to call him so—who is willing to vote for a prohibition declaring them to be inconsistent, and not for a provision declaring the one to supersede the other, made a mistake; but whether there is any inconsistency, or whether the one supersedes the other or not, I have yet given no opinion, and do not now mean to give any, because it is not involved in the question.

The motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow was agreed to.

SENATE CONTINGENT FUND.

The Senate proceeded to consider the message from the House announcing that they had receded from their 1st, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 7th amendments; agreed to the amendment of the Senate to their 6th amendment, and insisted upon their 2d amendment to the bill "to regulate the disbursement of the contingent fund of the Senate, and for other purposes."

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment on which the House insists.

Mr. BADGER. I desire to know, before we vote on that question, what we are to recede from. Will the Senator explain it?

Mr. HUNTER. I propose to recede from our disagreement to the amendment striking out the $1,000 compensation to the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. BADGER. Shall we recede from that? I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 6, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, containing a copy of a letter addressed to the Department by the Hon. John W. Davis, Governor of Oregon Territory, and the papers therein referred to; the object of it being to obtain from Congress a further appropriation to defray expenses incurred in the prosecution of the Cayuse war, in the years 1847 and 1848, prior to the organization of a territorial government. Also, a communication of the Comptroller of the Treasury, to whom those papers had been referred for examination, embracing a statement of appropriations and payments made on account of said expenses.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, it was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the House, if he deems it not incompatible with the public interest, all the official correspondence of Hon. Humphrey Marshall, late Commissioner to China, with the State Department.

SAFETY OF THE UNITED STATES MAILS.

The SPEAKER. The first business before the body is a motion to reconsider a vote by which the bill, which will be read by the Clerk, was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The bill was reported by its title, as follows: "A bill to secure the safe transmission of the United States mails upon railroads."

Mr. HOUSTON. My object in rising is to ask the House this morning to take up the bill of the Senate in relation to their pay and mileage, and dispose of it in some way or other. There is only a very simple point of difference pending between the two Houses, the consideration of which, I am sure, will not consume five minutes.

Mr. OLDS. I ask that the bill in relation to the mails go over for the present, by unanimous consent.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside for the present.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE SENATE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now ask the House to take up the bill to which I referred.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be taken up. The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The title of the bill was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

"An act to regulate the disbursement of the contingent fund of the Senate, and for other purposes."

[A message was here received from the Senate, informing the House that they had passed House bill for the relief of William Blake; that they had also passed sundry other bills, and requesting the concurrence of the House therein.]

The SPEAKER. The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill now before the House will be read by the Clerk.

The first amendment was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to all the amendments of the House of Representatives to the foregoing bill, except the sixth amendment, and agree to the said sixth amendment, so far as to strike out all after the enacting clause of the third section, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That it shall be the duty of the said Secretary of the Senate to deposit the moneys aforesaid, which may come into his hands, with the depository which may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for other disbursing officers in the city of Washington, and all payments on account of the pay and mileage of members of the Senate, and all payments of their officers, and for the contingent expenses of the Senate, shall be by drafts drawn by the Secretary on said depository."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. There is no necessity, I suppose, to refer this bill. When it came originally from the Senate there were three features which were unacceptable to the House. One of them made the Secretary of the Senate the disbursing officer in regard to the contingent fund of the Senate, and fixed his compensation over and above his salary as Clerk at $1,000 a year.

The second feature provided that when the vouchers of the Secretary of the Senate for disbursing the contingent fund had been passed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, they should be conclusive upon all the officers of the Treasury Department. The third feature authorized, as I suppose, the Secretary of the Senate to withdraw the contingent fund of the Senate from the Treasury Department, and deposit it wherever he chose, with bankers or brokers.

The bill, as it comes to us now from the Senate, leaves the bill in this form: that the Secretary of the Senate is made a disbursing officer to disburse the contingent fund, and his salary is fixed at $1,000. It is settled, if this bill passes in its present form, that the passing the vouchers of the Secretary of the Senate by the Senate committee is not conclusive upon the officers of the Treasury Department. It is provided, also, that the contingent fund shall be deposited by the Secretary of the Senate with the depository selected by the Secretary of the Treasury for other disbursing officers in the city of Washington.

The effect of the bill, if it passes, will be to give the sanction of both Houses of Congress to what we regard as the proper construction of the Independent Treasury, and to establish the fact, that the vouchers for the disbursement of the contingent fund of the Senate must undergo the same ordeal as other vouchers; and will substitute law for usage, and place this whole business under the authority of legislative enactment.

The House have therefore succeeded in both their amendments in which a principle is involved; and it would seem proper that we should yield the $1,000 additional salary to the Senate, and let the bill become a law. That, I believe, is a fair explanation of the matter, and I will detain the House no longer.

Mr. MACE obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman to yield long enough to have the bill read as it will stand if the House agree to the proposition of the Senate.

Mr. MACE. I have no objection to yielding for that purpose.

The bill, as it comes from the Senate, was then read through by the Clerk.

Mr. MACE. I have but very few remarks to make in relation to the provisions of the bill, as it is now presented to the House. I will say, in the outset, that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] has fairly stated the provisions of the bill; and the only question now presented for the consideration of the House, in my opinion, is whether we will allow the Secretary of the Senate an additional salary of $1,000.

Now, it must be known to every member of the House that the present pay of that officer is $3,000 per annum, and I believe he has enjoyed that salary ever since 1827. He receives, then, under the law, as it now stands, the sum of $3,000 per annum—the same that we pay our bureau officers, and the same that we pay the Clerk of this House.

Now, I ask if it is the intention of the House to allow this officer the additional salary of $1,000—making his compensation in all $4,000 per annum—why you do not extend the same provision to the Clerk of this House, who has twice as onerous duties to perform, and make his salary $4,000 per annum?

I understand that he has a clerk under him whose duty it is to disburse the mileage pay and contingent fund; and that that clerk receives a salary of $1,500. He has also been provided with all the clerks that he has ever called for, at salaries larger, perhaps, than those which the assistant clerks of this House receive.

Now, then, I take it that it is unjust, and setting a bad precedent, to allow the Secretary of the Senate $4,000 a year. It is more pay than he ought to have, making his salary $1,000 more than the salaries of the heads of bureaus, and of the Clerk of this House. It is suggested to me that he also gets the extra compensation which we allow, at the close of every session in addition to that, and I suppose that he does. I content myself now with simply saying, that all I desire is, that the yeas and nays may be called upon that proposition, in order, that we may see who is disposed to give this additional $1,000 to the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. We are now about to vote on receding from our amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the third section of the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES. Will not the question be first upon receding from our amendments?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is right. The question will first be upon receding from the amendments of the House.

Mr. JONES. The Senate have nonconcurrent in the amendment of the House to the first section of the bill. The question will first be, whether the House will recede from that amendment or not.

The SPEAKER. That is the parliamentary mode of putting the question.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is one amendment made by the Senate which I regard as of vast importance, and I hope the House will vote upon it by itself; I mean that one which requires the disbursing officer created by this bill to make his deposits under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. I regard that amendment as vital to the law, and I am satisfied that there is no objection to it here. I do not want, therefore, to link that amendment to the one that gives additional salary to the Secretary of the Senate, as it would thereby be endangered, and I regard it as vital to the law itself.

The SPEAKER. The question is on receding from the following amendment proposed by the House to the bill of the Senate: In the first section, strike out the words: "and officers, and for contingent expenses."

Mr. JONES. The House proposed to strike out those words; the Senate have non-concurred in that amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. The effect of that amendment of the House was to separate the contingent fund of the Senate from their pay and mileage. The House, by receding from that amendment, will make the Secretary of the Senate the disbursing officer for both those funds, and I do not think that is objectionable. We do not want the yeas and nays on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair apprehends that the yeas and nays were demanded only on the amendment in relation to the salary of the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is the proposition on which I demanded the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the question will be taken without the yeas and nays upon the other amendments.

The question was then taken on receding from the first amendment of the House, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on receding from the following amendment of the House:

"Strike out the following words from the eleventh section: 'And shall be allowed the sum of one thousand dollars per annum as compensation over and above his salary as Secretary of the Senate for the duties hereby imposed upon him.'"

Mr. OLDS. I move that the House insist upon its amendment. The yeas and nays, I believe, have already been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary usage has been to put the question on receding.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. We, in this part of the Hall, Mr. Speaker, do not understand upon what the question is now to be taken. By consent I ask that the section of the bill be read by the Clerk, as it is proposed to be amended by the House.

The section of the bill alluded to was read by the Clerk, as requested.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon receding from the amendment of the House, so that those who are in favor of granting the Secretary of the Senate the $1,000 additional salary proposed will vote "aye;" those opposed "no."

[A message in writing was here received from the President of the United States, by the hand of SIDNEY WEBSTER, Esq., his Private Secretary.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Without detaining the House, I have only to remark this: After a very full conference with the Committee on Finance of the Senate, the House committee agreed, as they gave up everything connected with principle in that bill, to allow them, if it be the pleasure of the House, to retain the salary of $1,000 for their Secretary, for the sake of establishing by law, and getting the sanction of both Houses of Congress, to the points: First, that the Auditing Committee of the Senate should not pass vouchers, and make them conclusive upon officers of the Treasury Department; and, secondly, to the fact that these contingent funds must be kept in the Treasury of the United States. It strikes me that it would be treating the Senate disrespectfully, and with some severity, to refuse to allow the salary, after they have given up the two points which they made with so much fervor and vigor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The salary of the Secretary of the Senate is now $3,000 per annum. That body sent us a bill imposing, as they say, additional duties upon that officer, and proposing, in consideration therefor, to increase his salary $1,000, and to make it $4,000 instead of $3,000 per annum.

When the House had this bill under consideration, it struck out so much of the bill as proposes to increase the salary of the Secretary $1,000. The bill went back to the Senate. In that amendment they non-concurred. They now send it to us, and the question for the House to vote upon now is, whether we will recede from that amendment or not. Those who are in favor of increasing the salary of the Secretary of the Senate $1,000 will vote "aye;" those who are opposed to receding, and opposed to giving him that increase of salary, will vote "no," and they will vote against the increase of salary. This is the question at present before the House, and no other part of this bill is, as I conceive, now before us.

Mr. WALSH. Inasmuch as the proposition was plainly and intelligently stated by the Chair, and as there appears to be no new light thrown upon the subject, I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and the main question ordered to be put.

The previous question being, "Will the House recede from its amendments to the Senate bill?" it was put, and there were—yeas 66, nays 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Barksdale, Benson, Benton, Bissell, Breckinridge, Bugg, Campbell, Chandler, Churchwell, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, De Witt, Dickinson, Disney, Dowdell, Dunbar, Edmunds, Edmundson, Farley, Flager, Florence, Franklin, Goode, Goodrich, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Hayn, Hill, Howe, Hunt, Kerr, Lindsey, McDougall, McNair, Macy, Maxwell, Mayall, John G. Miller, Mordecai Oliver, Peckham, Pennington, Phillips, Powell, Pringle, Ready, Riddle, David Ritchie, Sapp, Samuel A. Smith, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Straub, John L. Taylor, Upham, Vail, Walbridge, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Tappan Wentworth, and Dan'l B. Wright—66.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Aslie, Belcher, Bennett, Bliss, Boyce, Brooks, Carpenter, Chamberlain, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Cook, Craig, Cullom, Curtis, Cutting, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dick, Drum, Dunham, Edgerton, Ellison, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Fuller, Gamble, Giddings, Green, Grow, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Hastings, Hendricks, Hubbard, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kittredge, Knox, Kurtz, Lamb, Letcher, Lilly, Lindsey, McCulloch, Macdonald, McMullin, McQueen, Mace, Matteson, Middlesworth, Milson, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Nichols, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Peck, John Perkins, Puryear, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Seward, Seymour, Shaw, Simmons, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, John J. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Vansant, Wade, Walker, Walsh, Wells, Wheeler, and Witte—103.

So the House refused to recede from its amendment.

Mr. DISNEY. There is upon the Speaker's table a railroad bill from the Senate, which I desire to have taken up, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would remark to the gentleman that there are other amendments to the pending bill yet to be acted upon.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to recede from its amendment, and that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The question was taken upon the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. There are other amendments to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

"Strike out the words 'in lieu of,' and insert instead thereof the words 'in addition to.'"

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment just reported is found in the first part of the second section of the bill, where the Committee of Ways and Means, say, "In lieu of the bond heretofore given, he shall give, &c." The House struck out the words "in lieu" and instead thereof inserted "in addition to." The Senate nonconcurrent in that amendment, and proposed to retain the words "in lieu." The Senate have added a third section, which requires the Secretary of the Senate to deposit his funds under the direct control of the Secretary of the Treasury, and thereby obviates, as I think, the difficulty which the House amendment was intended to meet.

The question being put, "Will the House recede from its amendment?" it was decided in the affirmative.

The next amendment reported was as follows:

"Insert after the words 'by the,' in the twenty-third line, the word 'first;' and, also, after the word 'the,' in line twenty-nine, the word 'first.'"

Mr. HOUSTON. There are two amendments of precisely the same character. The bill, as it came from the Senate, says that the bond shall be taken by the Comptroller of the Treasury. Upon the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means, the House amended the bill so as to say the bond should be taken by the First Comptroller. In a conference with some of the Senators who have examined this subject, they say that the law, of which this is a copy, used the word "comptroller" without saying which one, and the construction has always been that it meant First Comptroller. If the House yield the amendments which they made, in this respect, it will leave the matter as it stands under the construction to which I have referred.

The question being put, "Will the House recede from its amendments?" it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is still another amendment, in the shape of an additional section. The Senate had a third section to the bill, which exempted their accounts from being audited at the Treasury Department. The House struck out that third section. Upon the return of the bill to the Senate, the Senate agreed to that amendment of the House, thereby yielding the third section, but they have agreed to our amendment with an amendment. They propose to put in the place of the third section, which we struck out, the section which is before the Clerk, and which I desire to have read.

The third section was then read, as inserted in a preceding part of the proceedings.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the Senate amendment, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The title was then amended, so as to read:

"To constitute the Secretary of the Senate a disbursing officer for the purpose therein mentioned."

Mr. DISNEY. I ask leave of the House to take up a railroad bill, for the purpose of referring it to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BISSELL. I hope the House will not consent to that.

[Mr. GREEN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported, as correctly enrolled, House bill of the following title:

"An act giving further time for satisfying claims for bounty lands, and for other purposes;" which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker.]

The question was then taken upon Mr. HOUSTON's motion to suspend the rules, and there were—yeas 56, nays not counted.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

THE SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a joint report relative to the rescue of the sufferers on board of the San Francisco.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Mr. OLDS. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have instructed me to report the following bill—

Mr. CHANDLER. I was about to ask a suspension of the rules, to allow me to present the report I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. It is in order for the gentleman to make that motion.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I move a suspension of the rules, to enable me to introduce the resolutions which I hold in my hand.

Mr. OLDS. Will that motion be in order until the report of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] had not yielded the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is a report, of some length, which I desire read, in connection with the resolutions.

Mr. HUNT. I ask for the reading of the report, and I believe there will be but one heart and one mind in the matter.

The joint resolution was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Joint Resolution manifesting the sense of Congress towards the officers and seamen of the vessels and others engaged in the rescue of the officers and soldiers of the Army, the passengers, and the officers and crew of the steamship San Francisco, from perishing with the wreck of that vessel.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to procure three valuable gold medals, with suitable devices, one to be presented to Captain Creighton, of the ship Three Bells, of Glasgow; one to Captain Low, of the bark Kilby, of Boston; and one to Captain Stouffer, of the ship Antartic, as testimonials of national gratitude for their gallant conduct in rescuing about five hundred Americans from the wreck of the steamship San Francisco; and that the cost of the same be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 2. Resolved, That a sum not exceeding $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the President to reward, in such manner as he may deem most appropriate, the officers and crews of those vessels that aided in the rescue of the survivors of said wreck, and such other persons as distinguished themselves by offices of humanity and heroism on that occasion; the reward to be proportionate to the nature of the efforts made, and the merit of the services rendered, so far as the same can be ascertained.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now read the report.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the report, as follows:

The joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives "to inquire and report in what form the acknowledgment of Congress may be most appropriately expressed to those benevolent and courageous men who, under Providence, were the means of rescuing from death so many citizens of this Republic," have had the same under consideration, and submit to the respective Houses the following report:

The steamship San Francisco, the property of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, of New York, was chartered by the War Department to convey United States troops and military stores to California, via Cape Horn.

She left New York on the 23d December, 1853, having on board, in addition to the crew of the vessel, the third regiment of United States artillery, and several passengers, among whom was a number of women and children; in all about eight hundred souls.

On the night of the 23d she encountered a severe storm, which rendered her wholly unmanageable. On the morning of the 24th she was struck by a violent wave, which shattered her quarter deck, her hurricane-deck, and carried away her upper saloon, and all the officers, soldiers, and passengers who had taken shelter in it from the storm, amounting to about two hundred in number. The vessel was very seriously damaged by this terrible shock, and continued afterwards to leak so badly that it required the utmost efforts of all on board to keep her afloat. On the same day, and soon after this dreadful occurrence, she spoke the brig Napoleon, of Portland. The captain of this brig promised to lie by her, but was separated from her during the night. The next day, the 25th, the San Francisco spoke the brig Maria, of Liverpool. The captain of the Maria also promised to lie by her, but the night separated the vessels.

On the 27th, the bark Kilby, of Boston, Captain Low, hove in sight. This vessel had suffered much in the storm that wrecked the San Francisco. She was short of provisions and water, and leaking badly, yet her captain promised to stand by the wreck, which promise he faithfully kept through the night. The next day, the 28th, upwards of one hundred persons, men, women, and children, were transferred from the San Francisco to the Kilby. This operation was arrested by the increase of the gale at night, but it was intended to be resumed the next day, until all should be removed from the wreck; the storm, however, increasing with the night, the vessels were unavoidably separated. The Kilby cruised in search of the wreck for some time, until her own crippled and disabled condition compelled her to abandon the search, and provide for her own safety. It was full time, as she afterwards encountered great difficulties in getting safely into port.

On the 31st, the ship Three Bells, of Glasgow, Captain Creighton, came in sight, and on learning the condition of the passengers and crew, promised to lie by them and succor them at all hazards. This vessel had suffered severely from the storm, was short of provisions and water, and leaked so badly that her condition was scarcely less critical than that of the San Francisco; but her gallant commander faithfully kept his promise. At the most imminent risk to his vessel, he lay by the wreck for several days of storm and danger, heaving for this purpose to perform the most skillful and perilous manœuvres, passing frequently under the lee of the wreck to cheer and encourage those on board.

On the 3d of January, 1854, the ship Antartic, bound for Liverpool, fell in with the San Francisco, and generously tendered assistance and succor to those on board. On the 4th and 5th all the surviving passengers not previously transferred to the Kilby were removed on board the Three Bells and Antartic. On the 6th, all the officers and crew were taken from the wreck, Captain Watkins being the last man who abandoned the ill-fated vessel.

The bark Kilby, after struggling with the winds and waves for fourteen days, finally reached within ten miles of New York, when a storm arose and she was again driven to sea. The next day she fell in with the ship Lucy Thompson, of New York, whose commander, upon learning her perilous and distressed condition, kindly volunteered to take the passengers on board. This removal was immediately effected, and the Lucy Thompson supplied the Kilby with provisions and water, of which she stood greatly in need. The Lucy Thompson brought these suffering passengers in safety to New York.

The Kilby was afterwards found in a helpless condition, and was towed into Boston harbor by the steamer City of New York.

The Three Bells arrived safely in New York, but sufficient time has not yet elapsed to hear of the arrival of the Antartic at Liverpool.

The committee are deeply impressed with the generous conduct of these gallant men, who aided in rescuing our distressed countrymen from the wreck of the San Francisco.

The commanders of the Three Bells, Kilby, and Antartic deserve the grateful acknowledgments of the country for their humanity and intrepidity.

Thanks and praise are especially due to Captain Creighton, of the Three Bells, who, for six tempestuous days and nights, in a spirit of disinterested humanity, and at the imminent peril of himself and crew, stood by the sinking steamer until her gallant commander, who remained the last man on board, abandoned the doomed and deserted vessel.

Captain Watkins and his officers and crew appear to great advantage on this trying occasion. Lieutenant Francis Key Murray, of the United States Navy, is also entitled to especial notice for his humane and valuable services. Praise is also due to Surgeon Buel, of the San Francisco, for the assiduity with which he attended to the sick and dying soldiers after they were separated from their own surgeons. Major Wyse and his junior officers deserve great credit for their efficient conduct in the absence of their superior officers. Several others, who cannot now be designated by name, owing to the imperfect information before the committee, are believed also to be entitled to praise and to the thanks of the country.

The committee are persuaded that these humane and noble services were rendered without any hope or expectation of pecuniary compensation; but they are, for that very reason, in the judgment of the committee, entitled not only to grateful acknowledgment, but also to some substantial reward. They therefore report a joint resolution for that purpose.

JAMES SHIELDS,

Chairman Joint Committee on the part of the Senate.

JOSEPH R. CHANDLER,

Chairman Joint Committee on the part of the House.

Mr. WALSH. I object to the reading of the report.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose.

The SPEAKER. The motion is already pending to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing the resolution.

The question being upon suspending the rules, Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio, demanded a division.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays. That will be the most effectual division.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and the result was—yeas 90, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Benton, Bliss, Boyce, Bagg, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chandler, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Dawson, De Witt, Dick, Dickinson, Disney, Dowdell, Dunbar, Edmunds, Edmundson, Everhart, Farley, Fenton, Flagler, Florence, Franklin, Gamble, Goodrich, Green, Grow, Harrison, Haven, Bill, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Ingersoll, Keitt, Kerr, Knox, Kurtz, McCulloch, McNair, Matteson, Meacham, Middeworth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morgan, Norton, Mordecai Oliver, Pennington, John Perkins, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, Riddle, David Ritchie, Robbins, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Sapp, Seward, Simmons, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

Mr. OLDS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, introduced the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

"A bill abolishing the present ocean mail steamer service, and authorizing the Postmaster General to relet the same in accordance with the usages of the inland mail service, and for other purposes."

"A bill to modify the nineteenth section of the act of 3d March, 1845, concerning the compensation of railroad companies."

Mr. GOODRICH. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object, and move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Unless we do this, we shall have the day spent in motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. BISSELL. I hope that motion will not prevail. There are some important reports which the committees of this House should have an opportunity of presenting.

Mr. JONES. You can make your reports tomorrow.

The question was put; and, upon a division, there were—yeas 62, nays 70.

So the House refused to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GOODRICH. I now ask that my resolution may be read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution, having been objected to in advance, cannot be read, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. GOODRICH. I move to suspend the rules, for the purpose of enabling me to offer the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may make that motion, and he has now the right to have the resolution read.

The Clerk then read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the message from the President of the United States of January 24, 1853, with the accompanying papers, transmitted to this House in answer to a resolution of the House of December 27, 1852, on the subject of the compensation of certain custom-house officers, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The question was put, and (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. McDOUGALL, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back a bill of the following title, with a recommendation that it do pass:

"A bill authorizing the President of the United States to contract for a semi-monthly mail, by steamships, between San Francisco and some port in China."

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, made an adverse report on the petition of William Wheatley, of the District of Columbia; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 45) "to incorporate the Pioneer Manufacturing Company of Georgetown, District of Columbia," with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. D. said: I move that the bill be put upon its passage, believing that we can get rid of it now in less time than we can at any other time, and that there will be no objection to it if I make a brief statement of facts: I ask for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read by the Clerk.

Mr. DAVIS. I have but a single word to say in reference to this bill. In its present shape, I regard it as perfectly harmless. So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to corporations on principle; but this one is so properly and carefully guarded, that I am of opinion its operation will be perfectly harmless. By a reference to its provisions, it will be discovered that this corporation is forever prohibited engaging in banking of any kind, in issuing or emitting any kind of paper as a circulating medium; that the stockholders are made individually liable for its debts; and that Congress reserves the power of changing, modifying, or repealing the charter at pleasure. In this view of the case, I cannot conceive that there can be objection to the passage of the bill as reported from the committee. This is all I desire to say. I now call for the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed, so that we may know and understand what it is. There may be some amendment necessary.

The call for the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. JONES. I now move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed.

The question was taken, and there were, upon a division—ayes 67, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. KERR, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition and papers of James Morrison and others, sureties of G. R. C. Floyd, late Secretary of the Territory of Wisconsin, be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CORWIN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

"A bill for the relief of the children and heirs of Major General Baron De Kalb."

On motion by Mr. LATHAM, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of Thomas Ellis, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

On motion by Mr. ORR, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Joel Henry Dyer, of Tennessee, asking for compensation for services rendered the United States in the war with the Seminole Indians, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BISSELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

"A bill to increase the present military establishment of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. BISSELL, from the same committee, introduced a bill "to regulate the pay and increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes;" which was read the first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BISSELL also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 17) entitled "An act to reimburse to the Common Council of the City of New York the expenses made by the first regiment of the New York volunteers;" which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BENTON. I desire to report a bill "granting the right of way to the Saint Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad Company," which was reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and afterwards referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is a local bill, makes no appropriation, and merely gives the right of way to a railroad company, in the State of Missouri. The committee have fully considered it, and instructed me to report in its favor. We have the recommendation of the Secretary of War upon the subject, and all the safeguards are provided for in the bill which are deemed necessary. I ask to put the bill upon its passage, as there is no appropriation in it.

The bill was then read through by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read the third time.

The question was taken, and there were—ayes 68, noes 21.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed; and I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. HARRIS of Alabama, and SKELTON were appointed.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 38, noes 74; no quorum voting.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion to commit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain if there is a quorum present. If there is no quorum here we cannot do business at all.

Mr. JONES. To settle that question I move there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was accordingly called, and 176 members answered to their names.

A quorum being now present, Mr. JONES moved to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will now resume their places.

Mr. JONES. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The tellers then resumed their places, and the question on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was again put, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 59, noes 79.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was subsequently read the third time.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. I call for the reading of the bill at length.

The Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. FULLER. I wish to inquire whether this bill meets with the approbation of the Secretary of War?

Mr. BENTON. I will answer the gentleman's question. I have been twice in consultation with the Secretary of War upon this subject. There are three pieces of the public grounds through which this railroad passes. The Secretary has no objection at all to its passage through two of them, but he thinks there will be some inconvenience from its passage through the third. But that inconvenience is guarded against as far as guards can go; and so far, in my opinion, that there can be no sort of danger of inconvenience to the public property, and the advantage to the public will far transcend any inconvenience. This, sir, is the result of my interview with the Secretary of War.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed, there being, on a division—ayes 93, noes not counted.

Mr. MILLER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred Senate bill (No. 33) entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Major Caleb Swan, deceased," reported the same back without amendment; and it was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, "A bill prohibiting the officers of the Army and Navy from having an interest in contracts for the supply of any article for any branch of the service to which such officer belongs."

Mr. F. said: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be at once put upon its passage. I am sure, after it has been read, that there will not be found a single member to object. Members will only be astonished that we have not had such a law upon our statute-book before this time.

The bill was read through. It provides that no officer of the Army or Navy, or person employed as agent by a disbursing officer of the Army or Navy, shall be a party to, or directly or indirectly have an interest in, any contract or agreement for supply of any article, or the execution of any work for any branch of the service to which such officer or agent belongs, and that any officer of the Army or Navy offending against its provisions shall, on conviction therefor before a court-martial, be cashiered. It further provides that no officer or agent of the United States shall pay for any article sold or work done contrary to its provisions, and that any contract or agreement made in violation thereof shall be null and void, and that the articles delivered and the work done in pursuance of said contract or agreement shall be forfeited to the Government of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire, sir, that this bill shall be put upon its immediate passage. The necessity for some legislation upon this subject was developed by some transactions which occurred in California early in the year 1852. It seems that it was then ascertained that certain officers of the army about Sonora had been engaged in purchasing articles of supply for the army, and selling them at a profit to the Government. I recollect one case of a Colonel Hooker, who contracted with the acting assistant quartermaster at the port of Sonora to deliver one hundred and fifty tons of hay, at thirty-five dollars per ton. The hay was delivered and paid for, and Colonel Hooker realized twelve dollars a ton upon the hay. He was summoned before a court-martial, ordered by General Hitchcock, and although the facts were clearly and conclusively established, the officer was fully acquitted, upon the ground that there was no law prohibiting said conduct. I need scarcely say that such practices, if permitted in the Army, must be destructive of the character of the Army—injurious to the public interests, and productive of frauds, speculations, and endless abuses. The Secretary of War called the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs to this subject, in 1852, when the bill now submitted was prepared, under my supervision. I was directed to report it during the last Congress, but no opportunity presented for so doing. I trust it will now pass without further delay.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for tellers on the question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MACE, and STANTON of Kentucky, appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the bill may be read.

No objection being made, the bill was accordingly read in extenso.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I propose to amend the bill by inserting, after the words "officers of the Army and Navy," the words "or the officers of the Government of the United States."

Mr. BISSELL. I would suggest very respectfully to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR,] although I have no doubt his object is a very good one, that his amendment, if attached to the bill, will unquestionably lead to much discussion, and that the bill will not pass. I hope, upon reflection, that he will withdraw his amendment, and take some other occasion to embody his views in a separate bill.

Mr. TAYLOR. I merely wish to say, that it seems to me, if it is proper to prohibit officers of the Army and Navy, in the service of the United States, from engaging in any contracts in which the United States are interested, that it is equally proper to prohibit all other agents and officers of the Government outside of the Army and Navy. What objection can there be to the amendment?

Mr. BISSELL. I agree with the gentleman from Ohio in the object he seeks to accomplish; but I question the propriety of introducing such an amendment now to the bill; for I think I clearly foresee that the effect of it will be to delay the passage of this bill, which has been very much needed for a long time. Does not the gentleman think so himself?

Mr. TAYLOR. If I thought so I would not insist upon the amendment. I think the amendment is clearly right.

Mr. BISSELL. The proposition of the gentleman from Ohio will undoubtedly lead to much discussion, although I think such a proposition would meet with the favor of this House.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that there is no provision made in this bill for penalties. The bill provides that the persons guilty of the offense shall be cashiered; and I would suggest to the gentleman, that he attach an additional section to the bill, providing for the proper penalties, instead of inserting the few words he proposes by his amendment.

Mr. BISSELL. There is an evident impropriety in offering this as an amendment to the bill at present.

Mr. TAYLOR. If it be in order, I would move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to have such an amendment prepared for the action of the House thereon.

Mr. BISSELL. There is another incongruity.

The Committee on Military Affairs is not the proper committee to determine upon the punishment which should be inflicted upon a civil officer of the Government for fraud or peculation.

A MEMBER. Let it go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BISSELL. Every step we take shows the propriety of keeping these two matters distinct from each other. Let the gentleman introduce a bill which shall accomplish the purpose he proposes, or let him introduce a resolution requiring the proper committee to report a bill which shall reach other officers of the Government. This bill is intended only to reach military officers, which are the only ones over which the Committee on Military Affairs can have jurisdiction.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not wish to delay or endanger the passage of this bill; and without being able to see much force in the apprehensions of the gentleman from Illinois, yet with a view of doing some good, I withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. WALKER. I do not see why the restriction should be made in reference to the branch of the service to which the individual belongs. It strikes me that the bill would be improved very much by striking out that provision, and inserting the words "in any branch of the military service of the United States." I move that as an amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I then move that the bill, with the amendment, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed. I think the House will see the propriety of referring this bill, and of letting gentlemen have an opportunity of making provision for including all the officers of the Government.

Mr. HAMILTON. Upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was put; and, upon a division, 49 rose in the affirmative.

Mr. MILLSON. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL, and HARRIS of Alabama, were appointed.

The question was then put, and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 57.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HOUSTON. Bills are accumulating very rapidly upon the Speaker's table, and though I greatly desire to finish the deficiency bill this evening yet I propose, if the House will agree to it, to dispose of the bills on the Speaker's table. I move that the House do now proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

INVALID PENSIONS.

House bill "making an appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending 30th June, 1855," returned from the Senate with an amendment, was taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand that the Senate have amended this bill, by striking out that portion of it which relates to the pay of privateer pensions.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out the following:

"For pensions of invalids who were wounded on board private armed vessels during the last war with Great Britain, $2,800; and the office for paying privateer pensions in Boston is hereby abolished, and said pensions shall be paid as privateer pensioners are paid at other places."

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

COMMUNICATIONS FROM DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State in reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th of December last, requesting from the President "a statement of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with all foreign nations, similar to that communicated to this House on 29th of March, 1842; and further, that he be requested to give a table, exhibiting a comparative statement between the tariff of other nations and that of the United States, similar to the one prepared and laid before this body in March, 1842."

Which was, on motion by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting a copy of the letter of Hon. Henry M. Rice, the Delegate from Minnesota Territory, to the Interior Department, together with the message of the Governor of that Territory, to which the letter refers, asking an additional appropriation of $10,000 for inclosing and otherwise finishing the Territorial capital and penitentiary; which was referred, on motion by Mr. HAYEN, to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with the law, approved March 3, 1853, the several reports received from the engineers and other persons employed to make explorations and surveys to ascertain the most practicable and economical route for a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean; which was, on motion by Mr. HAYEN, referred to the special committee appointed for the consideration of the Pacific railroad question, and ordered to be printed.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER. House bill (No. 47) entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending 30th June, 1855," has been returned from the Senate, with an amendment.

The Senate amendment was then read:

"Add at the end of the bill the following: 'for repairs and addition to professors' quarters $5,000.' 'For cavalry exercise hall $20,000.'"

Mr. HIBBARD. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think it is hardly necessary to refer the bill. There is but one amendment; and I think the House is as well prepared to vote upon it now as they will be at any time. That cavalry hall is the old riding hall with which the House has been acquainted for ten or fifteen years. The House always votes it out, and the Senate votes it in.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Is the bill open to amendment now?

The SPEAKER. The proposition before the House is upon the motion to commit. It is therefore not open to amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR. I hope it will be committed. But I wish to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. Members will recollect, those who have served here for some years especially, that we have the report of a board of visitors to West Point every year, for which we pay $3,000. Eminent civilians are sent there to witness the examination of the students, to ascertain their progress, and report thereon. They make recommendations to us. One of them, in reference to this riding hall, has been repeatedly made to us unanimously. I believe it is necessary, as I have seen it, and know the importance of it.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, during the five or six years I have held a seat here I have endeavored to have an amendment adopted, to restore to the cadets the old pay, which they received some years ago. Their former pay was about $28 per month, but it was reduced to $24 some years ago, for what reason I do not know. The Board of Visitors annually sent by the Executive to visit this Academy has, for several years, unanimously recommended, in consideration of the increased price of living, and with a view to place all the cadets upon the exact equality required by law, that the old pay of the cadets, of $28 20 per month be restored, in the place of $24, which they receive now. A poor young man sent to that institution cannot support himself there without the aid of his friends. It was stated, by an eminent gentleman who represented that district in Congress a few years ago, that the market at West Point was higher than it was in the city of New York itself, owing to its proximity to that city. The cadets are required to pay their own board, to clothe themselves handsomely, and to appear regularly upon drill every day upon $24 per month. The price of every thing has increased, but for some reason or other the pay of the cadets has been diminished. I hope the bill may be referred back, with a view to have this matter provided for, and if it is in order now I will make that motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. Such a motion is not in order.

Mr. HIBBARD. I would simply state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] that I suppose he may debate the merits of this bill upon the motion to refer it. But my purpose was not now to open debate upon the bill, but to refer it, and when it comes from the committee it will be open to debate. It is evident that we need the time to-day for other things than the debate of this bill, and I think it would be well if the gentleman will allow the bill to go to the committee upon my motion.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am much obliged to the gentleman; and I will merely say, that when the proper time arrives, if I can get the opportunity, I shall say something in reference to this riding hall, which I have personally inspected, and the necessity of which I have seen. The students are required to perform cavalry exercise whether it rains and storms or not.

In the case of a storm they ought to be under some shelter, but the place now provided for a riding school is a dangerous one for young men in which to take such exercise, and not at all suitable. Upon a recent visit there, I understood that cadets were often thrown in the miserable place which is now used as their riding hall, but which looks more like a stable than a place to instruct in cavalry tactics, and the consequence is that accidents occur, and they are not unfrequently sent to the hospital. Let us either abolish this riding hall altogether or establish a good one. It may be said, that young men may be exercised in cavalry drill all the time out of doors. When you come to consider that it is necessary to keep up daily regular instruction, there must be some seasons, in rainy and stormy weather, when such instruction can be given only under shelter. I trust, therefore, before the bill passes this House, and goes back to the Senate, that we will mature it, and at least look into the recommendations of the Board of Visitors of the Academy at West Point. Why should we send a Board of Visitors there unless some attention is paid to their recommendations? If they are worth anything let us pass upon them and adopt them. If not, let us abolish this riding hall, or carry out the recommendations so repeatedly made to us.

Mr. HIBBARD. I do not propose to debate the motion now, and I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was then taken, and the bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

STEAMSHIP SAN FRANCISCO.

The SPEAKER. The business next in order is House bill (No. 135) "for the relief of the United States troops that suffered by the recent disaster to the steamship San Francisco;" which has been returned from the Senate, with sundry amendments.

The first amendment was then read, as follows:

"At line eight, after the word 'sea,' insert 'and to Lieutenant Francis Key Murray and any other officer and seaman of the United States Navy who was on board of said steamship under orders.'"

Mr. ORR. I think that this bill and amendments, had better be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I therefore make that motion.

Mr. McMULLIN. It occurs to me that the proper reference would be to send this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means. It provides for a very large appropriation.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

The following bills from the Senate were then taken up in their order, read the first and second time by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

"An act (No. 31) for the relief of Purser Francis B. Stockton." Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

"An act for the relief of Isaac Varm, senior." Referred to the Committee of Claims.

"An act for the relief of Richard King." Referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

SUPERINTENDENT OF PUBLIC PRINTING.

The joint resolution from the Senate "authorizing an increase of the force in the office of the Superintendent of the Public Printing," was next taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER stated that a motion was pending to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MURRAY. I hope it will not be so referred, but that it will be put upon its passage.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The question is not understood in this part of the Hall.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be again reported.

Mr. DISNEY. Was not the resolution reported back from the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. It was; and it is proposed by that committee to put it upon its passage. A motion, however, is pending to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think that there is some misunderstanding in reference to this matter. The resolution may have been informally before the Committee on Printing; but, so far as my information extends, it was never referred to it by a vote of this House.

Mr. MURRAY. The resolution was referred to the Joint Committee on Printing, and after consideration, reported by the chairman of that committee to the Senate, from whence it comes before this House.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. It was referred by the Senate to the Joint Committee on Printing, and by them it was authorized to be reported back to that body. It therefore was before the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HIBBARD. I would inquire of gentlemen of that committee whether they considered the same matter, and agreed to report favorably on it?

Mr. STANTON. We did, sir.

Mr. HIBBARD. If that be so, it is then entirely unnecessary to again commit the resolution.

The resolution was read through.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of subjecting and making amenable the Superintendency of the Public Printing to the Interior Department.

Mr. GROW. The Superintendent of the Public Printing has now to give bonds for the faithful discharge of all of his duties. We require of him, by law, to superintend the whole of the public printing, and hold him responsible for the faithful execution of that duty. Then why should he not have the appointment of his own officers? If he is to be accountable for the proper execution of the printing and the engraving of maps, &c., he should certainly have the appointment of his own officers.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is another point in the instructions of the gentleman from Tennessee which I think commends itself to the favorable consideration of this House, and I desire to call attention to it. At present the Committee on Printing supervise the accounts of the Superintendent. The Superintendent makes no formal requisition for money unless his accounts have undergone the ordinary supervision of the Committee on Printing, all of which is right and proper enough, admitting that committee is always enough at leisure to supervise those accounts; but there is a time when that committee is not in existence. During the recesses between the sessions of Congress that committee is not here to supervise the actions of the Superintendent in reference to the public printing.

There is a joint resolution, however, which says that during the absence of the Committee on Printing the Superintendent's accounts shall undergo the supervision of the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate. Now, sir, I think in that there is a great defect; and this subject ought to be placed under the charge of some permanent and responsible Department of the Government, one which is continuous and always here to supervise and attend to the business of the public printing. One of the provisions of the law in relation to the public printing—I may not be able to turn to it immediately—requires, that when the work shall be brought in the Superintendent of the Public Printing shall, if he deems it unfit to be received, reject it entirely. If, however, it is in a condition that he may receive it, he receives it, making some deduction, according to his judgment, and if there is any dispute between him and the public printer the question shall be decided by the Committee on Printing. That of itself shows that it is absolutely essential to the healthful action of that part of the public printing that there should be some permanent, responsible authority to supervise the action of the Superintendent in connection with the public printing of the two Houses. It will not do to say that the defect which I have pointed out is cured by the joint resolution which refers it to the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate, for the reason that those two officers have about as much as they can attend to. They should not have the power to supervise. They are not the persons to whom we ought to refer a matter of this sort, to supervise the acts of the Superintendent of the Public Printing, and to act as a check upon him.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] labors under a misapprehension as to the power of this Superintendent of Public Printing. He has the control of no funds whatever, except about $1,000 of contingent money usually appropriated for the benefit of that office. The accounts of the public printer and the binder are settled by the Comptroller of the Treasury, in the same manner as all other accounts are settled. The only money under the control of the Superintendent is the $1,000 every year voted for the contingent purposes of that office.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will read the law, if the gentleman will allow me. The law says:

"He shall inspect the work when executed by the public printer or printers, and shall record, in a book or books, to be by him kept for that purpose, the dates at which the returns of said work are made, and whether the same is executed in a neat and workmanlike manner, upon the paper furnished to the public printers by said Superintendent, and the amount allowed by said Superintendent for said printing. It shall be his duty to supervise the execution of the public printing, and inspect the work when executed, and to see that the same is done with neatness and dispatch, and report every failure or delinquency of duty on the part of the public printer, and from time to time to report the said delinquencies to the Joint Committee of Congress on Printing. He shall issue his certificate for the amount due to the public printer for such work as shall have been faithfully executed, which certificate shall be made payable to the public printer at the Treasury of the United States, and shall not be assignable or transferable by an indorsement and delivered to any third party. Said certificate of the Superintendent shall be a sufficient voucher for the Comptroller to pass, and for the Treasurer, upon the order of the Second Comptroller, to pay the same."

I think, according to this law, I was not mistaken at all.

Mr. STANTON. I intended simply to say that the duty of the Superintendent is to supervise the public printing, and to see that the same is properly executed, and according to the terms of the law. He draws no money out of the Treasury, and he has no money at his command.

Mr. HAVEN. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] will be kind enough to send me the statute from which he read, I will add a few words in reference to this matter.

During the last Congress I happened to be a member of the Joint Committee on Printing. That committee during that Congress was rather a lively committee—at least its duties were quite thankless and very arduous, and it became possessed of some information in reference to the printing law of 1852 that may be of service to the House now.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, the increased force provided for in this bill is necessary. I regret to say it, sir, for I regret the increase of the number of employees of the Government; but a due regard to the transaction of the business cast upon the Superintendent of Public Printing, I think, demands the passage of this bill.

In addition, sir, to the general information acquired last Congress, in my service upon the Committee on Printing, I have taken special pains, and made particular inquiries in reference to this matter, since the bill has lain upon your table.

There is some point and merit, sir, in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones,] that the Superintendent of Printing might well be placed under the general supervision of the Department of the Interior. Still, sir, I think the gentleman's motion is at war with the general spirit of the printing act of 1852. It will be seen, by reference to that act, that it was manifestly the intention of Congress in passing it that the Superintendent of Printing should be an officer of the two Houses of Congress—the intention most evidently was that the printing of the two Houses should be under their own charge, and that the two Houses should not be under the direction or control of, or in any way dependent upon, or beholden to, any Department, any bureau, or any man or set of men whatever, for their printing, with the single exception of their own Superintendent of Printing. The Superintendent, and he alone, was to stand between us and the paper-makers on one hand, and between us and the public printer on the other.

Let me make another remark here, sir, in relation to that printing law; and whether right or wrong, it shows that Congress did not intend that any Department should intervene or control the Superintendent.

The third section of the law, which was partly read by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] makes the Superintendent the person to inspect the papers and the printing, and then to audit and settle the accounts of the public printer; and it goes still further, and provides what I think is objectionable, (if there is anything that is objectionable in that third section.) It provides, in substance, that his certificate shall be, in and of itself, a sufficient warrant or voucher upon which to get the money named in it from the Treasury, without any essential control in any quarter whatever.

It may be, sir, that this third section should be amended. In fact, in my judgment, it ought to be. I was opposed to it, as giving too plenary a power to the Superintendent, when the law was passed; but it is, in my opinion, quite conclusive that the spirit of that act was in opposition to the views now entertained by my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones.]

I think there can be no reasonable doubt that it was the object of the last Congress, in passing that section, that Congress itself should have and keep the control of the printing, and of paying for it, and settling the accounts for printing through its own Superintendent.

After providing, in substance, that it shall, among other things, be the duty of the Superintendent to receive all matter ordered by the Senate and House to be printed, and also all matter ordered to be printed by the heads of Departments, and bureaus, and to keep a faithful account of the same in a given way; that he shall deliver it to the public printer, or printers; that he shall inspect the work when executed, and record, in books kept for the purpose, the dates of its return, and whether executed in a neat and workmanlike manner, upon the paper furnished by him to the public printer, and the amount allowed for the printing; that it shall be his duty to supervise the public printing, to inspect the work when executed, to see it is done with neatness and dispatch, and to report all failures by the printer to the Joint Committee on Printing; most of which was read by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston.] This third section goes on to say:

"He (the Superintendent) shall issue his certificate for the amount due to the public printer for such work as shall have been faithfully executed, which certificate shall be made payable to the public printer at the Treasury of the United States, and shall not be assignable or transferable by endorsement or delivery to any third person. Said certificate of the Superintendent."

Yes, sir, of the Superintendent; so the section reads—

"shall be a sufficient voucher for the Comptroller to pass, and for the Treasurer, upon the order of the Second Comptroller, to pay the same."

Such, sir, was the judgment; such was the language of the Congress which passed that bill. I again submit, they did not intend to leave their Superintendent subject to any Department or bureau.

So much with reference to the instructions to go to the committee with this bill, as proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Now, sir, a few words in reference to the increase of force proposed by this bill. I regret that the necessities of the case requires it at the hands of the House. I have as little inclination to give it, if unnecessary, as any member here; but there is a vast amount of labor cast upon this Superintendent, and he wants skill as well as labor. I recollect, sir, I offered a joint resolution at the short session of the last Congress, to give the then Superintendent of Public Printing two clerks and a messenger. Mr. Towers was then Superintendent, and he needed the help, although he was a very capable and quite competent man for the business.

I well remember my joint resolution was opposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Richardson,] and he carried the feelings and the sense of the House with him, upon the ground that it would be establishing a bureau. He defeated the resolution; but upon a reconsideration, on a subsequent day, the resolution was passed. The Senate concurred in it, and the clerks and messengers were employed; but the resolution got mislaid in the Senate, and never was presented to the President for his signature.

Since that time, sir, we have added very materially to the duties of the Superintendent, some of which additional duties I will mention, and then leave the subject with the House.

We provided in one section of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill of last year, that he shall supervise and inspect all the binding of documents ordered by both Houses.

The printing that he has supervised at the public printers, goes from there, by his direction, to the binders. The public binder, after he has bound the work, delivers it to the Superintendent of Public Printing here at the folding room. Then the Superintendent examines and inspects the work, and decides and certifies whether the printing and binding have been done according to the contracts with the printer and with the binder.

After this has all been performed, the Superintendent, I understand—and no doubt such is his duty—counts all the books that have been delivered, and certifies to the number. That certificate is one of the certificates provided for in the third section, which I have read. Without that certificate neither the printer nor the binder can get one cent of their pay. This duty alone very materially increases the labors to be performed by this officer.

There is another subject, sir, which is the source of considerable labor and annoyance to the Superintendent of Public Printing. I refer to the engraving. There is a large amount of engraving done by order of Congress. I believe it is all contracted for by the Committee on Engraving, without the aid or interference of the Superintendent. Under their contracts the engravings are delivered here in boxes. Some are brought to the lower rooms of this House, some are sent to the binders, and some to the public printers. The Superintendent, by the provision in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, already referred to, is bound to take charge of this branch of business, and to receive, inspect, and take care of this public property, and be responsible for it. And when he begins to look about him, finds some of it in one place, and some in another. He collects it as best he can, counts the sheets; and if they do not hold out, we suffer loss to that amount.

For these various reasons—and I have endeavored to make the statement as short as I could—I think this increase of force should be granted to this officer. I think the present Superintendent, though lacking the experience of the late Superintendent in reference to doing business in Washington, is inclined to discharge his duties as well as he knows how; but I believe he will not be able to get along with his present force. I have deemed it my duty to say this much. Although I am opposed to giving an unnecessary number of clerks to this officer, I believe that a proper regard to the transaction of the business of the House, and of Congress, requires that this force should be increased.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Before the gentleman from New York yields the floor, I wish to ask him one question. The gentleman is somewhat conversant with this subject, and says that some additional force is necessary. Now, I wish to ask him whether it is an increase of clerical force that the Superintendent needs, or whether it is not a practical printer?

Mr. HAVEN. I have no doubt, if this bill passes, the Superintendent of the Public Printing would act most wisely if he employed practical printers under it as clerks.

Mr. JONES. I ask the gentleman whether it is clerks that are needed? I ask him whether it is clerical duties which they are unable to perform, or whether, if additional force is needed at all, the Superintendent does not need the services of a practical printer to assist him in seeing that the business of Superintendent is properly done?

Mr. HAVEN. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that, if the services of a practical printer are needed, this bill will enable him to select as his additional clerks practical printers, and men competent, also, to discharge clerical duties. I should recommend him, by all means, to select good, practical printers and clerical business men. I think, Mr. Speaker, this bill ought to pass.

Mr. HIBBARD. Whether the alteration suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] ought to be made or not, I am not prepared to say. It may be that changes are needed, and ought to be made; but now is not the time, nor is it the proper manner in which to go into this investigation. We have been told that more force of some kind is needed in the office of the Superintendent of the Public Printing. So the committees in the Senate and in the House have informed us, and so the gentleman from New York [Mr. Haven] has informed us.

It will be remembered, also, that we have now two public printers, one for the House, and one for the Senate; and it is understood that that adds materially to the business of the office. We have ordered an unusually large amount of public printing for this period of the session; and for this, and other reasons which I do not understand to be controverted, it seems that there should be an additional force; and if clerks who understand printing practically are needed, it is to be presumed that such will be appointed. I hope that the instructions of the gentleman from Tennessee will not be agreed to, as the subject can be taken up at some other time, and the requisite changes in the law made.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I threw in a little opposition to this resolution the other day, but I am so well satisfied by the statements that have been made all around me that it ought to pass that I content myself with moving the previous question, as the amendments to the law can be made hereafter.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he intends to vote for the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. CLINGMAN. No; I shall vote against the instructions. We can amend the law hereafter, if necessary.

Mr. JONES. It is necessary to hurry through this resolution. Some persons are waiting for these two offices. (A laugh.)

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, called for tellers on the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FLORENCE and FAULKNER were appointed.

The question was then put; and the tellers reported—86 in the affirmative. A further count was not insisted on.

So the previous question received a second.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and, on a division, there were—ayes 51, noes 72.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered; and the Speaker therefore decided that the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded tellers on his motion to commit, with instructions.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FLORENCE and FAULKNER were appointed.

The question was taken, and the motion was disagreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 41, noes not counted.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read a third time.

Mr. JONES demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution, and they were ordered.

Mr. LILLY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was disagreed to.

The question was then taken upon the passage of the resolution, and there were—ayes 97, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Appleton, Banks, Belcher, Benson, Bissell, Chandler, Chastain, Chrisman, Chismann, Cox, Crocker, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dickinson, Disney, Dowdell, Dunbar, Eddy, Edmunds, Everhart, Farley, Faulkner, Flagler, Florence, Franklin, Fuller, Gamble, Giddings, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Grow, Aaron Harlan, Hastings, Havea, Henn, Hibbard, Hill, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Ingersoll, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, Kerr, Kittredge, Knox, Latham, Lindley, McNair, Maxwell, Mayall, Midesworth, John G. Miller, Murray, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Mordcaai Oliver, Orr, Peck, Peckham, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Pratt, Preston, Pringle, Riddle, David Ritchie, Robbins, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Seymour, Simmons, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Richard H. Stanton, Andrew Stuart, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Tweed, Upham, Vail, Walbridge, Walker, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Hendrick B. Wright, and Yates—97.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ball, Barry, Boyce, Brooks, Bugg, Campbell, Caruthers, Clark, Cobb, Cowin, Craigie, Cullom, John G. Davis, Edgerton, English, Ewing, Goode, Hamilton, Sampson W. Harris, Hendricks, Houston, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Lamb, Letcher, Lilly, Lindsey, McCulloch, McMullin, McQueen, Macy, Matteson, May, Smith Miller, Millson, Morgan, Morrison, Nichols, Noble, John Perkins, Ready, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Ruffin, Sage, Seward, Shaw, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Straub, Trout, Vansant, Wade, Walsh, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, and Zollicoffer—61.

So the resolution was passed.

Mr. MURRAY. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put, and the latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that the House adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly, at three o'clock and forty-five minutes, adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 7, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, announcing that its Speaker had signed an enrolled bill giving further time for satisfying claims for bounty lands, and for other purposes; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. HUNTER presented the petition of Edward Rudd, of Elizabeth City county, Virginia, heir of Edward Rudd, deceased, praying compensation for negroes taken from his father by the British forces in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WALKER presented a memorial of citizens of Washington, praying that measures be taken for the early introduction of the Russ pavement upon Pennsylvania avenue; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have in my hand five memorials, signed by officers and soldiers of the war of 1812. They pray that the bounty land law may be so amended as to grant bounty land to all those who have performed actual service under the State or the United States Government in any war since 1776. I move the reference of these memorials to the Committee on Public Lands.

They were so referred.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Mary Carlton, widow of Moses Carlton, a soldier in the war of the Revolution, praying to be placed on the pension list, under the act of July 7, 1838; which, together with the petition and papers in the same case before presented, on the files of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BRIGHT presented two petitions of owners of property and residents in the District of Columbia, praying that George W. Yerby and others be authorized to construct a railroad from Georgetown to the navy-yard, in the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Barton Ricketson, praying remuneration for his services and expenses in removing wrecks at the Delaware breakwater; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. GWIN presented the petition of the heirs of Brigadier General Richard B. Mason, of the Army, praying certain allowances in the settlement of his accounts as civil and military governor of California; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CHASE presented two petitions of citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying the aid of Government in the construction of a new canal around the falls of the Ohio, on the Indiana side of the river; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the petition of Mrs. M. Van Ness, praying that whatever amount may be allowed on the claim of her late husband, C. P. Van Ness, may be paid to her, and not to the administrators; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Otway H. Berryman be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, it was Ordered, That the memorial of the Broad Street Bridge Company, of Nashville, Tennessee, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. DAWSON, it was Ordered, That the documents on the files of the Senate relating to the claim of John Shley be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

On motion by Mr. SMITH, it was Ordered, That the petition of John F. Webb, the petition of Robert Steele, and the petition of Lucretia W. Hubbard, and other heirs of Elijah Ransom, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred three petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying that the unsold public lands in that State may be granted for the use of public schools therein, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following petitions, submitted adverse reports thereon:

Petition of Claudia Stuart, praying a pension for the loss of her son James Stuart, who was killed in battle;

Petition of Sophia G. Dillingham, praying a pension on account of the services of her father, Elisha Dillingham, during the war of the Revolution; and the Petition of Edward Wheeler, praying a pension in consideration of the services of his father, Samuel Wheeler, during the war of the Revolution.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the documents in relation to the claim of Thomas B. Parsons for arrears of pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill to authorize the payment of invalid pensions in certain cases, submitted a report recommending its passage; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Amos Knapp, praying that the pension allowed him may be made to commence from the 3d of April, 1848, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Maria Morell, widow of the late Hon. George Morell, one of the judges of the supreme court of Michigan Territory, praying compensation for the services of her late husband as a member of the board for the adjustment of land titles in Detroit, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill to provide compensation for the services of George Morell in adjusting titles to land in Michigan; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

SENATE CONTINGENT FUND.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the message from the House, announcing that they had receded from their first, third, fourth, fifth, and seventh amendments, agreed to the amendment of the Senate to their sixth amendment, and insisted upon their second amendment to the Senate bill, to regulate the disbursement of the contingent fund of the Senate, and for other purposes.

The amendments from which the House recede, are the following:

The first is to strike out of the first section of the bill, which is as follows:

"That all moneys which have been, or may hereafter be, appropriated for the compensation of members and officers, and for the contingent expenses of the Senate, shall be paid out of the Treasury on requisition drawn by the Secretary of the Senate, and shall be kept, disbursed, and accounted for by him according to law; and the said Secretary shall be deemed a disbursing officer, and shall be allowed the sum of $1,000 per annum as a compensation, over and above his salary as Secretary of the Senate, for the duties hereby imposed upon him."

—the words "and officers, and for the contingent expenses."

The third is in the second section of the bill, which is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the bond now required by law to be given by the Secretary of the Senate, he shall give bond to the United States, within ten days after the passage of this act, with one or more sureties, to be approved by the Comptrollers of the Treasury, in the penal sum of $20,000, with condition for the faithful application and disbursement of such funds as may be drawn from the Treasury under this act, which bond shall be deposited in the Comptrollers' office; and it shall be the duty of each and every Secretary of the Senate who may hereafter be chosen, to give bond as aforesaid, within thirty days after he enters upon the duties of his office, and before making any requisition as aforesaid."

—to insert the words "in addition to," in place of the words "in lieu of."

The fourth and fifth is in the second section, in the clause "to be approved by the Comptrollers of the Treasury;" after the words "by the" to insert "First," so that it shall make the bond to be given "to be approved by the First Comptroller of the Treasury;" and also to insert "First" before "Comptroller" where it subsequently occurs.

The seventh was in the title of the bill.

The amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to which the House agree, was to amend the sixth amendment of the House, which was to strike out the third section of the bill, as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That the accounts of the Secretary of the Senate, of his disbursements of moneys on account of the contingent expenses of the Senate, when passed by the committee to audit and control such contingent expenses, and certified to have been so passed by the chairman of such committee, shall be deemed and held conclusive by all the officers of the Treasury Department,"

—by substituting for it the following:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said Secretary of the Senate to deposit the moneys aforesaid which may come into his hands with a depository, who may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, for other disbursing officers in the city of Washington; and all payments on account of the pay or mileage of members of the Senate, and all payments of their officers and for the contingent expenses of the Senate, shall be by drafts drawn by the Secretary on such depository.

And the second amendment of the House upon which they insist, is to strike out of the first section the following words:

"And shall be allowed the sum of $1,000 per annum, as a compensation, over and above his salary as Secretary of the Senate, for the duties hereby imposed upon him."

The pending question was on the motion of Mr. HUNTER, that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the House.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I would like to know the purport of that from which we are asked to recede.

Mr. HUNTER. The section from which it is proposed we shall recede, is that which allows $1,000 additional compensation to the Secretary of the Senate. The House moved, as an amendment, to strike out that clause. We disagree to their amendment. They have now agreed to all of the bill except that, and I moved to recede from our disagreement to that amendment.

Mr. BADGER. I moved an adjournment yesterday evening when this question came up, with the view of inquiring whether it was proper that the Senate should take a stand in favor of their original proposition. I am willing to recede, as we can provide for this out of our contingent fund hereafter.

The motion to recede was agreed to.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I stated last evening, before we adjourned, that I would confer with the Senators friendly to this bill, and propose an amendment to obviate the objections which had been made in reference to the phraseology of that portion of the bill relating to the compromise measures of 1850, and yet to carry out the idea and intention of the framers of the bill. I have drawn an amendment which I believe meets the general approbation of the friends of the measure. I therefore now move to amend the 14th section of the substitute reported, by striking out the words —“which [the Missouri compromise act] was superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, and is hereby declared inoperative,” and inserting

33d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

NEW SERIES...No. 23.

—which being inconsistent with the principles of non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories, as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, is hereby declared inoperative and void, it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

I move that amendment, with the general concurrence of the friends of the measure. It will apply to both Territories.

Mr. EVERETT. I am desirous before the vote is taken on this amendment, or at any rate before a decisive vote is taken on any part of this bill, to have an opportunity of submitting to the Senate the grounds on which I have found myself unable, both as a member of the Committee on Territories and as a member of this body, to give my support to the bill as it has been reported, and as I believe it will stand if the amendment which is now offered shall prevail.

I have been unable, from hearing the amendment read from the Chair, and from a cursory inspection of it, for which I am indebted to the courtesy of the chairman of the Committee on Territories, to apprehend thoroughly its extent and the effect which it will have upon the portion of the bill to which it relates.

I do not therefore feel prepared, on the spur of the moment, to enter into a discussion of that amendment, or of the part of the bill to which it refers. It is not my intention, sir, at any time or any stage of this discussion, as it appears now likely to be conducted, to enter into an elaborate discussion of all the points connected with this great territorial question, either in themselves, or as they have been raised thus far in debate. They are very grave questions, and they will require a great deal of time for their proper and thorough examination—much more time than I have been able to give to them under the pressure of other business under which we all labor, and in the short time, I must say, that has elapsed since the measure has been brought into the Senate. But, sir, I am desirous, and I consider it to be my duty (my position, as an humble member of the Committee on Territories, makes it such) to assign, as briefly as I can, the reasons which prevent me giving my support to the bill as I understand it, after this amendment shall be adopted, as I presume, from the statements made by the chairman of the committee, it is the result of his conferences with the friends of the bill, and will, in all human probability, be adopted. I should like, therefore, a little time to look into this amendment, and see precisely how far it goes, and what its bearing is on the sections to which it will be applied. For that reason I should take it to be a kindness if the Senate would postpone the further consideration of the subject till to-morrow.

I feel that I cannot do justice to the subject or to myself, if I should go on with the discussion now, after the little opportunity which I have had, and I will add, which any member of the Senate has had—except those who have been privately consulted on the subject—to ascertain precisely what the amount, the purport, and the bearing of this amendment is. I am, however, at the disposal of the Senate. If they do not feel warranted in granting me the indulgence which I ask, I shall endeavor to go on at the present time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I have no

disposition to hurry this bill in such a manner as to deprive every Senator who may desire to do so, of the opportunity of expressing his opinions upon it. I may now say to the Senate, that the statements which were made, and which went forth through the press, that I expected and tried to get a vote on Saturday last—as every member of the Senate knows—are entirely unfounded. I never proposed any such thing. I stated then that it was the object of the committee and of the friends of this measure, to give an opportunity for full and free discussion, but to keep up the bill as the order of the day until we should get through with it. If the Senator from Massachusetts is not ready now to go on, it does not necessarily follow that the bill ought to be postponed. There are other Senators here certainly who have had abundance of time to be prepared on this occasion, whose avocation it is to be prepared on all questions of this character; and I do not see why the bill should be postponed now, as it was last week, because a particular Senator may not be ready.

We shall all hear the Senator from Massachusetts with a great deal of pleasure. The Senate always listens to him with pleasure whenever he speaks. I am willing, however, to say now, that if the Senate will come to an understanding that on Saturday next the vote shall be taken on this bill, I shall be content, and gentlemen can speak or not between now and then, as they please.

But, sir, it is stated in the newspapers opposed to the bill, that the policy of its opponents is to procure its postponement from day to day, and to keep it up during the whole session. When that notice is proclaimed to the country through the leading newspapers opposed to the measure, I do not think its friends are called upon to agree to its postponement at the suggestion of one Senator and then of another, and thus carry out the object of those who are opposed to the bill. Certainly there are Senators here who are prepared to go on, and I hope the discussion will now proceed, and that the Senator from Massachusetts will have the time and the opportunity of speaking when he shall be prepared.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I propose, if an opportunity shall be afforded, to speak upon this bill myself. I am as well prepared to vote upon it now as I shall be after I have addressed the Senate; but I wish to assign the reasons for my vote to the Senate, and they can judge whether they are sufficient or insufficient to justify me in the course which I shall take. I have not conferred with any gentleman in this body in relation to the postponement of the bill. I have no desire to postpone it for one moment longer than I think is necessary to a fair discussion of it. I will not enter into any combination for the purpose of retarding its passage or delaying its progress; but, at the same time, I believe some importance has attached to it, not alone from the newspapers—for I do not go there for my information, and I do not care what they may say. I shall not heed their remarks in regard to the course which I deem it proper to take. I shall take my course, with reference to the importance of the subject itself, permitting no extraneous considerations to control my action.

I do not perceive the necessity of urgency on this occasion. As newspapers have been referred to, I must say that the understanding which I have derived from that source is, that a decided majority is in favor of the passage of the bill; and as there is no expectation that any important change will take place in the sense or opinions of the body, I think it is but fair that the minority should be heard with some degree of patience and indulgence, if necessary.

Entertaining these views, Mr. President, in relation to the bill, I feel that to deprive any member opposed to it of a fair opportunity of presenting his opinions to the Senate and to the country, if you please, would be to deprive him of a right which pertains to every member of this body, unless it were ascertained that his opposition to it arose from factious feeling, and a disposition to embarrass legislation. I have no such feeling, and

I will entertain none. I deem this a subject of vast importance; and as I am to be one of the actors in it, I must be permitted, and I trust I shall be permitted, to submit such views as I have on the subject in vindication of the course which I may adopt relative to the sentiments and opinions of my constituency. It is the right of every Senator.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to make a simple suggestion in regard to this bill, and it is this: that we proceed now to perfect the bill. Let us take all the preliminary votes to-day to perfect the bill, as it will be pressed upon the attention of the Senate; and then, having perfected the bill as it is to be presented to the Senate and the country by the committee responsible for it, the discussion can go on, on the general measure, with the understanding that the bill thus perfected is the one which is to be voted for by its friends.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the amendment reported by the Committee on Territories in the form of a substitute.

Mr. RUSK. Has there been a motion to postpone?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir.

Mr. RUSK. Then, as a matter of courtesy towards the Senator from Massachusetts, I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow. I understood from that Senator that he desired to speak on this amendment. It is an important amendment, and I understood him to say very distinctly that he wished to speak upon it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not so understand the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BROWN. I certainly understood him to suggest that as a ground for postponement.

Mr. RUSK. If he did I shall certainly be willing to grant him the courtesy he asks. It is upon the ground of courtesy that I move the postponement, and not with a desire to delay the bill. If a motion were made with that purpose I should oppose it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If I had understood the Senator from Massachusetts as desiring to speak on the amendment, instead of on the bill, I should not have proposed to take a vote upon the amendment until after his speech. I supposed it was his desire to speak on the general subject of the bill; and hence it was that I supposed we could probably go on to-day and perfect the bill, and that that course would not interfere with his speech hereafter on the general subject.

Mr. EVERETT. I did state, certainly, that I wished to understand what the amendment was before I should address the Senate upon the subject. I should conceive that every member of the body would wish to know what the amendment is, particularly before he gives a vote upon it. Those who have had an opportunity to examine it beforehand may be prepared, but what member of the body now can tell precisely what the amendment of the honorable Senator is, or at least what its effect is to be upon the bill?

Mr. BADGER. I hope there will not be the smallest hesitation on the part of the Senate in granting the favor which is asked by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PETTIT. It will be better to have the amendment printed.

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest, also, that I learn from my friend from Georgia there are several amendments to be proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it would be proper that those amendments should be laid upon the table informally, and ordered to be printed; so that we may know exactly the position in which it is proposed to put the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope then that the amendments which are to be offered by the Committee on Indian Affairs will be presented now; otherwise, when every amendment comes in, it will be said that Senators have not had time to examine it. I have never before known a postponement asked when every amendment was presented.

Mr. TOOMBS. The amendments which are to be offered by the Committee on Indian Affairs will not require five minutes for their disposition. They can be understood immediately. The object of them is to protect the rights of the Indians. They need no time, no delay for their consideration. So far as the Committee on Indian Affairs are concerned they do not wish any delay; they prefer to have the matter decided.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I so understood the purpose of that committee, and I did not intend to reflect on them at all.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The amendments which are intended to be offered by the Committee on Indian Affairs are already reduced to form, and are very slight and unimportant; they are mere matters of detail, and I am ready, as chairman of that committee, to offer them at any time; and if there be no pending amendments before the Senate I will offer them now.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to postpone.

Mr. SEWARD. I will suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that he can offer his amendments informally, and have them laid upon the table and printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Is there any amendment now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending, offered by the Senator from Illinois, to the amendment reported by the Committee on Territories as a substitute.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Then I will ask the consent of the Senate to enable me now to offer informally, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, the amendments which I intend, at the proper time, to submit. In the first place, our proposition is to strike out the nineteenth, twentieth, thirty-ninth, and fortieth sections of the substitute reported by the Committee on Territories. They make an appropriation of $100,000 for one Territory, and $200,000 for the other, to enable the President to commence negotiations with the Indians for the extinguishment of their title to lands within the limits of the proposed Territories. These are the provisions of the nineteenth and thirty-ninth sections. The twentieth and fortieth sections provide for vesting the Governors of each Territory with the duties of Superintendent of Indian Affairs. The proposition of the Committee on Indian Affairs, therefore, is to strike out the sections which contain the appropriations to which I have referred, and to strike out the provision conferring the office of Superintendent of Indian Affairs upon the Governors; and, in order to supply the defect which will be created by that action, to offer a provision that the exercise of the functions of the administration of Indian affairs shall be continued by the superintendencies and agencies now established by law. That provision will be in the shape of an additional section, as follows:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That all treaties, laws, and other engagements made by the Government of the United States with the Indian tribes inhabiting the Territory embraced within this bill shall be faithfully and rigidly observed, notwithstanding anything contained in this act; and that the existing agencies and superintendencies of said Indians be continued with the same powers and duties which are now prescribed by law, except that the President of the United States may, at his discretion, change the locations of the office of superintendent.

If the bill is to be postponed, I shall ask that the amendments be now printed informally. If the bill be not postponed, I shall offer these amendments to-day, after the amendment of the Senator from Illinois shall be disposed of.

Mr. CLAYTON. I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question: Do I understand him aright when I understand him to propose to amend the bill so as to deprive the President of the United States of the power of negotiating with the Indians in Nebraska for the cession of their lands to the United States?

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Two of the sections which I propose to strike out confer expressly upon the President the power to negotiate with the Indians within the respective Territories. So far as that provision is concerned, it is mere surplusage. The law, as it now exists, empowers the President, at all times, to negotiate with the Indians. But, to answer the Senator from Delaware more fully, I will say that, although we propose to strike out those sections of the bill which confer upon the President the power to negotiate, and which make an appropriation to enable him to carry out that power; yet we expect, at the earliest moment, to offer to the appropriation bill provisions containing the appropriations which we deem suitable for the purpose. I will remark, further, that if the appropriations now contained in these sections are retained, and are intended merely to apply to the object of enabling the President to open negotiations with the Indians, they are far too large. If, on the contrary, the object is to enable him to carry out the treaties that may be made, the appropriations are entirely too small.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was, perhaps, not understood by the honorable Senator; but if I do understand him, I am glad to hear that the sections which propose to negotiate the Indians out of the reservations made in their favor, in what is called the Territory of Nebraska, are to be left out.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. That is true.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am glad of it, because I think that will remove a very great objection to the bill itself—an objection which would have been fatal with me if there had been no amendment.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I believe it is always the custom when a bill is presented here by a committee to allow that committee to perfect the measure for the consideration of the Senate. Now, if I understand the honorable Senator from Arkansas, the chairman of the Committee on Territories, and that committee have no objection to this amendment, therefore it is part of the system of perfecting the bill. We wish the bill to be perfected, so that it can be brought directly before the Senate for its consideration, as the particular bill upon which we shall be called upon to vote.

There are some Senators here who do not intend to speak on this question at all, but they intend to vote. I am one of them. I have nothing to say in regard to the question at all. I am prepared to vote, and I do not think it necessary to give the reasons for my vote. It is very plain to my mind how I should vote, and I shall not trouble the Senate with my reasons. I am anxious to vote on these preliminary questions; and inasmuch as I knew there would be a great many speeches, I thought it would be one of the best occasions which I could have to attend to some little private business out of the city. I thought that if we could get through with the preliminary votes to-day, discussion could afterwards go on upon the general subject, and I should then be enabled to be absent for several days without losing any time. I hope the bill will be perfected, so that it shall be brought before the Senate in the form in which it is to be pressed to a final vote.

Mr. DOUGLAS. So far as the provisions of this bill relate to Indian affairs, of course the Committee on Territories will at once accede to whatever provisions the Committee on Indian Affairs shall deem proper for the protection of the rights of the Indians. We take it for granted that they have given that subject the due deliberation which its importance requires, and of course the Committee on Territories will at once accede to the recommendations of that committee on that branch of the subject. If it is the desire of the Senate to act now upon the amendments of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I will withdraw my amendment temporarily, and merely lay it upon the table informally, as one which I intend to offer, and then the Senate can proceed with the amendments of the Senator from Arkansas. I modify the motion in that way, and ask for an order to print my proposed amendment.

The PRESIDENT. Then the Senator withdraws his amendment, and submits it informally, and asks that it may be printed?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RUSK. I withdraw my motion to postpone.

The amendment of Mr. DOUGLAS was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I understand now that the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Territories is, for the occasion, withdrawn. I therefore move formally now the amendment which I have already submitted, to strike out the nineteenth and twentieth, and also the thirty-ninth and fortieth sections of the substitute, which are as follows:

“Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to enter into negotiation with the Indian tribes of the said Territory of Nebraska, for the purpose of securing the assent of said tribes to the settlement of the citizens of the United States upon the lands claimed by said Indians, and for the purpose of extinguishing the title of said Indian tribes in whole or in part to said lands; and that, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this section, the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

“Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That so soon as the Governor of said Territory of Nebraska shall enter upon the discharge of his duties as such, the superintendency of Indian affairs at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, shall be abolished, and the duties shall be transferred to and performed by the said Governor of Nebraska, so far as they relate to, or are to be performed within the said Territory.”

“Sec. 39. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to enter into negotiation with the Indian tribes of the said Territory of Kansas, for the purpose of securing the assent of said tribes to the settlement of the citizens of the United States upon the lands claimed by said Indians, and for the purpose of extinguishing the title of said Indian tribes in whole or in part to said lands; and that, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this section, the sum of $200,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

“Sec. 40. And be it further enacted, That so soon as the Governor of said Territory of Kansas shall enter upon the discharge of his duties as such, the superintendency of Indian affairs at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, shall be abolished, and the duties shall be transferred to and performed by the said Governor of Kansas, so far as the same relate to, or are to be performed within the said Territory,” —and to insert in lieu of them the following additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That all treaties, laws, and other engagements made by the Government of the United States with the Indian tribes inhabiting the territory embraced within this bill, shall be faithfully and rigidly observed, notwithstanding anything contained in this act, and that the existing agencies and superintendencies of said Indians be continued, with the same powers and duties which are now prescribed by law, except that the President of the United States may, at his discretion, change the locations of the office of superintendent.

A word of explanation is due, probably, to the Senate, in order to state the reasons why the Committee on Indian Affairs have deemed it proper to recommend the striking out of the nineteenth, twentieth, thirty-ninth, and fortieth sections of the substitute reported by the Committee on Territories.

The subject-matter embraced in the nineteenth and twentieth sections in relation to Nebraska, and the corresponding thirty-ninth and fortieth sections in reference to Kansas, contain appropriations to enable the President to extinguish the Indian title to the lands in those Territories. That whole subject, embracing the policy which is to be maintained by this Government towards the Indians in the future, the relations which are to subsist between the United States and the Indians, and, in fact, the whole subject of the administration of Indian affairs in general, is before the Committee on Indian Affairs at this time.

The committee are maturing a policy which they wish to submit to the Senate at a very early day, and that policy directly affects the terms and the conditions upon which the title of the Indians to the lands guaranteed to them by treaty, within the proposed limits of these Territories, is to be extinguished. We propose, therefore, for the purpose of leaving the discussions and investigations of that committee free and untrammelled in relation to the subject-matter of these sections, that they be entirely withdrawn from the bill; because to the extent that this bill may make provision upon that subject, it will interfere with, and to the same extent cramp, the hands of the committee in the provisions which they expect to submit for the consideration of the Senate hereafter.

We thought it more appropriate, therefore, that the bill should be perfected in this body, and go to the other House free, at present, from those subjects which are extraneous to it; and that it should provide merely for those matters of legislation which are usual in the constitution and frame of territorial bills; and that so much of it as embraces the policy which this Government in future is to maintain towards the Indians in general, and particularly towards the tribes embraced within the limits of these Territories, shall be a subject for future discussion. It is with that object alone that I am instructed to move the striking out of these sections.

The amendment to strike out the nineteenth and twentieth sections was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question will now be on the remainder of the amendment, to strike out the thirty-ninth and fortieth sections, and insert in lieu of them the additional section which has been read.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, if I understand it, I entirely approve the object of the amendment. The honorable Senator from Arkansas said he would agree to strike out these provisions in the bill, in order that they might in future become subjects of discussion here. I do not know that this subject will ever be discussed again; but if the proposition shall ever be made while I am here to drive these Indians, who have heretofore been expelled from the States this side of the Mississippi river, from the territory to which they emigrated in the year 1830, in opposition to all the treaties which we have made with them, I shall be ready to meet any person in debate who contends that they ought to be driven from this, which I consider their final resting place.

I am glad that the provisions in the bill upon this subject are about to be stricken out. We are under treaty stipulations with these Indians. I remember well when those treaties were entered into by the Senate of the United States in years gone by, when I was a member of the body. Under these treaties, guarantees, of the most explicit and of the strongest character, were given to the Indians that they should never be interfered with or embraced within any State or Territory. I trust we shall be permitted now to let these treaties remain in force. The bill, as I understand it, will, by the adoption of this amendment, be free from all objections touching the Indians. I hope that no effort will be made hereafter to disturb them in the possession of their territory, which has been guaranteed to them by treaties.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand that the amendments of the Committee on Indian Affairs apply to both Territories—Nebraska and Kansas.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Certainly; they apply to both Territories.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As the bill before stood, the Governor of each Territory was made not only Governor, but Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and was allowed a salary of $1,500 for each capacity. Inasmuch as the superintendence of Indian affairs is taken from him by the amendment which has just been adopted, of course it will be necessary to amend the bill; for the sum of $1,500 per annum will not be sufficient for the salary of the Governor of a Territory. I move, therefore, to amend the substitute by striking out the provision for each Territory, "that the Governor shall receive $1,500 as such, and $1,500 as Superintendent of Indian Affairs," and to insert in lieu of it a provision that the salary of the Governor shall be $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. At the suggestion of the Committee on Indian Affairs, all the appropriations have been stricken out of the bill, except two small ones, I believe; and I now move to strike out all the appropriations in the bill. As part of the appropriations are to be left to the deficiency bill, or to one of the general appropriation bills, I prefer that all shall be together. I move, therefore, to strike out all the appropriations now contained in the substitute reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I now renew the amendment to the fourteenth section, which I withdrew before.

Mr. BADGER. Now, Mr. President, I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROADS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I ask the Senate now to take up the bill to aid the Territory of Minnesota in constructing a railroad for military, postal, and other purposes, reported from the Committee on Territories. It is a bill making precisely the same grant and in the same terms as that made by the bill of the Senator from Wisconsin, to aid the State of Wisconsin in the construction of a railroad from Chicago to Lake Superior.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope the Senate will proceed to the consideration of that bill. There will be no debate in regard to it. There has been none in regard to those which have been before us heretofore. It is for a Territory, and a Territory has no representative on this floor. It has been reported by the Committee on Territories, and it is framed in exact accordance with the model adopted, after full consideration, by the Committee on Public Lands of this and the other House.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill.

The Secretary was proceeding with the reading of the bill at length, when

Mr. JOHNSON said: The bill is precisely in the form of all preceding bills having like objects. It has been made to conform to the strictest regulations which have been adopted on full consideration by the committees of both Houses. They have acted jointly in this matter; and as the provisions of the bill are the same as are contained in the others, I see no necessity for reading it at length. Any question which may be asked I will answer.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to know whether this bill proposes to allow the lands to be selected anywhere?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; not except within the fifteen miles of the road—that is, outside of the six, and within nine miles. Beyond that they cannot go anywhere in the Territory at all. It is not designed in any of these railroad bills to allow them to go outside of the fifteen miles. This bill is identical with the bill which passed here the other day, which, I take it, was the most restricted form that ever was adopted. I move to dispense with the further reading of the bill, because we have had all the residue before. The only thing in which the other bills differ from this, is the description of the route, and that has been read already.

By unanimous consent the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. RUSK. I do not intend to interpose any objections to this bill; but what I would suggest to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, is the propriety of taking up all these railroad bills together. I have voted for every one which has passed, I believe. I think no better disposition of the public lands can be made. My opinion is that the policy ought to be adopted by this Government to encourage in every way, where she has public lands, railroads for the general benefit of the country. It improves the value of the land. I should, however, be glad to see the bills all come up together, otherwise one section gets the advantage of another, and one bill gets the advantage of another. My object is to suggest to my honorable friend from Arkansas the propriety of taking up these bills altogether, and making them special orders for some particular time.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will answer the honorable Senator from Texas thus: It will take but a moment more now to pass this bill. In regard to what he suggests of bringing them all up together, it cannot be done. They are not made the special order; and if we were inclined to make them the special orders, they could not come up for months to come. They ought to go to the House of Representatives as early as possible. In regard to the difficulty, or feeling, that may be created from the fact that one bill is brought forward before another, I will say that it is utterly impossible that they can be legislated upon in any other way than by bringing one bill up before another. Any jealousy that may exist in relation to the mere priority of introduction and passage of a bill is not worthy of consideration. I shall not press any bill for my own State, nor attempt to get any priority for it; but this is a territorial bill, and if any should have priority, it should be given by the Senate to the region of country and the people that have no Representative upon this floor. We can now pass this bill. It will not be debated, for I take it there can be no debate upon its principles; and at such a time as this, when there is a desultory species of business being taken up and disposed of in the Senate, the others will be passed as they are ready. They will be passed when opportunity presents itself in the morning hour, when no important measures are pressing upon the consideration of the Senate, and when the rules of the Senate will permit them to be taken up and disposed of. Thus no great measures will be obstructed, and we shall yet discharge our duty to a portion of unrepresented people in this body. The justice of this must be obvious.

With respect to the subject-matter of this bill, I will take this occasion to say, specifically, that the length of the road for which it provides is about three hundred miles, and the amount of land that will be granted by this bill is about one million acres. These are about the only material facts connected with it; for I have already stated that the bill is, in every other respect, precisely in the form adopted by the several committees of the House and Senate in full and joint consideration upon the subject.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire to ask the Senator what are the points named in the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. By the words of the bill the grant is to be made to the Territory of Minnesota for a railroad from the mouth of Left-Hand river, at the head of Lake Superior, via St. Paul, to the southern line of said Territory.

Mr. BRIGHT. Is it entirely within the Territory of Minnesota?

Mr. JOHNSON. Almost entirely, though the mouth is not.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the honorable Senator from Texas will not press the objection to the bill.

Mr. RUSK. I made no objection to the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. To give the whole route of the railroad, I will read the description of it in the bill:

"From the mouth of Left-Hand river, at the head of Lake Superior, via St. Paul, to the southern line of said Territory, with the privilege of extending the same to the northern terminus of the Illinois Central Railroad, on the Mississippi river."

Mr. BRIGHT. It is for land entirely within the Territory, and there is immediate necessity for it.

It differs entirely from the class of bills named by the honorable Senator from Texas, granting land to railroads running through the different States. I protest against this principle of hanging up one bill because there are others yet to come in. I am inclined to encourage the Committees on Territories and Public Lands in bringing forward these matters early; and I am willing to compensate them, as a price for their labor, by early action. In that way we get our bills at an early period, and are able to dispose of them. I hope no objection to the bill will be made.

Mr. RUSK. I made no objection, and so distinctly stated at the time.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable Senator from Texas made no objection.

Mr. RUSK. I simply suggested the propriety of acting on all together.

Mr. GWIN. I am not going to object to this bill, but I give notice that I shall hereafter move that the remaining railroad bills be made the special order for Monday week, in order that we may dispose of them all at one time.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I believe it is the intention of the House of Representatives to fix a day this week for territorial business. If this be passed now, it may be acted on there.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

GRANTS OF LANDS FOR RAILROADS.

Mr. SLIDELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bill No. 77.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN. I now make the motion that that bill be postponed to, and made the special order for, Tuesday next. And I shall also move to have all the other land bills made the special order for the same time.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator from California will allow me to make a suggestion, I am certain he will not insist on that motion. If these bills be taken up on a particular day, and passed by the Senate, the order of priority that they have is lost in the House. They all go to the House the same day, and may be reported as one by the Secretary. It is not fair to the States. Now I am certain the Senator will not insist on his motion.

Mr. GWIN. I do not understand how that is. If a bill passes the Senate to-day, and goes to the House, it has a preference over one that will pass next week. Then I have a bill there which I want to pass as early as possible, and I want all to go together.

The PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SEWARD. What is its title?

The PRESIDENT. It is a bill granting to the State of Louisiana the right of way and a donation of public land for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Algiers, on the Mississippi river, to the Sabine river in said State. It has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment.

Mr. STUART. That is not the bill.

Mr. SLIDELL. The bill that I moved to take up is No. 87.

Mr. STUART. The bill referred to by the Senator from Louisiana is a bill introduced by me granting lands to the State of Michigan.

Mr. RUSK. I would ask the Senator if the road is in a state of construction?

Mr. STUART. One road provided for in the bill is; the other is not.

Mr. RUSK. There are two roads. My object in asking the question was this: I am anxious to vote for this bill; but where a road is begun in good faith, I want it encouraged, not delayed by legislation. There are two roads, to my certain knowledge, in operation, going through the public lands, which have been applying here for aid for three or four years. I have no interest in this matter, because the United States own no lands in my State. But for three or four years those roads have been asking Congress to make the usual grants of land to aid them, and have not yet succeeded. I do not exactly understand how the orders stand, but here these are to be delayed and a bill taken up to provide for a road which is not begun, about which we do not know anything—an imaginary road, so far as I am concerned. I do not like to abandon these roads which are actually in a state of progress, and which would be aided very much by a grant of the public lands, which are not at all valuable to the United States.

Mr. CASS. I have sat here and voted for every bill of this description, believing it best for the public interest connected with the lands. There are two or three or four States of this Union that have never had one acre of land granted to them. The State of Michigan has never had one acre. I think the State of Wisconsin has never had any; and I do not know whether the State of Iowa has had any to this day.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Never.

Mr. CASS. We have seen bill after bill passed; and session after session these three States have not been able, from one cause or another, to get their bills through the other House in time. And now the honorable Senator from Texas objects to the road not being begun. Why is it not begun? Because we have never had a bill passed.

Mr. RUSK. The Senator will allow me to explain. I do not object to that.

Mr. CASS. I beg your pardon.

Mr. RUSK. I am objecting to the abandoning of roads which have been begun—of withdrawing from them the grant of lands, and giving the preference to other bills where the roads have not yet been begun.

Mr. CASS. I thought the Senator objected to this bill.

Mr. RUSK. Not at all.

Mr. ADAMS. I move to dispense with the reading of the bill.

Mr. SLIDELL. The Secretary informs me, and I will now inform the honorable Senator from Michigan, that this bill is already passed. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT. There is too much confusion in the Chamber to enable the Senate to proceed with business. Senators will please to come to order.

Mr. STUART. I can assure the Senator that the bill has not passed.

Mr. CASS. I desire to say, that if the bill has passed, it is a good lesson to us all; there is not a member of the Senate who understands what is now going on in the Senate, the confusion is so great.

Mr. BADGER. I should like to know whether the bill has passed or not.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that it has passed.

Mr. SLIDELL. I move, then, to proceed to the consideration of bill No. 7, in the order of business No. 88.

Mr. BADGER. For fear of any mistake, I desire to ask if the bill which it is now proposed to take up has been passed? [Laughter.]

Mr. SLIDELL's motion was agreed to, and the bill granting to the State of Louisiana the right of way and a donation of public land for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Algiers, on the Mississippi river, to the Sabine river in the said State, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment in the form of a substitute.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will suggest that, inasmuch as this bill is identical in its features with that which we have just passed, and several other bills which have heretofore passed, with the exception solely of the terminal points of the roads, the reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

By unanimous consent the reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. DAWSON. I desire to make an inquiry of my friend from Louisiana, for information. I see the land is all going. I would like to know what is the length of this railroad?

Mr. SLIDELL. The road commences at Algiers, a point on the Mississippi immediately opposite the city of New Orleans, and extends to the Sabine. Its total length is something over 300 miles; but for 180 miles of the road I think there are no public lands to which the provisions of this bill will apply at all. All the lands from Algiers to Washington, 180 miles of the road, are either now cultivated, held under title by individuals, or have been ceded to the State as swamp lands, so that the provisions of this bill will not, in fact, apply to more than 120 miles of the road; and even on that portion of the road, all the land which is valuable is already alienated and belongs to individuals, or is pine lands, and of but very little value indeed.

Mr. STUART. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator in the midst of his statement, but I desire to say that bill No. 84 is not passed. Bill 87, which was passed, was a bill for the relief of Jacob Gideon.

Mr. SLIDELL. Well, let this bill pass now.

Mr. DAWSON. I want to ask my friend from Louisiana whether, when he cannot get the public land along that one hundred and eighty miles, he does not propose in his bill to take it in some other part of the State?

Mr. SLIDELL. I understand that we can only take this land within the range of fifteen miles on either side.

Mr. DAWSON. Except where the lands are already taken up. Then you can take the public lands next nearest to it.

Several SENATORS. No, no.

Mr. DAWSON. Then I ask my friend how he is to build these one hundred and seventy miles without any public lands?

Mr. SLIDELL. By the subscription of individuals of the State, and the State, we have already $4,000,000 subscribed for the road, and two hundred miles under contract, which will be completed in the course of next year.

Mr. DAWSON. This road is in a better condition than any other, for here is private capital obtained for the purpose of carrying it on; and the road thereby seems to have been surveyed, and the points to which it is to go are understood. I have less objection to this bill than to any which has been presented; but I do think it is surprising, when already bills to the amount of $350,000,000 in the public lands are now before one branch of Congress or the other, that this immense appropriation of the public lands—equivalent to money—should be permitted to go through here without observation. Now, I have proposed, time after time, and begged that the Committee on Public Lands would present some scheme by which even Congress itself may know how the public lands are to go. I profess, for one, not to understand it. There are one hundred and six bills in the two Houses connected with the public lands, making appropriations—according to a late estimate made by an individual—of $350,000,000 worth of public lands. Now, is not this an extraordinary spectacle, that we pass these bills in detail in the Senate, when the body itself does not know when the bill passed, and that a bill appropriating lands for three hundred miles shall be passed without ever being read in the body—a Senator rising in his place and saying it is in conformity with the principles of the other bills?

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWSON. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator says there are one hundred and six railroad bills pending in the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. DAWSON. I understand so. So it was stated the other day.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator not know well that many of those bills are multiplied upon some points, and actually some bills with very little variations to suit the fancies of members who introduce them?

Mr. DAWSON. The very object I have in view is to get at that.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I wish to ask the Senator, as he presents it as an objection, does he not know that it is utterly impossible that all, or anything like all of them, can pass? and does he not feel that upon us it bears somewhat hardly, to send out such a censure upon legislation here?

Mr. DAWSON. I will say to my friend that those are not questions, they are arguments. I say this, and I wish the Senate and the country to understand it, that this kind of legislation is inconsistent with the rights of the various States of this Union. It is in violation of the great principles of equality which the sovereignty of each State is entitled to have respected. It is taking the public lands and applying them for mere local purposes, without dividing in accordance with the principles of justice and equality. What I wish of the Senate and of the Committee on Public Lands is, that there should be presented to the body, by the committee, the propositions which are made for the disposition of the public lands.

My friend says that some of these bills may refer to the same track of railroads. That may be; and how are we to ascertain it, unless the Committee on Public Lands, to whom all these bills are referred, shall present to us the facts, that we may act understandingly? It is very easy to appropriate the whole of the public lands in this way. I do not censure the Representatives of the new States for it, if the Representatives of the old States are prepared to yield in this way, and sit quietly down and see it done. But I want to know what answer the Representatives of the old States can give to their constituents when they say to them, did not my money and my blood go for the acquisition of these public lands, as well as the new States? They reply "Yes." Then the question will be propounded, why did you sit quietly by and see those lands, which we have aided in purchasing in this way, thus distributed, while we gain no advantage from it?

Understand me, sir; I have no objection, particularly, to the bill of my friend from Louisiana. I believe it presents the best features of any bill that has yet been offered; but, at the same time, I submit to you, and to the Senate and the country, through you, Mr. President, if there ought not to be some equal and just distribution made of these lands? What justification can I give to the people, whom I, in part, represent, for standing by and thus seeing, if not $350,000,000 worth of land, at least $100,000,000 thus appropriated? Nobody can deny that there will be so many acres taken for the various railroads which are projected. If this were an appropriation of dollars and cents, we would be amazed and startled at the amount; but as it is in public lands—which I maintain are equivalent, in principle, to money—we stand by and suffer the thing to go on without observation. I repeat, the time has not come. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] notified the Senate that he intended to present a bill for the distribution of the public lands. Upon that distribution, as I have said before, I am prepared to do more than justice to the new States; I am prepared to give them public lands, for the purpose of carrying on some of these railroads, but I feel myself under no obligation to intersect the whole of these new States with railroads without any knowledge where they are to run, and for what purposes they are made. Do we not know that Illinois had one through the whole extent of her territory? Do we not know how these public lands have been disposed of? Do we not know now that they are in the hands of private companies, who will make immense fortunes by them? I do not blame the State of Illinois for it. She has done what every other State would have done. She owes much to the zeal, energy, and vigilance of her Senators here and her Representatives in the other House. But is that a reason why we should stand by and suffer others to come in, in the same manner? We had better at once, rather than have this kind of legislation, surrender the whole of the public lands to the States in which they lie; and we shall not be so anxious hereafter to acquire public lands, and pay money out of the Treasury for them, merely to divide them among the people who may happen to go to them. There is a great principle in this. This is a violation of the great principle of equality and right. It is time that it should be arrested; but I know the younger States are interested, and I know that so long as there is an acre of public lands their common interest will draw them into a combination for the purpose of taking these lands for their individual States; and I see that the old States are getting into a minority, and not only into a minority, but into a sleeping condition, seeming to care nothing about the matter.

Hence I would say with the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] place all these bills together and let us investigate them; and if it is proper they should pass, let them all be passed.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not intend to detain the Senate. I, like my friend from Georgia, have found long ago that any effort to resist legislation of this kind would be unavailing; and the remark made by my friend from Arkansas is the whole clue to our legislation on this subject. Measures of this kind are brought in according to the fancy of gentlemen. Now, suppose it were proposed in any one State of this Union to appropriate the number of acres of land that are proposed to be appropriated here for a railroad, would such a project as that go down without the reading of the bill? Should such a project pass by a blind confidence? Should we not have the road indicated upon paper, and commissioners to make a report? Sir, if Congress is to assume the jurisdiction over this matter of regulating internal improvements by roads and canals, and all these artificial channels of commerce, I do not like to take the mere plans according to the fancy, as my honorable friend from Arkansas says, of gentlemen. I am not so fanciful a gentleman as to adopt plans of this kind without having an estimate and examination before me.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable Senator is doing me injustice. He represents me as speaking of the introduction of bills according to the fancy of gentlemen. I never said that these bills were adopted by the two bodies according to fancy. I say that they are acted upon according to the judgment of the bodies, and many are rejected.

Mr. BUTLER. I will be exact. He said that the honorable Senator from Georgia was not fully sustained in his statement, because it was notorious that many of these bills that were not adopted were brought in according to the fancy of the gentlemen who have brought them in.

Mr. JOHNSON. Hence they are not entitled to great consideration.

Mr. WALKER. The Senator from Arkansas censured them.

Mr. BUTLER. I know he may have censured them, but he stated in his speech that they introduce them here under the light of fancy; and this is the clue to our legislation on this point; and what sometimes is introduced under the light of fancy, becomes reality.

But, as I said, I do not intend to discuss this subject. I do intend, however, to correct one error now in relation to it. I suppose that this thing of alternate sections, which at one time was supposed to afford some guarantee of security for the appropriation of these lands, and allowing the Federal Government as a proprietor to derive some advantage from them, is forgotten.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is in all these railroad bills.

Mr. WALKER. It is in this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. The principle is still retained, and the value of the alternate sections is doubled.

Mr. BUTLER. I know you all say that it doubles the alternate sections in your States, but it does not double them in mine. [Laughter.] I am going to correct a remark which I see continually in the newspapers on this subject, that Mr. Calhoun gave his authority to this proposition. I know he gave his authority to it so far as regards the actual land over which the railroad passes, and I cannot be mistaken in this. When it was proposed on this floor, that they should extend it seven miles one way and seven another, I recollect that he said: "Gentlemen, you are going further than I have ever gone; I cannot go with you."

But we are not only going fifteen miles one way and fifteen another. How was it with the celebrated case of the canal around the falls of the St. Mary—that war measure which was introduced by the Senator from Michigan? Did they confine it to the alternate sections on the route of the canal? No; but they were to take the land in any part of Michigan where they could find it. I know that was claimed, not on the ground of regulating commerce or internal improvements, but it was put on the plausible ground of war. Sir, there is no restriction upon the limitation; but we are here bestowing public lands on private companies to regulate commerce, without knowing the very channels of commerce which are to be made. I would infinitely prefer—and I say it here upon my responsibility as a Senator, to the people of the United States—that if this thing is to go on, I would infinitely prefer that we should have some entirety of design—a measure devised in some way by this body, instead of taking it according to the projects and suggestions of individual members, which must necessarily, without intending it, operate unjustly to some, and unequally always. If you were to give the lands to the States, I doubt very much whether there would be such liberality in disposing of the public lands on internal improvements. I doubt very much whether, if you were to give them to the States, many of them would not prefer living monuments—yes, sir, with hearts and hands to cultivate the land, instead of making these iron tenants and monopolies to usurp them. I doubt very much whether, if you were to give them to the States, they would be given in this form. Why, sir, these are monopolies which we make in the different States; and, sir, we must necessarily create charters for those States by giving them lands, when, if they had to administer them themselves, I believe they would give them to individuals. I have no idea of favoring this tendency of engrossing everything under these moneyed companies.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia has expressed, I think, some surprise at the manner in which the Senate pass these various bills. I might express the same surprise if I had not witnessed, with that Senator and other Senators, the various bills that have passed this body for works of a similar character. I think the Senator from Georgia is not surprised at all. I am not. So far as regards appropriations for works of internal improvement in the States, when aid is asked for them by appropriations of the public lands, I think we need have no surprise at the appropriation of any sum by this body; and I think that the legislation of the body for the last two years will more than justify the remark. Why, we have passed one bill this morning, and one Senator said it only appropriated one million acres of land, worth, at the minimum price of the Government lands, $1,250,000. It was a matter of no account; and yet any little private bill presented here by an honest claimant against this Government would meet very great and firm resistance from the men who vote thus readily these large appropriations of the public lands for internal improvements in the States; for I hold it is nothing else but bold, naked, internal improvements within the limits of the State.

Now, sir, I know we were told years ago that it was the duty of the General Government to exercise that care over its public domain that a prudent landlord would, and under that view of the case we were told that works of internal improvement, railroads or canals, traversing the public lands, should be aided and facilitated in their construction by the appropriation of alternate sections, doubling the price of the remaining sections for the Government, the Government thereby incurring no expense. Now, what is this bill which we have before us? Is it one of that character? We have departed from the rule which was laid down, and which was the original justification. I understood the Senator from Louisiana to say, that this road was about three hundred miles in length. I think I understood him to say, also, that one hundred and eighty of these miles were through lands owned by individuals, and under cultivation. I ask, then, what, as a prudent landlord, should we do with the public lands through which the road runs?

Mr. SLIDELL. Will the gentleman permit me to make an explanation?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. SLIDELL. I stated that one hundred and eighty miles of this road run through cultivated and settled country, where the land belonged to individuals, and that the lands beyond it on either side, within the range of fifteen miles, were swamp lands, and did not now belong to the United States, but had been donated to the State of Louisiana, so that within the fifteen miles on that portion of the road which passes through the settled and cultivated country, and which is the property of individuals, the quantity of land which the State of Louisiana will receive under the provisions of the law is very limited indeed.

Does the Senator understand me? I said that within the range of fifteen miles on either side of the road, for the distance of one hundred and eighty miles, the land belongs to individuals, or is swamp land, which has been donated to the State of Louisiana previously, and consequently does not come within the provisions of this bill, and for that distance we derive no advantage.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President—

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator allow me to call up the special order?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will do so with great pleasure, though I should not have occupied five minutes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow, so that we may proceed to the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The special order having been disposed of, as reported elsewhere—

On motion by Mr. STUART, the vote postponing the bill granting the right of way, and making a grant of land, to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Oakland and Ottawa railroad, from Pontiac to Lake Michigan, and branches from Corunna and Grand Rapids to the Straits of Mackinaw, and a continuous branch from thence to Montreal river, in said State, until to-morrow, was reconsidered, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I now ask that every word of the substitute reported from the Committee on Public Lands for the bill be read to the Senate. For one, I disclaim and repudiate the intimations and assertions of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] that the Committee on Public Lands have sought to smuggle these bills through the Senate without consideration and without reading.

Mr. DAWSON. I made no such assertion.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. The Senator complained that the bill under consideration was not read, and called on the Committee on Public Lands for a report, as I understood him, to accompany each bill. As one of that committee, I am ready and willing to give such information respecting its objects and provisions as I can. I insist, however, that the bill—every syllable of it—be read. I want it read, and am sorry that any one should have proposed to pass it without reading. Speaking on behalf of the committee, I can say that the bill has been prepared with care; and after conference and consultation with our committee of the other House, embracing many interviews, and covering a space of days and almost weeks, that we have sought to improve upon the model bill, so called, of the last Congress, and have incorporated within the form adopted those stringent provisions which originated in the House of Representatives, and were ingrafted on the Missouri and Arkansas bills, which passed at the last session of Congress, and are now laws on the statute-book. The bill under consideration, by its provisions, grants to the State of Michigan alternate sections, six miles in width, on each side of the road, with the privilege to go fifteen miles on either side to make up any deficit in the quantity which may be found wanting within the six miles, on account of sales by preemption as well as at private entry.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] asserted that we were disregarding all the rules and principles which had heretofore governed in making these grants, and were proceeding to grant lands indiscriminately all over the States to these railroad companies and railroad projects. For one, I deny the assertion; and affirm that all the bills reported from the Committee on Public Lands are in strict conformity with the principles and usages heretofore governing in these grants. We have adhered faithfully to the alternate section principle, affixing fifteen miles as the maximum limit beyond which the State should not go to make up for the lands sold or otherwise appropriated. And by whom was that fifteen miles suggested? By the present Secretary of War. He did it upon that Illinois bill, to which the Senator from Georgia has referred, and in opposition to which, as well as to the Iowa and other bills, I have heard him make a much better, and much longer speech, if that were possible, than he has made to-day. When that bill was before the Senate, and without any limit, except the boundaries of the State, Colonel Davis moved to restrict the privilege to fifteen miles, taking the ground in his able argument that the construction of the road would certainly enhance the value of the lands which would remain to the Government within the distance named. The Secretary of War, well known in this body and over the country as a strict constructionist, offered the proposition to extend the power of selection to fifteen miles in width, and voted for the Illinois bill. And what, Mr. President, are the results to which the supporters of the alternate section grants can point, so far as they have been made? Why, sir, every anticipation, every assertion, made by the friends of the alternate section principle, when the Illinois and other bills were under consideration, by my venerable friend from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] and by the departed Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. Calhoun,] and others, have been more than realized. The facts and the figures present the most triumphant vindication of the policy, so overwhelming, that it seems to me that neither the principle nor the policy should be any longer contested. Illinois received a grant of several millions of acres of public land. But have the United States lost one dollar, or one cent by such grant? They have not; but, on the contrary, the value of the reserved lands was so much enhanced by the grant as actually to bring this Government more money than if it had not been made.

Sir, will any Senator now rise in his place, and condemn that grant of land to Illinois; the measure which raised her from such a prostrate condition increased the value of her bonds—those bonds of 1836 and 1837, which were hawked about the markets of New York, and London, and Liverpool, without finding a buyer, but which, as soon as the annunciation was made of the grant of land, rose immensely in value, spreading joy and gladness throughout the limits of the State? Those lands from Cairo north for several hundred miles, had been in market thirty or forty years, without finding purchasers—unsettled, and the abode of wild beasts; by the railroad grant they have been made to bloom and blossom almost as the rose.

That is the measure which the Senator from Georgia has to-day traveled out of the way to attack. The Committee on Public Lands have taken the Illinois bill for their guide in the main, and in no instance have they reported bills for any one State, as yet, granting to such States many acres as Illinois got. And, as I before remarked, they have introduced into these bills section No. 4, understood to have originated in the House of Representatives on the motion of a member from South Carolina, [Mr. Orr,] and which is in these words:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of by said State only in manner following, that is to say, that a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections, and included within a continuous length of twenty miles of said road, may be sold; and when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that twenty continuous miles of said road is completed, then another like quantity of land hereby granted may be sold; and so from time to time, until said road is completed; and if said road is not completed within ten years, no further sale shall be made, and the lands unsold revert to the United States."

This section of the bill provides that the land shall only be sold as the road progresses. It is a restriction never before ingrafted upon a Senate bill, and was only done to make them agree with the House form.

The bill of my friend from Louisiana commences the road at Algiers, a town near which there are no public lands, and proceeds a hundred miles before there any; and because that and other points are named in it, forsooth it is a grant to build a road through a region where there are no public lands! Sir, if the Senator from Maine, and the Senator from Georgia, and the Senator from South Carolina had read the bills, they would not have made the declarations which they have made. It grants no land except as the road is built, and not a single acre can be taken outside the fifteen miles for the construction of the road.

What more, Mr. President? The committee have asked and demanded of Senators who have introduced bills here upon their responsibility, that they should come before the committee and chalk out the roads in red, or other lines upon the maps of the United States, and the draughtsman of the committee has, in every instance, calculated as nearly as possible the lands sold and granted within the fifteen miles, in order to preserve equality between the States.

In no case, then, have we proceeded to exceed the amount granted to Illinois, making that a maximum by which the committee are governed in all these cases. I, for one, disclaim the idea that these roads are to be run upon the fancy of any gentleman. They are run upon the map, and are marked out before us; and if there are objections to the courses and distances of the roads, we will always be glad to have them pointed out, either in the committee or the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to put myself entirely right, and I commence by saying that I shall verify by statements which I shall make, every proposition which I laid down; I shall reduce them to such propositions that my honorable friend from Iowa himself cannot dispute them.

I was here when this subject was introduced into the legislation of Congress. I found myself opposed to my honored colleague, Mr. John C. Calhoun, who, with a liberality upon this subject which has been seized upon as authority, was perfectly willing to dispose of the public lands in such a way as to make them subserve as many objects as were practicable. Mr. Calhoun, in his celebrated speech, was perfectly willing to run the road from one point to another, provided it was done with intelligence. By intelligence, I mean knowing where the road was to run. He was perfectly willing to have such a road in a particular State for the advantage of the public lands through which it ran immediately. Now, mind the qualification, and my friend from Iowa cannot dispute any statement which I make. He was willing that the road should run through the public lands, and that immediately adjacent to, and not distant from, the road, the road or company should have the alternate sections. He believed, and I should say that was his policy, that the other section would be enhanced in value, and the Federal Government would be so far benefited that the alternate sections would be enhanced in value and would be settled by actual tenants, and it was thought they might be brought into market. There were a great many lands waste and wild, which could not be brought into the market without some road being run through them to bring them to public attention. As long as it was thus limited Mr. Calhoun was content.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. To what limitation does the Senator allude?

Mr. BUTLER. To the original proposition of granting the alternate sections for six miles wide upon each side. He was perfectly willing to go that far, and no further.

When the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Davis,] now Secretary of War, and my friend, introduced as a substitute a measure here, not only giving them the alternate section six miles on each side, but if the lands could not be found adjacent within six miles, that they should go fifteen miles off to find them, Mr. Calhoun said: "You are going further than I can have any security against abuse;" and he opposed it. I have not said that the honorable Senator from Iowa has not proceeded upon the strict principle. Have I said anything of the kind? I have not said that I am so much opposed to the appropriation of these lands as I am to appropriate them for purposes of which I have no knowledge. It is a very different thing from my being willing to vote lands to Iowa, or to Arkansas, or to Missouri, or to Indiana, or to Illinois, to reduce me down to say that I am to appropriate lands for this road or that road, without my having any knowledge of what is the road, or the direction which commerce will take upon the road. If gentlemen will bring to me a proposition that I can understand to regulate commerce, to subserve the general interest of the country, I might be reconciled, because I cannot oppose these appropriations. I know I cannot oppose them, and therefore it is, when I make an appropriation, I wish to understand whether it directs commerce this way or that way, and what will be the effect of the appropriation upon the commerce of the country.

Have I a right to ask this? That is reasonable at least. Now I distinguish much between giving the lands to the States for an object of which I know something, and giving them for what I know nothing about. I wish to know, when I give lands, that I give them for a purpose that my judgment can approve, and not the judgment of those who introduce the project. This is fair. I wish, when I vote on any measure here, that it shall go out under the sanction of my judgment, upon the responsibility of a Senator upon this floor. I do not undertake to say that this is not a proper road. I am very far from saying that it may not be. All I have to say upon it is, that I have not any intelligence about it; nor can I acquire any intelligence about it from any map, plan, or expose made to the Senate of the United States. Am I now understood?

Now, I will say to the Senator from Iowa that I cannot be contradicted in what I have said; that I would verify every declaration that I have made. I have said that I know that in many of the prior bills which have passed this body, giving alternate sections adjacent to the roads for fifteen miles, there has been a provision giving lands in any part of the State other than that through which the road ran.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. What bill?

Mr. BUTLER. I mean the bill making the grant of land to Michigan for opening a canal around the Falls of St. Mary. I cannot be mistaken in that.

Mr. CASS. I would beg the Senator to recollect that that was for opening a great communication along our northern frontier to the immense possessions of the United States on Lake Superior.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not saying that that was not a useful appropriation, so far as regards the object; but I wish to fortify the proposition that a bill has passed this body, not subject to the limitation and restriction contained in this bill. I wish to put myself rectus in curia. I wish to fortify the proposition, that you have not confined the grant to lands along the route of the road or canal, but that Michigan has a right to take the lands in any part of the State to carry on that work.

I will state to my friend from Michigan that I am not going upon that old subject. I am not going to say that such a communication might not have been proper. All I wish is to put myself right before the country, to say that these bills are going on step by step, one after another, until they shall be so enlarged that if you resort to precedent, you will be able to go to any part of the State for any internal improvement. I stand right upon that subject. I repeat it, and I intend to repeat it, so that there may be no misunderstanding. I stand perfectly correct upon the subject, not only that you can go fifteen miles from the road, but that there is a precedent that you can go to any part of the State in which the lands lie, for the purpose of internal improvements in that particular State. I shall stop with that proposition.

Mr. RUSK. I think the honorable Senator from Georgia and the honorable Senator from South Carolina have assumed positions in regard to this matter which cannot be sustained; and my opinion is that it will be found out that this legislation is beneficial to the United States. In the arguments which they lay down, they assume the value of the United States territory granted by these several bills at a dollar and a quarter an acre; and the Illinois road has been the text on all occasions when a lecture is read about the quantity of lands given away. The lands through which the Illinois road runs have been in the market for fifteen or twenty years, I believe, and could not find purchasers.

A SENATOR. More than that.

Mr. RUSK. A Senator who is more familiar with the subject says they were in the market more than that.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. They were in market for forty years.

Mr. RUSK. Forty years the Senator says, and purchasers could not be found for them at any price. They could not find persons to take the patents here from your office, and pay the tax assessed by the State of Illinois on the lands.

I remember very well a discussion which took place here on the Illinois bill. It was regarded as a visionary matter. The idea was ridiculed that the giving away of alternate sections, as put down in the bill, would bring for the reserved sections double the minimum price of the lands as then held by the Government, which was $1 25 an acre. Now, we see, since the road has been constructed, that the price of the reserved sections is greatly increased, and that it is a good deal more than doubled; and that the lands reserved bring a great deal more than double what the whole was originally valued at.

In addition to this, what have you done? You have sent a population there—an industrious population—who are now engaged in adding to the productions of your country. They are yearly adding to the general wealth of the nation; and, in my judgment, through this great thoroughfare, especially if you continue it further down, you will soon have something which will have more effect to quiet those sectional controversies, and to stop all this fanaticism, which every once and a while alarms us, than all the speeches which have been made in either branch of Congress; for you will make the people at each end of the line dependent upon each other. You will bring them into contact with one another; and they will see that, by their mutual industry and exchanges of trade from one to another, they are increasing the wealth of each other.

This road has been taken as an example. Now, what is the value of the lands which are proposed to be given by this bill—of the lands which are proposed to be given by all these bills? What can you sell them for? They are in the market. You cannot sell them at all. You have no means of selling them. In many instances they are capable of being highly cultivated, and yielding largely to the productions of the country. Many of them, I admit, are very good lands, if they could be brought into the market; but, as they are now, they are of no value to the Government. Gentlemen talk about fanciful roads, and all that kind of thing. Why, they should recollect that, according to the provisions of these bills, unless the States build the road they get no land; therefore it is a sort of speculation in which gentlemen are not at all apt to speculate. They are not to get the lands unless they build the road; therefore they are not very apt to ask for lands for an imaginary line. If they do, it results in no damage to the United States. If they do not build the road they do not get the lands. If they build the roads they get the lands; and the lands within fifteen or twenty miles, or even thirty miles of a great thoroughfare, thus having a means by which their products can get to a market, will be much enhanced in value.

Well, gentlemen talk, and the argument seems to go upon the supposition that Congress is actually taking the money of the Government, and with it building these roads for the States. It is no such thing. The lands are a very inconsiderable item. It is to be upon the outlay of capital, industry, and enterprise that the road is to be built. I esteem these lands as a very small matter in comparison with the other. Well, sir, you are building up your country; you are adding to its national wealth; you are increasing its industry by making these appropriations. But why this jealousy between the old and the new States? This legislation is not damaging the old States. If you give to Illinois or Michigan alternate sections of land, the result is to increase the aggregate wealth of the country. Does it damage Texas, or South Carolina, or Georgia? No, sir; it benefits the whole, because it adds to the aggregate wealth of the Union; and in every point of view the United States are gainers.

I shall vote for this, and for all other bills similar to this, with great cheerfulness. I do the Committee on Public Lands the justice to say, that it is true these bills are not read, and why? Because every body has confidence in that committee. They bring the bills up to a particular standard, and they do another thing, which will be found in the future experience of this Government. They require these railroads which receive donations of public lands to accept a provision in the bill that they shall be required to carry your mails at whatever compensation Congress shall direct. Other roads that you have built exercise a perfect monopoly in that matter, and carry the mails or not, as may be convenient, and charge exorbitant prices. Now, in time, it will be found that this very provision in itself is worth all the millions of acres of land in alternate sections which we grant. The United States lose nothing by it.

Mr. CLAYTON. When we ask for an appropriation to make a harbor on the Atlantic ocean, or an improvement on the lakes, we are asked where is the estimate? What has the Secretary of the Treasury sent to the Senate? Has he recommended the appropriation? Has he examined the subject? Has he, after investigation of all the facts, decided that this harbor, or this improvement, ought to be made? Has he decided how much it will cost, and how it ought to be done? Such an estimate is required by the Committee on Finance. Such an estimate is required by every committee that undertakes to consider such a subject; and without the estimate you can get through no appropriation whatever. You cannot get through even an appropriation for a custom-house without an estimate. An estimate will be required even for the small sum of $5,000 appropriated for a harbor, or any improvement; and it will give rise to debate which will last for hours; and if there is no estimate, there is an end to the proposition.

How is it when you come to appropriate the public lands? I have been, for twenty years, endeavoring to arrest the downward tendency of things on this subject. I have seen, during the whole time that I have been serving in the Senate, these lands about to be dissipated. True, it is often that very admirable appropriations are made which are highly beneficial to the sections of the country in which the lands lie; and as my friend from Texas said, adding to the aggregate value of wealth of the whole Union; but we have arrived at such a point at last, that it is absolutely necessary for us to decide whether we will give up the whole public domain, or adopt some system in regard to this business of constructing railroads in the new States where the lands lie.

I have always been a friend to internal improvements. All the votes which I have ever given, show that I have voted for giving the alternate sections of land. I have voted for these railroads again and again; but, sir, I now hear that there are more than a hundred of these bills before Congress, to grant alternate sections, when, as has been well said by my friend from Georgia, the Government do not possess the lands within six miles distance from the road. Sir, it will terminate in the giving away of the whole public domain. Now, why should we appropriate public lands in this way under a general internal improvement system, when we refuse to appropriate public money in the same way? Why should not the Secretary of the Interior—for it will belong appropriately to his Department—take this subject in hand and estimate for us, when a proposition is made for a new railroad, as to what it will cost, what the advantages will be, how it ought to be constructed, and tell us everything in connection with it, as the Secretary of the Treasury does in relation to the improvements on the Atlantic or on the Lakes?

Sir, unless we intend to give up the public domain, and vote it away without knowing how we are voting, or for what purposes, as we very often are voting it, we ought to stop until we have adopted some general system, some principle upon which we can stand justified before our constituents. I am an internal improvement man. I have never been niggardly in my votes in favor of western improvements; but I do say that the time has come when it is absolutely necessary, unless we intend to give up the public domain, that we should resolve upon some principle to govern, and endeavor to do equal justice to all parts of the West. Some parts of the West receive large donations of the public land, and others none. The old States receive no benefit whatever from them. But I have always felt, when endeavoring to arrest this, that it was almost a hopeless case; for I have seen gentlemen representing other States more deeply interested in the whole matter than mine, manifesting a degree of indifference to the whole subject that always astonished me. Start a proposition to improve the harbor of Charleston, or the Mississippi river, or to do anything for the benefit of any one of the great States on the Atlantic or on the lakes, and propose to appropriate money, and you will have a dozen gentlemen upon the floor to a moment, and if you have not an estimate for it, you cannot possibly get it.

Sir, do not let me be misunderstood. I do not propose now to abandon the principle upon which we have acted. I have always been the advocate of internal improvements. I am willing to be generous to the new States, as I have always shown by my votes; but I do trust that before we go further, while this mass of bills for giving away the public domain is pending between the two Houses of Congress, we shall pause until we settle upon some principle upon which we can justify ourselves before our constituents.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I certainly did not expect a discussion to arise upon the principles of these measures to-day; but I have been so much surprised at the doctrines advanced by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON,] and the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] that, inasmuch as my constituents are deeply interested in this whole class of measures, I feel it necessary to say a few words. I conceive that the opposition to these bills proceeds altogether upon a false theory. I hear gentlemen speaking of appropriations of public lands, and comparing them to appropriations of public money. It strikes me that we ought, in order to arrive at a just idea of the principles upon which all these bills are founded, to make a distinction between the Government of the United States as a political body governing the country, and the Government of the United States as an owner of lands.

Now, sir, when an appropriation is asked for upon the Atlantic or upon the Gulf coast, and when it is proposed that the Government, as a Government, shall appropriate public moneys for purposes of public improvement, necessarily, that work being intended to be done by the Government alone, not being controlled in any measure whatever by private enterprise or private judgment, the individuals who take part in the railroads not taking part in those works, not investing their capital in them, not having any of the stimuli to economy and prudence and judgment in expending the money, which, under other circumstances, are applied to these subjects—necessarily, I say, in appropriations of that character, it is right and it is proper that, when the appropriations are asked for, they should be granted only after close examination, and that the expenditure of these appropriations should be properly guarded by the officers of the Government of the United States.

But when the Government as a land owner, and not as a Government, is called upon to contribute, with other land owners, to the improvement of its own property, then, sir, a different class of considerations necessarily arise, and one which cannot with any propriety be assimilated with those which gentlemen evoked before us, for the purpose of checking our action upon the subject of the public lands.

Suppose any one of us to be possessed of large tracts of wild land. Take the example of the Senator from Texas. Suppose any one of us to be possessed, in an individual right, of large tracts of wild land, land that we cannot sell, land that is intrinsically valuable because it is fertile, land which will produce much when cultivated by the labor of man, but land that, in its actual position, is valueless to us as a source of wealth or revenue; suppose, under these circumstances, the proposition were made to us by a capitalist to come upon our lands, and improve them by putting constructions upon them, or by building roads through them; and suppose the parties making the proposition could prove, not by mere estimates made in advance, but by the operation of a principle already tested by experience, that if we would allow them to expend their capital upon our property, and then divide the property with them, the half that would remain for us could be sold for more than as much as the whole would have brought before; what would be the answer of any man administering his own property with a just regard to his own interest to a proposition of that kind? Would he not accept it at once?

What, then, can be said when the whole extent of the proposition in favor of the new States is simply to devote a portion of your lands to make the rest sell for a larger price? You are a land proprietor in the new States, and you own more land than all the citizens together. Now join these citizens in a common public improvement, and your property will be improved as well as theirs. It is not just, it is not proper, no man will say that it is at all consistent with equity, to call upon the citizens of the new States to build railroads through lands belonging to the Government, and then that the Government should sell the lands at a greatly enhanced price—a price produced at the cost of the citizens of those States. In the old States, where the Government owns no lands, necessarily it cannot be called upon for these appropriations. Why? Because the direct benefit resulting from the expenditure of the appropriation does not inure to the benefit of the General Government. But in the new States, where the General Government owns the land, and where the principle goes to this extent and no further, where one half shall be appropriated for these purposes, to make the remaining half more valuable than the whole was before. I am scarcely able to understand the difficulty of the Senator from Georgia, who thinks such a measure would be a squandering away of the public lands. Why? The lands go for the benefit of all the States. The one half appropriated for these improvements goes, of course, to the benefit of the improvement itself; but the other half, enhanced in value, and selling for more than the whole would have been sold for before, comes into the market. The proceeds of the public lands are brought into the public Treasury, and they are expended for the benefit of the whole Union—for the old States as well as the new.

I, for one, am not alarmed by this cry of there being one hundred and six railroad bills. I wish there were one thousand and six instead of one hundred and six. I wish they could be multiplied throughout the whole extent of the West, and through every part of the country where the Government possesses public lands. If the system of railroads could be scattered throughout the whole of our western country; if the lands could be brought into cultivation by being brought within the reach of market by this system of internal improvements; if the hardy and industrious population can be spread over these lands, I say that they would be a source of benefit, not only to the new States but to the whole Union, to the constituents represented by the Senators from Delaware and Georgia; far greater than can be obtained by any other system you can devise. One hundred and six railroads! One hundred and six bills, we are told, call for $350,000,000. According to my judgment, the proper way to state the proposition would be one hundred and six railroads, providing for increasing the wealth of the country to the extent of $700,000,000, if they appropriate that quantity of land for that purpose.

I believe this system of appropriation to be a source of public wealth, and not a squandering of the public funds. I believe, with the Senator from Texas, that no system has been devised in modern times, by which the wealth, the prosperity, and the increase of this country have been so well secured, as by the system of giving a portion of the public lands for purposes of internal improvements so as to add value to the rest.

I did not intend to say a word upon this subject, but I think the whole principle has been misapplied; I was going to say had been misunderstood, but I cannot suppose that to be the case with Senators as experienced and distinguished as those who have spoken. But I really think that the true principle has not been stated; that it is not an appropriation of public money. It is not to be compared to the case of the improvement of harbors and rivers, where the Government, as a Government, spends the money of the whole people. I think that a distinction is to be made between the Government as a political body, governing the country, and the Government as a land-holder and land-owner of part of the land through which these improvements pass. It is the Government as a land-holder and land-owner joining with other land-holders and land-owners in making this vast public improvement.

Mr. BROWN. I have no intention to enter upon the discussion of this question; but it is true, I believe, that a little experience sometimes is better than a great deal of theory; and our experience in this matter of appropriating public lands for improvements of this kind has been to convince every man who has watched its operation that there is not only no danger in the proceeding, but that it must result beneficially to the whole country. In making the grant of public lands for aiding in the construction of the Mobile and Ohio railroad, the district which I had the honor to represent in the other House of Congress was included in that grant, and I speak from absolute observation when I say that lands which had remained in the market for more than forty years without finding a purchaser at a dollar and a quarter an acre, are now eagerly sought for at two dollars and a half per acre; and this Government refuses to sell at that price. I know that hundreds of settlers have sought the right of preemption upon these reserved sections, and have petitioned Congress, time and again, to grant the right of preemption, and Congress has refused because they could sell the land at a higher price. I speak what I know to be true, when I say that more land was sold within that land district in twelve months succeeding the grant than had been sold for twenty years preceding, even at the enhanced price of two dollars and a half an acre.

The distinguished Senator from Delaware speaks of the downward tendency of things which he is exceedingly anxious to arrest. I trust he does not consider this a downward tendency. It strikes me that it is an upward tendency; and instead of arresting a proceeding of this kind, if he be really watchful of the interests of the public Treasury, he ought to promote this proceeding. If the effect shall be the same everywhere that it has been in Mississippi and Illinois, and wherever these grants have been made, then the honorable Senator from Louisiana is right when he says that these grants are matters of wealth and not of depletion to the national Treasury. You absolutely make money by the sale of your land, to say nothing of the advantages which would arise from bringing the lands under cultivation, and thereby adding to the aggregate wealth and the general prosperity of the whole country.

I agree with the honorable Senator from Louisiana, who says he wishes there were, instead of one hundred and six railroad bills, one thousand and six of them; for, in my judgment, just in proportion as you multiply these bills, do you multiply the prosperity of the country. Why should this Government desire to hold on to wild lands, and have them infested by wild beasts? Why not encourage settlements, encourage your hardy sons to go there and cultivate the soil? And yet they will never go, unless you give them some means of carrying away the produce of their labor. Do you expect men in the old States, or even in the new States, to penetrate into the heart of the forests, and fell the timber, and prepare the soil for cultivation, and expend upon it their labor, when, after having reaped their harvests, they will have no market for the sale of the products of their labor. Provide them markets, and they will go on these lands, and buy them even at double the present minimum price, prepare them for cultivation, actually cultivate them, and make them beneficial to you and to every part of the country.

I am not going to enter upon a general discussion of this question, for I had supposed that after the action of the Senate, two or three days ago, upon the bill for Wisconsin, and after its action upon two or three other questions of this sort, after several bills had been allowed to pass without discussion, that there would be no debate upon this question. Therefore, for one, I am wholly taken by surprise by this debate. If there be a purpose to investigate this question again, which has been so often discussed in both Houses of Congress, and certainly most elaborately discussed in the House of Representatives, then I trust a day will be fixed, according to the suggestion of the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN], so that we shall all be prepared to go into the discussion. I do not believe myself—perhaps because I have heard more of this discussion in the House of Representatives—nor can I conceive that discussion is necessary.

The plain, stubborn fact, which experience has taught us to be true, that the price of the public lands is more than doubled; that the sections reserved by the Government are worth more than twice as much after the grant than before, does seem to me to justify every Senator in voting for these bills; for, as was well said by the Senator from Texas, if the road is not built, of course you do not part with the lands; you only grant the lands upon condition that the road is to be built. If the road be built, then the sections that you reserve to yourself are worth more than double the price asked for the whole before your grant was made. How, then, in the name of all that is just and reasonable, I ask, is it possible for the Government to lose anything by making the grants?

I should not have said a word upon the question, but that I find I have a little bill, of which I notify the Senate, for the benefit of the State of Mississippi, which I intend to call up at the proper time, and hope to have it passed.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not intend again to speak on this subject; but I intend to put some propositions which I think will present the matter in a very different light from what it seems to have presented itself to the Senator from Mississippi, the Senator from Iowa, and others interested in these grants of land.

Suppose I were living upon a stream, and any one, either below or above, should undertake to divert the stream. Now, that might benefit him who undertook to divert it, and I admit that these donations and grants of public lands may add to the wealth of the Government, and may bestow a benefit upon the particular sections or local portion of the country through which they run. And when I can see, as I have seen, that these lands may be so far administered by this Government as to divert commerce from its legitimate channel, from the channel in which it would have flowed, the question assumes a very different character from regarding the Federal Government as a mere land holder desiring to make money.

I have never made my opposition to the system upon the ground that it might not be a judicious and prudent one for the public lands, so as to make them valuable to the Treasury of the United States, or that it did not bestow benefits upon local sections; I have never said so. I know no warrant in the Constitution of the United States by which the Federal Government can delegate to a company the administration of its funds or its lands.

There are three outlets of commerce in the United States—from the Great West across to the lakes; another to the Atlantic; another to the Gulf; another perhaps to the Pacific ultimately. Suppose that, instead of all these appropriations, or grants of land being for one place or another, there should be appropriations of land exclusively to carry the commerce across the Mississippi; and, as Mr. Herndon has said, turn the mouth of it, so that, instead of throwing the commerce into the Atlantic, to throw it by its waters into the lakes, and carry commerce directly across to New York, cutting it off from the Atlantic altogether.

I do not say that that necessarily would be the effect of this system of internal improvements. But suppose I should see a system of internal improvements growing up under this administration of the public lands by which commerce would be diverted from the Atlantic to the Gulf, and that these appropriations of land, instead of favoring a general system, should be partial, carrying commerce across the lakes to New York, carrying it down to the Gulf of Mexico, and diverting it from the Atlantic ports? Suppose I should see such a thing as that, and yet I were told, notwithstanding this, you have added to the general wealth of the country, and have made Louisiana, and Mississippi, and Iowa rich, and all the States on the lakes rich? Is that any compensation, when I know I have been made poor by taking from me the very elements of commerce? Sir, I do not say there is any intention or any scheme of this kind to make any such diversion. I do not say that it is going to have that operation. I know that one section is perfectly willing to take grants of this kind, provided another takes them also, without any regard to the general system one way or another.

I believe, however, that, so far as these railroads have run, they have been adverse to some sections of the United States; and I cannot be reconciled to appropriations of this kind by being told that, as a proprietor, the Government of the United States has derived advantage from them. I grant that the United States may become rich as a proprietor in the bestowment of these lands. But suppose that we were to have the power of regulating the clouds, that they should rain in this place or that place, according to some system of Espy, so that we could bring down rain by our decree, I would not trust such a power to this Congress, if it had the attribute of a god. Congress would be sure to make it rain in some places while they would deny it to others; and this thing of regulating commerce by this partial appropriation of land for this place or that place must be unequal, if not intended to be unjust. It has operated unjustly; and allow me to say to the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] who perceives with so much clearness everything his mind touches, that he will understand the allusion I have made. I believe that these roads running across to the lakes have diverted commerce from New Orleans.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is the reason why we want some for ourselves.

Mr. BUTLER. But give me some, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. I will say that, when my bill for Mississippi comes up, the Senator may then be gratified, for it does give something to South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. My dear sir, I will not ask for it. Do not give until we ask for it.

Mr. BROWN. I understood the Senator to say that he wanted something.

Mr. BUTLER. I only want that which I ask for. Understand me—I do not want things forced upon me. I have no idea of your taking a thousand dollars and giving me five. In the distribution of a fund as administrator, you would be a loving guardian to your own children when you can make a step-child of another. I do not say that my friend will do it. I do not believe he would; but I say that the Government cannot be trusted with the distribution of the rains of heaven and the waters of the earth. I would not have the Mississippi diverted when the lands might be bestowed in such a way as to divert the Mississippi, so far as commerce is concerned, into the lakes instead of into the Atlantic. Mr. Herndon says it is a practicable thing. If you bestow lands in that way, you can make such a diversion. I have not said that these roads are going to have that effect. It is probable they may all redound to the benefit of Charleston; but I do not know it, nor do you know it. It redounds to the benefit of Mississippi—that you are sure of—and to Louisiana, and to Iowa, and to Wisconsin. I have no doubt that you perfectly understand that it subserves your interests.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not propose to enter into the discussion of this subject generally; but there was, some time since, before the Senate, another bill, which was, I believe, a perfect transcript of this; that is, the form of the bill was precisely the same; and as I was addressing the Senate upon that bill at a period when the Senator from Illinois desired me to give way in order to proceed to the consideration of another subject, I propose now to say what I should otherwise have said upon that bill. I desire the special attention of the Senator from Louisiana, and of the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, to the view which I take. I desire to know whether I am right. I was proceeding to state that it was nothing but a naked and bald appropriation for internal improvements in the States. That was my declaration; that the lands appropriated by the bill applied to a road passing over lands where the Government had not a particle of interest; that the Government had lost the lands, and they were owned by the State or by individuals. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SLIDELL] corrected me in what he supposed a misapprehension. I think I was not wrong, and I think the terms of the bill now before me cannot lead me into an error.

What are the terms of the bill? If Senators will read the first section of the bill, they will see that the termini of the road are there named. Then it leaves no doubt about what the road is. It is a road commencing at one point and terminating at another. Then, the Senator says, that one hundred and eighty miles run over lands which are owned by individuals, or by States—I am speaking of the Louisiana bill now. The principle will apply, I believe, precisely to this, unless the appropriation made by this bill is wholly within the public lands.

Mr. STUART. Not all.

Mr. HAMLIN. The principle is precisely the same, only there may be a difference in degree. The Senator from Louisiana says that one hundred and eighty miles of that road run over lands owned by the State or by individuals, and one hundred and twenty miles over lands owned by the Government.

Now what is the appropriation made? The provision of the last section is, that one hundred and twenty sections of land shall be appropriated towards the construction of each twenty miles of that road. What road? The road through the public domain? No, sir; such is not the language of the bill, but it is a road between the termini named. And when the Governor of the State shall certify that twenty miles have been built, what is to be done? The one hundred and twenty sections of public land are to be paid over, or the money paid for them. Is not that according to the terms of the bill? Surely it so reads. If I draw a wrong conclusion, I desire to be set right. I draw that deduction from the bill, and such is its language; but I will not stop to read it. I cannot find any section in either of these bills which provides in terms that the money arising from the sales of the public lands shall be appropriated to so much of the road as is within the public lands. Let me read the clause:

"That the lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of by said State only in manner following: that is to say, that a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections, and included within a continuous length of twenty miles of said road, may be sold; and when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any twenty continuous miles of said road is completed, then another like quantity of land, hereby granted, may be sold; and so from time to time until said road is completed."

There is no provision which determines that that money shall be confined to the construction of the road passing over the public lands, and it is therefore an appropriation which applies to the road in its whole length. Nor is there any guarantee that if twenty miles of the road shall be built within the State outside of the public lands, to absorb all the public sections, the lands, outside may not thus be appropriated, and not one single mile of road built within the public domain. That is the view which I have, and it was in that view of the case that I regarded it as a naked bill for internal improvements within a State, and outside of the public domain belonging to the General Government. In my judgment, it is of no earthly importance whether these bills are grouped together, or whether they are passed singly. The sense of the Senate, I think, is clear and determined, and it is in their favor.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator will allow me I will set him right, so as to save him the trouble of making a further explanation on one point, as he appears to rest under an entire misapprehension. He says that this bill is one proposing a naked system of internal improvements.

Now, the fourth section says that "the lands hereby granted to said Territory"—or State, as the case may be, for the form is identical in all the bills—I am reading from the Minnesota bill—"shall be disposed of by said Territory only in manner following, that is to say, that a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections, and included within a continuous length of twenty miles of said road, may be sold; and when the Governor of said Territory shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any continuous twenty miles of said road is completed, then another like quantity of land hereby granted may be sold; and so from time to time, until said road is completed; and if said road is not completed within ten years, no further sales shall be made, and the land unsold shall revert to the United States."

Now, if there is no public land lying along the route of the road when you begin to build, can you pass from the first twenty miles to another twenty miles in order to sell according to the terms of the bill? Either the Executive officers must be false to the provisions of the bill, or else that cannot be done.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think if the Senator will look at the first section of the bill, and compare it with the fourth, he will see that I am right.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know that the construction which I have given to the bill will be given by the Department.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no doubt that what the Senator says is his construction.

Mr. JOHNSON. I spoke of the construction of the Department.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not know what the construction of the Department is; I have no means of knowing. I am only speaking of the bill as I know it; and I find that it describes a road commencing at one point and ending at another; and I find that the section of the bill which I have read provides that when any twenty miles of that road between the termini shall be constructed, and the Governor shall so certify, certain portions of the land shall be sold. This is the language of the bill. I do not know what may be the construction put upon it by the Department. It was the language of the bill of which I spoke.

I think the deduction which I drew is one which any gentleman would draw on a careful examination of the words. If there is a construction of the law by the Department, that is another matter. I am not aware that it has received any construction one way or the other from the Department. If such, however, be the design of the Committee on Public Lands, I think they ought to say in their bill precisely what they do mean—that none of the public lands shall be appropriated for any other purpose than to build the road through the public lands. Let it be so stated in terms, and then that objection will be answered. The bills, whether they shall be presented singly or in gross, I have no doubt will all pass the Senate. There are but few of us here opposed to them, very few; and I hope that those who are really opposed to them, may not have their motives misunderstood. The gentlemen who favor them are discharging their duty truly, according to their own judgment; and I doubt not that we, who deem it our duty to oppose them, are also doing what we consider to be our duty.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I assail the motives of no man, and do not desire to do so. But, Mr. President, the bill as it now stands was framed expressly to suit the meridian of the Palmetto State in the other House, as it has been amended by South Carolina. I enter my solemn protest against any amendment of it coming from the region so far north as the State of Maine. I am satisfied with South Carolina restriction. I have been compelled to adopt it, whether willing or not. The South Carolina restriction—not in this body, but in the other House—was the work of a friend, who, like the late Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Davis,] wished to perfect the bill that he might vote for it as he did, and therefore it was the more acceptable to me. It came from a member who probably looks quite as carefully to these objects as my worthy friend from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] whom I have had the pleasure of hearing on this occasion. But I understand my friend to say that the bills (speaking in the plural) are breaking down all the barriers and restraints which heretofore surrounded them, and were appropriating the public lands ad libitum. Not so regarding them, I denied the fact. The Senator now refers specifically to a case, to wit, the grant to Michigan for the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie canal, and he is right in saying that in that instance the alternate section principle was disregarded. The land in this case was nominally granted to the State of Michigan, but for an object so emphatically national that there is no Senator or Representative from that State who will agree that Michigan shall be charged with the grant. That measure was urged and pressed by other voices and votes more strenuously than it was by those from Michigan. And so universal was the feeling in favor of cutting the canal around the Sault Ste. Marie, that when the bill went to the other branch of Congress, it was not buried in the grave in which all similar bills from other States, with two exceptions, were entombed, but taken up, I believe, by unanimous consent, and passed with little if any opposition, and on a day upon which I believe a single objection would have been fatal to it. It was not done as a favor to Michigan, but for the great purposes of commerce and defense, and looking to the settlement of that vast domain belonging to the United States, in which are to be found the richest copper mines in the world.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not wish to make a remark by way of parenthesis; but I think there were some of the neighboring States more anxious for the passage of the Sault Ste. Marie bill than Michigan.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. The Senators from Wisconsin can answer for themselves.

Mr. WALKER. I presume that the remark of the Senator from South Carolina was based upon one which I made to him. It was this, and was intended to have this operation, that he should not charge the Sault Ste. Marie canal, at least upon the delegation from Wisconsin, as an entirety, for they were not—and I speak for myself, as being the one who broke the entirety—they were not, as an entirety, for that work; and how did they come to vote for it? Why, instructions came on from the Legislature for us to do it. How those instructions came to be gotten up I know not, but so it was. Instructions came, and I obeyed them. I voted for the grant for the Sault Ste. Marie canal, though I believed it to be contrary to the interests of Wisconsin. We have now, so far as the Senate is concerned, made a grant of land connecting with the central railroad extending to Lake Superior, and connecting with the great central railroad from Mobile, so as to extend to the copper region of Lake Superior. I believe that the commerce of that lake would best benefit Wisconsin by bringing it through the bosom of our State; and I said that the Sault Ste. Marie canal would divert the commerce of the lake away from Wisconsin, take it around through the Sault, through Lake Huron, Detroit river, and on through Lake Erie to the East; and consequently the great northern and southern route would lose the benefit of it. I consequently felt opposed to the work; but the Legislature sent on instructions, and as soon as they came I announced to one of the Senators from Michigan [Mr. FELCH] that I should have to go for the work. Now it will be seen why I made the remark to the Senator from South Carolina. It was that he was doing injustice, so far as that section of the country was concerned, when he charged that measure upon the Northwest. It was not in keeping with their interests, in my opinion; but my Legislature thought differently, from some motive, and consequently I obeyed the instructions.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. The Senator from South Carolina has alluded to the grant of seven hundred thousand acres of land to Michigan for the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. I wish to call his attention to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to show that the Government is fully reimbursed for the grant which was then made:

"In the Sault Ste. Marie district, in Michigan, the entries for the second and third quarters of 1852 amount to $40,689.65 acres, and for the second and third quarters of 1853, to $9,073.81 acres.

"This great and extraordinary increase in the amount of lands disposed of in these several sections of the country, remote from each other, can only be accounted for by the improvements referred to. In fact, so great is the increase in the value of lands, that land warrants and land scrip are nearly up to the par or face value. If, then, no other reason existed for such grants, this one, on the score of sound economy, would be sufficient. Many of these lands, however, have been in market long enough for the interest to amount to much more than the principal; and during all this period the States were deprived of the right and benefit of taxation."

There is another thing to which I would call the attention of the Senate—and that is this: If there should be evil or wrong growing out of these grants, that they will end as soon as your lordship over the domain within the borders of the States shall cease, as soon as your proprietary right shall terminate in the States, the evil, if it be one, is at an end. It is not like moneyed appropriations from the National Treasury, nor is it any donation at all. As soon, then, as this Government is divested of its title to the lands, whether it be by sales to individuals or grants to States, the alleged injustice and impropriety will have terminated. But hear what the Commissioner of the General Land Office says, in continuation:

"The lands donated for the construction of these improvements, and those thus entered, must, of necessity, be cultivated, to enable the holders to pay the taxes, and from this legitimate source of revenue great pecuniary benefit will be derived by the States. This cultivation, as a matter of course, will increase the amount of grain and stock in the country; and with these increased facilities for sending those products to market, will reduce the price of living, and thus benefit the whole community. They will also reduce the price of transportation for the manufactures and imports of the sea-board, and so reduce the price of those articles to the settler, and proportionally increase the quantity used, and, of course, the profits to the manufacturer and importer. The rail facilities furnished by these lines of intercommunication will be of great advantage to the Government and the entire community; and in case of war, if hostilities were brought to our own borders, the advantages furnished by them for transporting men and military stores are almost inappreciable. Another, and very great advantage, derived from these improvements, is the amount of capital and labor carried into the hearts of the several States by their construction. Hundreds of thousands of laborers can find constant employment on them, and each, by a very small amount of labor, can secure the blessings of a "homestead," without feeling degraded by having it conferred on him, as a gratuity, even if it were constitutional thus to benefit a few at the expense of the many, or compatible with the pledges heretofore given in relation to the public lands.

"To grants of this character, for railroads, canals, &c., not one tangible or substantial objection can be presented. The increased value given to the lands enables the Government to get double price, and a ready sale for those retained, and hence the grant costs them nothing. The same reason removes all difficulty in relation to the pledge given by the United States, at the cession of these lands, that they should be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of all the States, and renders them more available towards meeting the obligation imposed on them by the act of 28th January, 1847, that the proceeds should be set apart for the payment of the public debt created by that act. Let these canals and railroads be completed, and the husbandman will no longer have reason to complain that his grain remains ungarnished from year to year, because there is no mode of sending it to market; it will all be eagerly sought after, and, with his surplus stock, will be sent abroad over the land to feed thousands of his less fortunate fellow-beings, while he will thus be made to rejoice in the prosperity secured by his honest toil and industry, saying nothing of the advantages to the business and finance of the country."

I will trouble the Senate with reading no further.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to answer the question which was put by my friend from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] when this subject was before the Senate in the earlier part of the day. The question was this: How we should answer, those of us who represent the old States, to our constituents for sitting quietly by and seeing all these appropriations of public lands made for purposes of internal improvement in the new States, while no portion of the public domain was applied or set apart for the benefit of those which we represent. I want to tell my friend the motive which influences me, and the reason, which, in my judgment, renders it necessary that we, who represent the old States, should submit to pursue the same course, and feel ourselves without remedy. It is this, sir: the representatives of the new States have ingeniously contrived to induce a large portion of those gentlemen who represent the old States to adopt the opinion that we have no constitutional power to make an application of the public lands for the benefit of all the States. They have this ingenious system laid down—I do not know whether you will call it argument or reasoning—that the lands constitute a fund, held by the General Government as an agent or trustee for the benefit of all States; the proceeds of these lands are no longer needed to assist in defraying the ordinary expenditures of the Government, in which all the States are concerned, because our Treasury is overflowing; but it is utterly unconstitutional, it is illegal, it is a violation of the duty of the trustee to apply the lands, to themselves, or the proceeds of the lands, for the benefit of all the States, for whose benefit, nevertheless, and for whose benefit only, the trustee holds the lands.

Now, sir, see the result of that proposition. It is unconstitutional to apply the proceeds of the public lands, or any portion of the proceeds of the public lands, for the benefit of all the States. It is unconstitutional to appropriate the lands themselves, or any portion of the lands themselves, for the benefit of all the States. Well, now, sir, the moment you have got these two propositions assented to by a large proportion of gentlemen who represent the old States, permit me to inquire what resource is left for us but simply to sit by quietly and permit the lands to be disposed of for the benefit of the new States. It is unconstitutional to give us any share, interest, proportion, or benefit in the fund held for our benefit in common with the other States. We do not need it to defray the expenditures of the Government; and it is unlawful, unconstitutional, and wrong to give us the benefit of it in any other form! That doctrine is agreed to by a majority of the representatives of the old States; and, of course, while that doctrine is held, the old States are utterly powerless, and cannot derive any benefit or advantage from the public lands.

We hear much said about the expenditure of the common blood and treasure; we hear many calls made to the patriotic fervor of Congress and of the people; but, after all, it settles down into that. The lands, some of them, were granted for the benefit of all the States, and others were acquired for the benefit of all the States. And yet it is unlawful, unconstitutional, unbearable, that the Government should apply them for the benefit of all the States in the only way in which they can be applied for the benefit of all the States.

Now, sir, I am as sensible of the injustice done to the old States as is my friend from Georgia. I think it is a crying injustice; one which ought to be remedied. I think it is an evil which ought to be corrected. I think it an unwise and unjust hoarding of the property from the general purposes of benefit to all the States in this Union. I think the old States have a right to ask, to demand, that a reasonable portion of this domain shall be set apart for their benefit. But what avails my thinking so, or my friend from Georgia thinking so? Our States do not think so. That is the case, at least in a great many instances, in regard to the old States. Their representatives do not think so. And while, by a union among ourselves, we might, without withdrawing—for I would not be willing to withdraw at all the assistance which we give to the new members of the Union—that assistance at any time, it seems to me, make large and liberal appropriations of these lands for the benefit of the old States.

Now, Mr. President, I am reduced to this situation. I would, if I could, do anything for the benefit of the old States; I would especially do it for my own State. I believe it to be constitutional, right, and proper. It cannot but be constitutional, right, and proper that the trustee, if he be a trustee, should dispose of the fund for the benefit of his cuique que trust. But I am overruled. What am I to do? Am I to sit here and, by reason of my opposition to the bills which are intended to advance the interests of the States in which the lands are situated, show myself to have a malignant wish to check their prosperity? Certainly not. I have no such wish. I wish to have the lands disposed of for useful and just purposes. I wish to have our own just share of them; but we cannot get it. I would unite with the representatives of the old States in making it a condition upon these grants that we should have our share of them; but they will not unite with me. And, therefore, as I cannot make any opposition which will result in any good to the old States, whose interests, I think, have been unjustly overlooked, why should I exhibit myself here as making opposition at once ungracious and bootless against the advancement of any State in this Union?

The Senator from Maine says that this bill, or another bill before us this morning, I do not know which, as it departs from the original principle on which these grants of alternate sections were made, and gives land for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a road beyond the line of the road, and not contiguous to it, is in effect either a disguised or undisguised application of lands for internal improvements. Well, sir, the legislation is not the less acceptable to me on that account.

If you will not distribute these lands, nor the proceeds of them, among all the States, why should you not apply them to useful and advantageous purposes, why not to purposes of internal improvement? Surely, if it is unconstitutional to give them to the owners, it must be constitutional to give them somewhere else. The Government cannot be bound to keep these lands.

My friend from Iowa has suggested what is really at last a comfortable reflection; that inasmuch as the domain, however large, is not inexhaustible, our brethren and friends in the new States will at length have absorbed the whole of it, and then the inconvenience of making further grants to them, if it be an inconvenience, will have ceased. But permit me to tell him that that characteristic of the public domain does not make it a distinguishing characteristic, which separates it in character from the public Treasury; for it is as true with regard to the public Treasury that, after you have exhausted it all, there will be no more that you can give from it. The only difference is, that by a resort to duties or taxation, we may put more money into the Treasury. And permit me to tell him we have a similar and an equally efficacious mode for putting more lands into the public domain.

Here stands Mexico; another treaty with half a million of acres of public lands ceded to us will replenish the domain. And after we have exhausted that, we have the residue of Mexico and the whole of South America to look to. So that I do not see, at last, that we shall derive any particular or special advantage from the prospect that the present public domain will be exhausted finally, any more than we could that the present sum of money in the Treasury may be exhausted; for, assure yourself, sir, we shall take care to replenish both of them, and keep the country with an abundance of public lands to dispose of, and of public money to spend.

I have made these remarks in answer to my friend from Georgia, and the question which he says might be asked by our constituents. I am one of those who have never been disposed to interpose a factious or ill-natured opposition to any measure of this kind. I could not have done it consistently with my own feelings, because I have no enmity or desire to obstruct the advancement of any portion of the people of the country; and because I really see no objection, in principle, to the application of public lands in this way. Not that there have not been objectionable cases. There have been some such, and in every mode of expenditure there will be such. The real objection is, that while these grants are made to the new States, nothing is given to the old. In my opinion it is unreasonable, and it is unjust. It is a misapplication of the public domain. It ought to be corrected. But we of the old States have no right to complain, for a large portion of us have voluntarily come to the conclusion that it is unconstitutional to give us any portion of our own property.

Mr. ADAMS. It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to protract this debate, but I desire to answer some of the suggestions which have been made by my friend from North Carolina. It is a little singular that not a single individual who has opposed the passage of this bill, and the kindred bills before the Senate, has attempted to controvert the position taken by the Senator from Louisiana, by my colleague, and by other Senators, in reference to this question; and that is, that a grant of this sort is no gift, is no donation, but is a disposition of the public lands in such a manner as to secure their sale at as large an amount as the whole would sell for without any grant of alternate sections. Not one Senator has disputed that position, and yet each opponent of the bill, when he comes to speak of it, treats it as a donation, as a gift, as a gratuity to the new States.

I wish to call the attention of my honorable friend from North Carolina to what I consider to be a slight misapprehension on his part as to the object of the old States and of the Federal Government in the acquisition of the public lands. My opinion has always been, that the object in securing and purchasing lands by the Federal Government was not to use them for purposes of speculation. He complains that the old States have not been well treated in regard to this matter. I say the old States have no claim over and above the restoration into the Treasury of every dollar which the public lands have cost. The citizens of the new States are the sons of the citizens of the old States. You of the old States raise more people than you can supply with lands, and you send them out to the new States. The people of the new States have gone there from the old States, and, by their labor, have made these lands valuable, and have restored to the Treasury every dollar which you paid for them, with a large percentage. Hence, even if this were a gratuity, the old States have not the same claim to it as the new States; but it has already been shown that this is no gratuity at all.

The old States stand in a very different position towards the public lands than the new States. I admit that they have a claim, a legitimate claim, to require that a disposition of the lands shall be made as will restore to the Treasury every dollar which their acquisition has cost, and all the incidental expenses connected with it. But, I say, it never was the policy, and never can be the policy, of this Government, and the gentleman's constituents do not desire the Federal Government to turn land speculator, with a view of making money from its citizens by selling lands which it has purchased. That was not the object of the acquisition of these lands.

I cannot suppose that my honorable friend from Georgia will have any difficulty in answering the questions which he propounds. He says his constituents may require to know of him why these large grants, or donations, as he calls them, were made to the new States, and nothing given to the old States. Now, let me say to him, that the whole of the State which I have the honor in part to represent once belonged to the State of Georgia; she fixed her own price for it, and the Government paid that price. The Government has made a good speculation by that purchase. Millions on millions of dollars have gone into the Treasury from the sales of land to the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. If the constituents of the gentleman from Georgia call upon him to know why Congress appropriated alternate sections of land to Mississippi, he can say to them, "You have received your own price for that State, and you can expect no more."

But, sir, it is useless to consume time on this subject unless some gentleman can show that the position assumed by the friends of this measure is an erroneous one. Unless that can be shown, unless the report of the Secretary of the Interior is a false report, unless something can be shown to contradict the statements of Senators who have a personal knowledge of the effect of these grants on the value of the public lands, the question is beyond dispute. That it is reasonable, that it is right and proper, that alternate sections should be granted in and for the construction of railroads, it seems to me no man can doubt for a single moment, when he looks at its practical effect on the country. The effect of it is really to bring more money into the Treasury from the public lands than would be received without such grants.

My friend from Georgia has spoken of the value of the lands which we grant for these purposes, and he has estimated it at $1 25 an acre. I do not know how it may be in other States, but I can say to that Senator, that if the lands proposed to be granted to Mississippi, by the bill which has been introduced for that purpose, were put up at public auction to-morrow, and sold after any sort of notice which could be given, they would not bring, on the average, five cents an acre; and, without the aid of the railroads to be constructed by the citizens there, they would never bring ten cents an acre. As my colleague has said, much of that land has been in market for forty years, and it will remain in market for ever unless an inducement be furnished for its settlement by the construction of roads. Therefore, I say, the estimate of Senators, that a large amount is to be given to the States is erroneous; of course, not intentionally so. The Senators have not been in the new States, and do not know the real value of these lands.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. President, I do not suppose we shall be able to close the discussion upon this bill to-day, although thus far there have been no new points presented. I believe the discussion now—I say it with all respect—is only a rehash of what we have often had upon these bills heretofore; and, therefore, for the purpose of enabling Senators to get their dinners, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. STUART. I ask the Senator to withdraw his motion. I think we can take a vote upon the bill in a very few moments.

Mr. WELLER. I have no objection to withdrawing the motion to adjourn, if we can now get a vote upon the question; but if the discussion is to be continued, I prefer my dinner to this rehash.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator withdraws his motion I appeal to the Senate to take the question now upon the bill. If there is nothing new to be said upon it, it need certainly excite no further discussion.

Mr. WELLER. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CASS. I wish merely to say, that we have fought this battle every winter since I have been in Congress, and I think nothing can be said at this day to alter the vote of any Senator present.

Mr. DAWSON. I merely wish to make a few observations in relation to this measure.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will move an adjournment if the Senator desires it.

Mr. DAWSON. No, sir; I do not wish the Senate to adjourn on my account.

Gentlemen speak of the value of these lands. They say that in some parts of the country the public lands are worth very little. That is true; but what is the reason of it? It is because there are more lands within the limits of the United States owned by the General Government than there is a demand for. Our population is not equal to the quantity of lands which we have. But that is not the point upon which I wish to comment.

My friend from Iowa seemed to be somewhat excited in regard to the observations which I made as to there being no report from the Committee on Public Lands in regard to this subject. Now, sir, what I said, and what I wish to repeat, in order that the country may understand it, is that, for all the propositions to appropriate the public lands which are now before the two Houses of Congress, I have not been able to lay my hand upon a single report setting forth the character of a proposed improvement, the number of acres of land which would be required for it, or the character of the country over which the railroad would go.

I asked, what would our constituents say to us, or what could we say to them, when we were called upon to respond, why was this thing done? I desired a report from the Committee on Public Lands to accompany these bills, stating their necessity and the public advantage to result from them; stating that they were appropriations made to the States to control internal improvements in the State. But instead of that, what position do we occupy here to-day? I am called upon to judge of the propriety of granting lands for a particular railroad. What do I know about that railroad? If I were a member of the Iowa Legislature, or of the Louisiana Legislature, and the public lands were given to either of those States by the United States, would I, as a legislator for either of those States, appropriate those public lands until I knew the railroad line, and had estimates of its cost, and a report showing the great public advantages to be derived from its construction? Not one of us could do it, and yet we are appropriating here hundreds of millions of acres of the public lands by our votes for railroads, confining them to particular routes, without any knowledge of those routes.

Now, sir, I maintain that this is wrong. You will not appropriate $50 for the payment of a claim to a soldier, or to a private citizen, unless you know the facts of the case. When a bill is read at the table, appropriating a small amount of money for a private claim, Senators call for the reading of the report, to show the principle, to show the justice of the claim; yet these wonderful appropriations are made here daily without laying before the country the facts upon which we act.

Now, sir, I repeat the question, if I should vote for this proposition, and were asked why I did it, where are the estimates; where are the representations contained in a report to justify that vote, or to satisfy the country, what answer should I make? Hence it was that I did say that I was waiting for a general report from the Committee on Public Lands. I will go, like my friend from Delaware said he would go, down as low as to require estimates from them. And as the Secretary of the Interior is the great manager of the internal affairs of this country, I call upon him, in relation to every railroad, that it shall be designated; and I ask of him to let us know the character of the public lands through which that road is to pass, the number of acres to be granted for it, and how the lands are to be obtained, and what influence the grant would have on the finances of the country, and what would be the extent of the appropriation of lands contemplated. Would not this be right? Would it not be just? And will it be considered offensive on my part, when these appropriations of millions of acres of the public lands were about being made, that I ask for such information? I do not ask Senators to rise in their seats and tell me about them, but I wish them to tell me, as statesmen, in such a manner as should control the conduct of Senators in the management of the public affairs. Where is the report of an engineer; where is the statement of the Secretary of the Interior, or of the Commissioner of Public Lands, giving to me the actual facts of the case along a line of railroad three hundred miles in extent? I know nothing but what my friend from Louisiana [Mr. SIDELL] said in regard to the road in his State. I do not know the character of the improvement; but he told me that one hundred and seventy miles of it were through a settled population where the whole of the public lands were gone; yet, in that instance, according to the construction of the Senator from Maine, we appropriated land, as he maintained, and said to my friend from Illinois, section upon section, to the lines built, and my friend would not deny it.

Mr. SLIDELL. I beg the pardon of the honorable Senator from Georgia. I do not admit that that is the correct construction of the bill. On the contrary, I deny that it is; and if I shall have an opportunity, I will explain the operation of the bill.

Mr. DAWSON. I am very glad that the Senator has denied it; for before his denial we stood in the position of having that declaration of my friend from Maine going out to the country without a denial that we are appropriating the public lands to a company that has already constructed the road.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I am sure the gentleman from Georgia does not desire to misstate the facts; and yet, perhaps, it would not be proper for me to interrupt him and set him right. I will therefore make my statement when he gets through.

Mr. DAWSON. I prefer that the gentleman should state now whether the Senator from Maine was right or wrong.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I say this: We do not grant an acre to any company on God's footstool. We grant that land by that bill to the sovereign State of Louisiana, upon the presumption that her Representatives—her constituted Representatives—are intelligent people, and know what is best for their own interests much better than the Senate of the United States can know. Now, has my friend read all these bills? I will ask him, in reference to this very bill, whether he has read its provisions?

Mr. DAWSON. I have.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. My friend from Georgia will recollect that when the Iowa bill was under discussion at the last Congress, there was no provision in it such as—

Mr. DAWSON. The Senator need not go back to what then occurred. We have a distinct question before us.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to make one suggestion?

Mr. DAWSON. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the Senator aware what bill is now before the body?

Mr. DAWSON. It is immaterial which of these bills is before us. I am speaking of the general character of these measures.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not know whether the Senator was aware of the particular bill before the Senate.

Mr. DAWSON. Gentlemen ought to understand this matter. I submit to them that, if they were in the Legislature of Arkansas, or in the Legislature of Indiana, or of any other State in the Union, they would appropriate the lands belonging to the State on such information as we have before us to-day? I never knew of an appropriation of even $50,000 in money being made on the existence of a like state of facts; and yet I am to be considered as illiberal and unjust towards the new States, because I cannot conscientiously say from the facts before me that this measure ought to be passed. You avoid every means by which you can get correct information. For what have you your land agents? For what purpose have we a Commissioner of the Land Office? For what purpose have we a Secretary of the Interior? Why have we these officers, if not for the purpose of sending to us information on which we can act understandingly? I ask any Senator on this floor now in favor of these measures if the sole information he has derived about the matter is not from the bill itself and from speeches of gentlemen? It is so. Now what I present here as a just right for me as a Senator is, that these bills, like all other bills, shall be accompanied by a report stating the facts of the case, so that I can act upon these measures properly towards the country and towards myself.

I repeat again, Mr. President, and I do it with no unkind, or illiberal, or ungenerous feelings, that this mode of disposing of so much of the general treasure of the country, whether it be in land or in money, under such circumstances as these, is radically wrong. It shows a system of legislation proceeding without information, well calculated to create distrust in the public mind, and to destroy that confidence which should be placed in our legislative action. This is the reason why I make this objection.

As my friend from Iowa knows, ever since I took a seat on this floor, I have stated my objections to this mode of proceeding. I have stated that I would be as liberal as the most liberal in favor of the younger States. If the public lands were to be divided to-morrow, I would give them a magnanimous share. I would give them an appropriation far above that which I demand in favor of my own State, for reasons which they have suggested. But can they call upon me, and do they believe that, as an honest man, I ought to yield to them, when they tell me to take their word, and give them what they ask. They would not trust me as their agent in private transactions, if I acted or voted in that way. If I were to act upon such principles, they would look upon me as a dangerous man, in whose hands their private rights should not be placed.

Mr. President, this is an important question. It is a great question. It is one which the American people ought to understand. I am glad that the question which I propounded, as to what we should say to our constituents if we adopted such action as this, brought forth the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] who has placed this question rightly before the country.

We know that there have been divisions in relation to the question of internal improvements. We know that our Democratic friends are decidedly against internal improvements by the General Government, and it is known that I have been inclined to the same opinion myself, although I have acted steadily with the party to which I have belonged. Yet, sir, we are now doing indirectly the very thing which we deny the power of the Government to do directly.

Before I conclude I will put an interrogatory to the Senator from Louisiana, which I am requested to make. It is, whether the Senator from Maine put the proper construction upon the bill granting lands to the State of Louisiana? I understood my friend from Louisiana to say that he put an improper construction upon it, and I take his statement. The only objection which I have to make to it is, that a bill of such importance should be put through the Senate with two distinguished men like them differing as to its construction, and not having it amended to accomplish the object in view.

In conclusion, I beg pardon of the Senate for having detained them so long. My views are before the country upon this question. My constituents understand them. The old States have abandoned their right. The new States are sweeping off all the public lands. I wish them success in their use. I shall not envy them, but I shall always look upon the carelessness of the old States in the management of this landed estate of theirs as deserving the censure of our section of the country.

Mr. SLIDELL. Many of the remarks which have been made by the Senator from Georgia have no application to the bill now under discussion. He has evidently been under the impression that we have now under consideration the bill making a grant of land to the State of Louisiana.

Mr. DAWSON. Not at all. I was speaking of the general principle of these appropriations.

Mr. SLIDELL. The bill now before the Senate is one making a grant of land to the State of Michigan. But I am very ready to respond to the interrogatory which the gentleman has put to me. I contend that the construction put upon the Louisiana bill by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, [Mr. DODGE, of Iowa,] and by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. JOHNSON,] is the correct one. It is, that when twenty miles of the road shall have been made, then one hundred and twenty sections of the public lands, lying on either side of those twenty miles of road, within the distance of fifteen miles, may be taken by the State of Louisiana and sold for the purpose of appropriating the proceeds to the payment of the sum that has been disbursed for the twenty miles of road which have been built. The honorable Senator from Georgia was laboring under a false impression, and so was the honorable Senator from Maine, when he considered that, because this road was three hundred miles in length, one hundred and eighty miles of which, as I stated, passed through lands which were not public lands, and for which, in all probability, no public lands could be appropriated within fifteen miles on either side of the road, therefore there would be appropriated the amount which would have been appropriated to the three hundred miles of road if the road had passed through public lands for the whole distance. Upon an examination of the bill—and it does not require a very careful examination for the purpose—it is evident that the construction which I place on it is the correct one; and if I entertained any doubt on that subject, I should most willingly defer to the gentleman whose particular province it has been to examine the subject carefully and report their views to the Senate. They also say that their construction is the one which is put on the bill by the Secretary of the Interior, and by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Am I not correct in this?

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand it to be the case.

Mr. SLIDELL. Then I will assume such to be the effect of the bill. Now it has not been pretended in any case that a railroad must pass exclusively over the public land, and it has not been pretended that the beneficial effects of the construction of a railroad are confined to the strip of land which immediately adjoins the road. The theory of this bill, and the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, go upon the presumption that the benefit of the construction of the road will not be confined to the strip of land immediately adjoining it; but all experience has demonstrated that the land lying on either side within a range of thirty miles of that road is benefited by its construction. Then, even if the view taken by the Senator from Maine were correct, I think it could be demonstrated that the interests of the United States and of the Treasury would be promoted by making this grant of land, because a large section of country now cut off from market, not lying upon any navigable stream, and which is at present utterly inaccessible, will, by the construction of the road, be brought into settlement. I venture to say further, that at the point beyond which cultivation and settlement on the line of that road to which I have referred now exist, the value of the land will be increased tenfold by its construction. That land really at this moment has no convertible value. Its value will depend only upon the construction of the road.

The honorable Senator from Delaware asked upon what principle these bills could be supported and sustained. He said that when appropriations were made for internal improvements, they were accompanied by reports and estimates from some acknowledged authority on the subject—from the Secretary of the Treasury, or from the head of the Engineer Bureau; so that we should know exactly what was to be done in each case, how it was to be done, and what it was to cost. Now, I say we have all the elements of certainty in this bill, and in all other bills which are framed after the same model, because they are all alike. First, we know that if there be any public land on either side of the road within a range of fifteen miles, alternate sections of land will be granted to the State of Louisiana to aid in the construction of the road. There cannot be more than that, and there may be much less. In the instance to which I have referred, suppose the road to be three hundred miles in length, that, according to my calculation, would require about seven hundred thousand or eight hundred thousand acres of public land.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Only six hundred thousand.

Mr. SLIDELL. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands tells me not more than six hundred thousand acres. There at least is one element of absolute certainty. It may be much less, and it cannot be more. Then we have another element of certainty. We know exactly the points of inception and termination of the road. We all know that it leads from a great commercial emporium of the country to the boundary of the State of Texas. We all know, and have reason to believe, that when that railroad shall have been made to that point, it may be extended much further, and carried probably to the extreme limits of Texas; and we have reason to believe that if this road is completed, (and it will be completed either with or without the aid of the General Government,) it will be the terminus of the great California road. That, however, is not the point to which I wish now to address myself.

The next element of certainty is, that where a railroad is not called for by the wants of the country—where it is not likely to be productive—where it is not national to a certain extent (for I consider everything to be national which tends to develop the resources and wealth of the country)—where it does not hold out prospects of advantage and remuneration to those who intend to make it, either in the form of increased trade or in the form of dividends, the subscriptions necessary to make it will never be attained. Now, in this instance, suppose we receive eight hundred thousand acres of land from the United States—and I conceive that under the operations of the bill passed this morning we shall not get more than three hundred thousand or four hundred thousand—

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Four hundred and twenty thousand acres is the exact number.

Mr. SLIDELL. That at the minimum Government price would be $500,000. The road, at the lowest calculation, will, when equipped, cost $25,000 per mile. Then it will require an expenditure of $7,500,000 for the completion of the road. Now, to show that the road is not a fanciful affair, (and I think the honorable Senator from South Carolina qualified by that term some of these bills,) but that it is a real and substantial road to be carried out, from which the stockholders and those who contribute to its building, expect to derive some benefit, I may state that the city of New Orleans, with the greatest unanimity, imposed a tax of $1,500,000 upon the property-holders of that city to aid in the construction of the road. The State of Louisiana is also a stockholder to the extent of $1,000,000 or $1,200,000. If I am wrong in the statement of this amount, my colleague can correct me. Almost every parish in the State, through which the road has to pass, has also voluntarily taxed itself to aid in its completion. Then it is not a fanciful affair.

If I am not mistaken, it appears to me that I have demonstrated that there is every degree of certainty which the honorable Senator from Delaware can require to know, whether the bill which I have referred to should or should not receive the sanction of the Senate. We know how much it will cost the Government—we know that the road will be built, and we are bound to presume that it is judiciously located, and will yield profitable results, or the necessary amount of capital will not be subscribed to it. Now, I ask him, if there are not sufficient elements before him at this time to enable him to judge whether he can with propriety give his sanction to the bill?

Sir, I have been led into a discussion perhaps in some degree foreign to the merits of the question immediately before the Senate, because the Michigan bill is the one on which we are really called upon to vote; but as the Senator from Georgia made a direct appeal to me as to the merits of the road in Louisiana for which we passed a bill this morning, I felt myself bound to respond.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands a single question, to which I wish a direct answer, and I know he will give it to me in his usual prompt way. The question is this: What is his opinion of the construction of all these bills, where a part of the land lies within the public domain, and a part out of it? Does not the donation apply to that which is out as well as to that which is within the public domain?

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I will state that the Senate bills originally did so provide, and that was the construction placed upon the Illinois Central railroad bill, and upon others, I think; but there is an additional section which was offered to these railroad bills at the last session by Mr. ORR, of South Carolina, which has been incorporated into the bills of the present session. I thought from reading it that it bore the same construction which the Senator from Arkansas put upon it; but it is due to the Senate that I should say that I have not referred to the Secretary or the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will state that there is material distinction upon that point—

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senator from Iowa frankly to give me his opinion.

Mr. JOHNSON. He has given it.

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir; I should be very glad if the Senator from Iowa would state distinctly what is his own construction.

Mr. JOHNSON. As the gentleman from Iowa does not seem disposed to answer, I will state, not by asking the permission of the gentleman from Maine, but of my own right, what my own construction is. The gentleman has asked for the construction of the provision, and I will state what my impression is. I have a right to think for myself upon this floor, and I shall exercise that right. It is not in the manner in which he puts it here at all that I will consider it, or that I have spoken of it. I will answer for myself with reference to the question which he puts. The question was: Are not the whole of the lands granted, whether in one part of the road or another, appropriated to the whole road? I say yes, it is true. I never said no.

But, sir, there is another thing in regard to that point which is rendered clear by the bill itself. There is a provision in this bill, called the JAMES L. ORR provision, which the House of Representatives, at the last session, inserted into all these bills as a restriction. It is a just, and rightful, and a wise restriction, and it has been adopted by the Committee on Public Lands of both Houses at this Congress. That provision is one which says that, though you may make grants for a million of miles if you choose, you shall sell land only to the extent of twenty miles at a time. I say the construction to be given to that provision is, that you shall be permitted to sell lands lying along the twenty miles of the road which have been put under contract, and not any other strip of twenty miles until that portion of the road is constructed. If you commence a work upon any part of the road where there are no public lands upon either side, you may sell all your right upon either side of the twenty miles; but you cannot go to another twenty miles at a distance, where there are public lands, and sell that part. I say that, after you have commenced one section of twenty miles, you can sell the lands lying each side of it; but you can go no where else to sell lands until you have gone on with twenty miles more of the road.

There is, however, a wide difference between that and the question whether or not an appropriation which is made for the construction of the whole road, shall be given only to that part of it where the public lands lie, or shall be given indiscriminately to the whole of it. If the whole grant of land is made, unquestionably it goes for the whole road in the end, provided the whole road be constructed. If there is more land granted than will annually secure the building of the road—and that cannot be pretended in any case—it will be held by the State, or appropriated by the State as she may choose. But you expressly say when you pass the bill, that the State shall not appropriate the grants made by Congress, for a specific object, in any other way than to carry out the design of the bill, which is to secure the building of the road. There is the material distinction.

But I will not stand misconstrued upon this matter. If the gentleman makes an error in his construction of the bill, and I attempt to set him right in it, I will not allow myself to be misconstrued by questions and answers between that gentleman and another upon this floor. Nor will I lose my chance when I have a right to come forward and set myself right.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to assure the Senator from Arkansas that I did not mean to misconstrue him.

Mr. JOHNSON. But you refused to let me answer when the question was asked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. NORRIS in the chair.) The Senator from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire only to state that I wanted the opinion of the chairman of the committee. We have had the opinion of the Senator from Arkansas already. He had stated, with his usual frankness, what his opinion was. I did not misunderstand him. I understood him then as I understand him now. I wanted also the opinion of the chairman; and that was the only reason why I asked for it. I had no other reason in the world.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have some doubts in regard to a portion of the provisions of this bill, independent of my general objections to it, and I shall therefore move its postponement. The bill was reported by the Committee on Public Lands on the 30th of January, but some seven days ago. It is a bill which contains many important provisions. It seems to me to contain provisions which are a departure from the principle upon which such bills as this were originally introduced and passed by Congress; and upon that ground, in order that I may have an opportunity to compare it with those bills, I ask for the postponement. It has been but seven days in the Senate, it involves matters of considerable moment, and I suppose it is not to be rushed through by the force of numbers without giving us the possibility of making the comparison which I desire to make, unless it be indeed that where appropriations of money, or of land, to purchase whole communities are proposed, the doctrine is that we must submit. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed till the day after to-morrow.

Mr. STUART. I hope the bill will not be postponed till that time. The Senator can move an adjournment, and this bill will then come up to-morrow as the unfinished business.

Mr. BAYARD. The Nebraska bill will come up to-morrow; but the Senate can do as it pleases in regard to the matter.

Mr. CASS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 7, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

S. B. No. 136. "An act for the relief of William Senna Factor;"

S. B. No. 166. "An act to incorporate the Georgetown Gas-Light Company;" and

S. B. No. 185. "An act for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth C. Smith, of Missouri."

LEWIS WARRINGTON.

On motion by Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the House the petition and papers of Lewis Warrington, for the purpose of referring them in the Senate.

Mr. OLDS. I move to reconsider the votes by which bills No. 244 and 245, introduced yesterday, were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I make the motion now in order to have it entered.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. The committees were nearly called through yesterday, and as I am very anxious to get the deficiency bill through not only the committee but also through the House to-day, I hope the House will consent to go into the Committee of the Whole at an early moment. I therefore move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MACE. I trust the gentleman will not insist upon his motion until after the morning hour has expired.

The question was put, and there were, on a division—ayes 86, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SERRAVALLO in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1854.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, the pending question was an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair, which ruled that an amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER,] in regard to the marine hospital, in Portland, was in order.

Mr. FULLER. My colleague, who represents the district where the hospital is situated to which my amendment referred, was not in his seat at the time I made the motion. He was detained at his lodgings by illness, and therefore I offered the amendment in reference to the marine hospital at Portland. I was not then familiar with the subject; but since that time I have conferred with my colleague, and also with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who, I understand, is not unfriendly to the appropriation, but who thinks that the subject would more appropriately and properly come up when we come to the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Now, sir, for the purpose of not embarrassing the Committee of Ways and Means, and with a view to offering the amendment to the civil and diplomatic bill, where it will very properly come in, and where, I understand, an appropriation is recommended by the Secretary, and with the consent of my colleague, who is not now in his seat, and who, I suppose, is detained from the House by sickness, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BOYD offered the following amendment:

For the completion of the marine hospital at Paducah, Kentucky, $5,000.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I offer the following amendment:

For the collection of agricultural statistics, and the purchase of seeds, to be paid out of the patent fund, $10,000.

Soon after the commencement of the present fiscal year propositions were made by the Commissioner of Patents to foreign Governments for a reciprocal exchange of seeds, which in many cases were accepted, and, as far as possible, has been carried into effect. To complete all the arrangements thus entered into a further appropriation is required. The small appropriation of $5,000 appropriated at the last session of Congress, a portion of which has already been expended, leaves the amount necessary to carry out this arrangement wholly inadequate to the wants of the Department.

I think that the agricultural interest, which, without protection, protects all other interests, and which furnishes employment for four fifths of our entire population, may, with great propriety, ask for this small amount, to enable the Commissioner of Patents to furnish the requisite seeds for early distribution. In my judgment, no better use can be made of a portion of the public fund, and one which would be more acceptable to the great body of our citizens, than the improvement and increase of the products of our soil. I did intend to have asked for a larger appropriation, but upon consulting with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, his advice was, that it would be proper to ask no more than was necessary to meet the present wants of the Department, and leave the appropriation for the coming year to be settled when the general appropriation bill should come up.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It does seem to me that those who have had any experience in this thing of getting seeds from the Patent Office, and distributing them, will acknowledge that of all humbugs of the day this is one of the most bald and perfect humbugs ever got up by Congress and the Patent Office combined. Of all the seed which have been distributed here by the Patent Office, there is not one package out of ten, in the first place, that will ever come up at all; and then not more than one tenth of those that do come up will ever prove beneficial to the region to which they are sent.

I agree with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLARK] entirely, that it is a laudable and praiseworthy object to improve and promote the agricultural interests of the country; but how can it best be done? Leave to individuals to select their own seeds, and then those who pay for them will receive them; but here appropriate ten, fifteen, twenty, fifty, or one hundred thousand dollars for the purpose of getting seeds through the Patent Office, and you make it, at best, a mere electioneering fund, appropriated to members who may distribute them. They send them to their favorites, and the great body of the people get none of them at all; and, sir, it is a system of partiality and favoritism which, in my opinion, should not be practiced or recognized by this Government.

How do they get the seeds at the Patent Office? They get them, perhaps, from some establishment in Philadelphia, which raises most of them, and collects the others from the different parts of the country; give them, through the Patent Office, to members of Congress, and they are perhaps sent back to the very parts of the country from which they were selected by the establishment at Philadelphia.

As I before said, many of them, from some cause or other, never come up, and have not a tendency even to fertilize the soil in which they are planted. I hope this thing will be stopped. Those who want them can find out where they are to be procured, and collect those adapted to their particular localities much better than members of Congress, or any establishment in Philadelphia, New York, or any other place can. I hope the amendment will be voted down, and that this thing of getting seeds, and scattering them over the country in this manner, will be stopped.

The amendment was again reported to the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I move to increase the appropriation $500.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, from the statement of the gentleman from Michigan on my left, [Mr. CLARK,] who, I believe, is a member of the Committee on Agriculture, that the sum specified in his amendment is absolutely necessary to carry out the policy adopted the last session of Congress, and of the previous session, for supplying this Department of the Government with the means necessary to collect statistical information, and useful seeds for the country.

I disagree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] in the remarks made by him, to the effect that this distribution of seeds is an entirely useless operation. The five years during which I have occupied a seat upon this floor, I have received, as every other member of Congress has, seeds from this agricultural bureau, which have proved of great value to the section of the country which I have the honor to represent. We have had wheat from the Mediterranean, and various other parts of Europe; wheat from California, seeds from South America, and various other parts of the globe; which, by transplanting and cultivating in this country, introduces better and more useful products than we are in the habit of cultivating at home. It encourages experiments among our farmers, and is productive of very great good.

Sir, what is the little sum now proposed to be appropriated? That great portion of the American people who constitute the principal part of our population; whose prosperity makes the prosperity of this Union; who pay your taxes; who uphold your civil list, your Army and your Navy; who are to pay the $51,000,000 which I see the Secretary of the Treasury estimates as necessary to carry on the various Departments of the Government; to this large class of people what is this paltry sum of $5,000? It will be of very great service to them; and I, for one, hope this House will not withhold it.

The object of the gentleman from Michigan is a very good one. It is to scatter statistical information, and to procure rare and useful seeds from foreign countries, and from every section of the country, for distribution among the agricultural population of the country. I have the honor to represent an agricultural district—one as deeply interested in such pursuits as any in the United States. The farmers of that part of the country receive seeds, especially when brought from foreign countries or from remote parts of the Union, with pleasure and profit, and they cultivate them, and disperse them beneficially among their neighbors.

I hope this small appropriation will not be withheld. On every proper occasion I shall advocate liberal appropriations for upholding the Agricultural Bureau of the Department of the Interior. I think there should be a separate Agricultural Bureau—one which should collect and distribute statistical information, and publish the valuable reports of agricultural societies. Such a bureau has been recommended by every President of the United States from Washington down to the present, but Congress has never yet thought proper to establish it. I think that it ought to be established, and that the farmers of the country ought to be aided in every proper and suitable manner.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will occupy enough time, to prevent any one else from consuming five minutes in opposing this amendment, to enable me to make a suggestion to the gentleman who offered this amendment. I understand that the appropriation sought is $10,000, for the purchase of seeds and the distribution of agricultural statistics. I think that it is too late to accomplish much in the way of distributing seeds for the ensuing spring. I speak, at least, for one very extensive region of agricultural country, when I say that it is too late, and if we had seeds now we should not be able to send them to the southwestern States in time for many of them to be successfully cultivated this year. I therefore suggest to the gentleman from Michigan whether it would not be better so to frame the language of his amendment as to authorize the collection of these seeds at a period early enough for the distribution to be made next fall, so that it may be made to the satisfaction of all parts of the country, whereas now only the most northern regions can get them in time for cultivation this year.

Mr. SAGE. I hope the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLARK] will not consent to withdraw his amendment. It is not too late to distribute seeds very generally throughout the whole country. There may be a small portion that will not reap any benefit—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is reminded that debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. SAGE. I move, then, to amend the amendment by increasing the amount of the appropriation one dollar.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment to an amendment already pending.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the withdrawal of the amendment?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object. Let us vote upon it.

The question was then taken on Mr. TAYLOR's amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. SAGE. I now move to increase the appropriation one dollar. I am not surprised at seeing opposition to this proposition come from the quarter it does. I was more surprised to learn from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLARK] that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had assented to an appropriation of $10,000.

Sir, if there is any class of the people of this country entitled to the protection of Congress it is the agriculturists, the farmers. I am glad that this amendment has been brought forward, and instead of decreasing the amount, I hope that the gentleman from Michigan will, at the proper time, increase the amount to carry out the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

This system of distributing seeds may be a "system of humbuggery," as the gentleman from Tennessee says it is, but if it is, there are a great many systems of humbuggery in our legislation here, and I hope that this amendment may be adopted. I think that it is one of the most meritorious brought forward for the sanction of the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have made no opposition to the amendment originally introduced. It proposes, in my understanding of it, to make an appropriation out of the Patent Office fund. The honorable gentleman who presides as chairman in the committee having charge of that fund, I take it, is better informed of its condition than I am; and, therefore, I interpose no opposition to the amendment which he has submitted. I repeat what I have already said, that in more than one half of the States of this Union, and in much more than one half of the agricultural portion of this country, it is now too late to distribute any part of the seed proposed to be provided for. If the seed were in the Patent Office to-day, it would be too late to get it at the various points where it is to be used. Many of the seed, if in the hands of the cultivator at this time, would be immediately put in the ground.

I do not know what the committee may do with the amendment. I am perfectly willing they should adopt it, if it be their pleasure to do so.

Mr. HUNT. If through neglect it be too late to serve one half of the country—

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment, and being an amendment in the second degree further amendment is not in order.

The question was taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. HUNT. I move to increase the appropriation $500.

If it be too late, Mr. Chairman, to serve one half of the country, is that a reason why we shall not serve the other half? Shall the neglect, for a time, of one portion, prevent us doing what is right at this time to the other portion? Is there patriotism or good sense in that opposition? When I heard of the gentleman's friendship I trusted it.

"Non tali auxilio,
Nec defensoribus istis, tempus eget."

Sir, we are here bound to promote the interests of agriculture, and this is a proper way of doing so. The gentleman who addressed the committee proposes nothing, and opposes everything. In the spirit of economy, which is characteristic of him, he opposes this measure. Why should he oppose this measure? Is not agriculture one of the great interests of the country, and will not this measure have a tendency to promote it? If he cries out abuse, why does he not put before the public view those who are guilty of it? Abuse is incident to all human laws and institutions. It is not the abuse of a law which should deter us from doing what is right—which should prevent us from passing the proposed appropriation.

I did not intend to say a word when the original amendment was introduced; but I did not like the spirit in which things went on, and therefore rose, first of all, to see that due privilege be accorded to every member, without hurry, of speaking his mind; and, secondly, to see that when gentlemen are called friends of a measure, and they rise up and oppose it, the committee look upon them in the proper light. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Hunt] is very welcome to entertain any opinion of my friendship he may please. That is a matter which causes me no discontent. I presume other gentlemen of the committee understood that I did not oppose the amendment. I made a suggestion to the honorable chairman of the committee having charge of the Patent Office fund, which, in my opinion, was right and proper. I suggested that it was too late in the winter to procure seeds for a proper distribution. Ah! but the gentleman says, if you cannot distribute to all of the States, distribute them to all you can.

Now, sir, if this gentleman had reflected a little further upon the subject he would have seen that when we purchase seeds we purchase them for different parts of the country. The seeds purchased at this season of the year, for distribution at the South, will be unfit for distribution next winter. Many of them at that time will be unfit for cultivation. Many of them would not germinate if planted. You will see from this the object of my suggestion.

I have not opposed the appropriation, and I do not intend to do it. I leave the business with the committee who have the charge of it, and I am perfectly willing that with them the responsibility should be left. I hope the House will take a vote upon it, and consume no further time in the discussion of this subject.

Mr. CLARK. I stated, when I addressed the House before, or intended to state, that the Department had already assumed obligations in the purchase of seeds. They have received from different European Government, at different times, seeds of grains and grasses, which thereby has imposed upon the Patent Office the obligation of returning a like amount. In order to meet those obligations they must purchase seeds and grain to a considerable amount, for which they want an appropriation.

They did this in pursuance of an appropriation last year of $5,000, and the appropriate Department now recommends $10,000 as the least sum which will answer the purposes of the Department.

In reference to the distribution of seeds, I will say that they may be returned from Europe now in time for distribution by the members of this Congress.

I need say nothing as to the benefits derived from this interchange of seeds. It is hardly necessary to try to satisfy this committee upon that subject. We all know that the valuable kind of wheat, known as the Mediterranean, which was distributed from the Patent Office, has been of immense benefit to the country, and has added thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars to the farming interests of the country. It seems to me proper that this small appropriation should be made.

Mr. HUNT. I withdraw the amendment, if there is no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let us have a vote upon it.

The question was put, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES moved a pro forma amendment, and proceeded to say: I move the amendment merely to say to the gentleman who introduced this proposition, that, in the explanation just made, has been given one of the best reasons, and one which is entirely conclusive with me, against this proposition. That is, that the Commissioner of Patents has agreed to interchange seeds with other countries and Governments, and has thereby incurred responsibilities, without being authorized to do so by law. For one, sir, I do not intend to vote here to complete obligations entered into by Executive officers, from the President down, without authority of law.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. JONES, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am satisfied that if we wait in accordance with the views expressed by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston]—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is reminded that it is necessary for him to move an amendment to the amendment in order to entitle him to the floor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move, then, to increase the sum named in the amendment by adding $10,000.

I was proceeding to remark, Mr. Chairman, that I am satisfied, if we wait for the appropriate time to arrive in accordance with the views expressed by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston], that it will never come. There are some portions of the Union where it is now the suitable time in which to put seeds into the ground. There are other portions of the Union in which the spring is the more appropriate time. In the extreme North—if you please—both spring and autumn are appropriate seasons for this purpose. In some portions of the country any season of the year will answer the purpose.

What then becomes of the argument, that this amendment should be so framed as to make it applicable to the appropriate season of the year for procuring seeds? I represent a portion of the West—an agricultural region of country—and has it come to this, while we are lavishly expending hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars of the people's money for every conceivable purpose under heaven, that we should turn a deaf ear to this call for a small pittance of $10,000 for the greatest interest of this country—the agricultural interest—which lies at the foundation of all other interests?

Many of my constituents, among other demands made upon my time and attention, have called upon me to procure seeds of different varieties and forward to them. I regard it as one of the first duties I owe to them. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be adopted, and that the appropriation will be increased to $20,000, in order that we may, in the appropriate discharge of our duties here, not turn a deaf ear to any compliance with the calls of our constituents in this important respect.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I do not deny that the mutual exchange of the seeds of different countries is beneficial to the farming interest. Perhaps a similar exchange of specimens of cloth might help the mercantile and manufacturing interests. Perhaps a similar exchange of mechanical tools might be useful to mechanics. But the material question is, whether individuals shall make these exchanges, or whether Government shall be the agent to negotiate them?

In my opinion, Government violates its office, and transcends its province, in concerning itself with such things. Its sole, legitimate office is to protect the persons and property of its subjects. Leave it within its province, and it will hardly fail to do its work well. But allow it to exceed its province, and it will hardly fail to do all its work ill. Its usurpation of the work of the people has done more than anything else to make Government a burden upon the people instead of a blessing to the people.

It is true that the sum which is called for in this case is a small one. But the principle to be violated by our voting this sum is a great one.

We need to be continually mindful of the true and only office of civil government. It is to hold a shield over its subjects, beneath which they may, in safety from foreign aggressions, pursue their various callings. It is, also, by its ever present and strong arm, to restrain its subjects from aggressions upon each other.

I trust, sir, that we shall leave the people to get their seeds for themselves; and that we shall vote down the amendment to the amendment, and the amendment also.

The question was put, and the amendment to the amendment disagreed to by the committee.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend by increasing the appropriation five dollars.

I have only to say, Mr. Chairman, that, in my humble judgment, the Government cannot be better employed at present than in endeavoring to promote that interest which lies at the foundation of its prosperity. There is a fatal tendency in human nature to be most neglectful of that upon which we are most dependent; and such has emphatically been the case so far as the agricultural interests of this country are concerned.

This Government has undertaken to uphold almost everything else except agriculture. It has organized the Patent Office for the express purpose of protecting the manufacturing ingenuity of the country, but it has done comparatively nothing to foster and uphold the agricultural interests of the country.

Now, sir, I speak what I know to be true with regard to the farming interest of the country which I represent, when I say that it is the enlightened farmers—and almost all of them may be said to be enlightened—who are eager and anxious with regard to this matter. They are continually writing to their Representatives upon this floor, to urge upon the Government to do something to promote their prosperity. They are anxious that something should be done to promote the prosperity of the agricultural interests of the country; and my own constituents are continually writing to me to urge upon me to procure for them, if I can, such seeds as will be important for them to cultivate.

What is the amount of $10,000 for the purpose of promoting these great agricultural interests in exchanging seeds with other countries, and procuring them for the use of our own farmers? What is it when its effect will be to secure the prosperity of the country?

Our parsimony should be extended a little to other matters, such as promoting the commerce of the country by subsidizing the steam marine of the country. The commerce of the country can reach its hands into the Treasury, and scatter, with utter recklessness of profusion, the funds of the people.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Never, by my vote.

Mr. WADE. I am glad of it; nor by mine, either. Now, I merely want to say, that the farmers are deeply interested in this matter. They form the substratum upon which rests the whole prosperity of the political, civil, and religious institutions of the country; and if we deny them this small sum of $10,000 we shall be ungrateful to that source from which we derive our prosperity, humanly speaking.

Mr. McMULLIN. I feel grateful to the gentlemen all round the Hall who seem to take charge of the agricultural interest. I represent an agricultural district myself, and I have the honor to be an humble member of that interest. But, sir, it does seem to me that the innovation now proposed is rather extravagant. We have heretofore appropriated $5,000 annually, out of the Patent Office fund, for the purchase of seeds. The proposition now is to appropriate $10,000 in addition to the last appropriation. Now, I ask the House if that is necessary or called for?

It is not necessary for me to reiterate the argument of the gentleman who heads the Committee of Ways and Means, that it is too late in the season to purchase and distribute these seeds. But does not every gentleman, who is at all acquainted with agricultural pursuits, know that if you purchase seeds, and lay them over for a year, four fifths of them will not sprout or produce?

I claim to be one of the friends and representatives of the great agricultural interest, the greatest interest of this country; but I tell gentlemen who seem so anxious to protect that interest, that it does not demand this appropriation. I hope that we shall have a vote taken at once, and hear no more about the purchasing of seeds in this extraordinary and extravagant manner.

The question was then taken on Mr. WADE's amendment to the amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. MIDDLESWARTH. I move to increase the amount of the appropriation one dollar.

I have the honor to represent a class of citizens who have a deep interest in this matter. The greater part of my constituents are agriculturists, and I think that if there is any class of the people of the United States that has not been protected by this Government, it is that class. Commerce, manufactures, and all other interests are protected, and have been from year to year protected; but nothing has been done for the farming interest, to which we are all so much indebted.

Sir, I know, of my own personal knowledge, that seeds which have been obtained from the Patent Office have been of very great use in the country that I come from. I suppose that it is known to every gentleman on this floor that even the best kinds of seeds—wheat of the finest quality—will, after it has been used for a considerable length of time in particular soils, deteriorate. It will not be what it was when first planted.

The sending of seed, even from the North to the South, and from the South to the North, is of great advantage. I have no doubt that the exchange of seeds with other countries would be of far greater advantage. I do not think that $10,000, or even $20,000 could be better appropriated than for the advancement of the interest of the farmer.

Mr. Chairman, from whom do we obtain the means of subsistence? Certainly from the agricultural portion of our citizens. The welfare of our country is in their hands.

The farmer has heretofore been looked upon as of those who were unworthy of the national notice; but that day has gone by. The farmer, if honest and industrious, now-a-days holds a respectable and even enviable position in society.

I hope the appropriation may be granted. I would rather it were larger. If any gentleman will take the trouble to go to the Patent Office, and examine the different kinds of corn there for inspection, he will see that the quality of that grain could be vastly improved in his own country, I do not care where he comes from. I have seen some of the best specimens of corn in the Patent Office that I have ever witnessed in my life, and corn which was raised from seed distributed by this Government.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I shall not prolong the debate on this seed matter more than a minute or two. It is time we should vote it in or vote it out. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine of the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] on this subject. I believe that one of the chief objects of Government is to protect, foster, and promote the great interests of the people. These interests are agriculture, commerce, and the mechanic arts. They are the fountains from which spring our national greatness, and our individual happiness. We have always legislated for our commerce, and annually appropriate millions to sustain a Navy for its protection. We legislate for manufactures, and the mechanic arts; but that great interest, agriculture, out of which these grow, has been sadly neglected, and I will go as far as the furthest to do it justice. This seed matter is but a small item, yet I go for it.

But I wish to say to the two gentlemen of the "Free Democracy party" who have taken issue on this subject, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH], and my colleague, [Mr. WADE], that this is no time for a disturbance in their party. The crisis which is presented requires harmony, even in their corner of the Hall. I hope they will indulge a more fraternal feeling on this subject, and will do nothing in future which may tend to "bust up" their party on the "seed question." [General laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, let us restore harmony and good will by removing this very exciting subject; and by voting upon the question without delay.

The amendment to the amendment was withdrawn by unanimous consent.

The original amendment was again read.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move to increase the appropriation $250.

I have not troubled the House, Mr. Chairman, during this session, with any remarks on any subject, and I shall not do so often hereafter. That, however, will depend a little upon the occasion. Those of the committee who are in the habit of reading the history of the country will recollect that we owe the great rise and growth of the interests of the cotton manufacture to this very patronage of Congress, in originally procuring seeds, at a great expense, and even from the East Indies. It was very properly done. It partakes somewhat of the character of an act to regulate commerce. It is an act to promote exchanges. It is, after all, but regulating the internal exchanges of this country.

If I were to name the two great objects for which this Government was established, I would say, they were to regulate our foreign relations, and the relations between the several States.

I differ from my friend from New York [Mr. SMITH] in his remark, that this matter can be as well attended to by individuals. Now, everything which cannot be as well done by individuals as by Government, should be done by the Government, if at all. Who does not see that there are thousands of things which have been done by this Government, for the very reason that individuals, no matter how able they may be in a pecuniary point of view, from want of concert of opinion and action, and from the want of proper locality, cannot do. I confess, in regard to this little matter, that it would not be the amount, or the particular application of it, that would induce me to vote for it. It is the principle I have in view. I wish to see this Government take a proper stand in regard to agriculture, and I am willing to give my support to the smallest sum to commence it.

Now, sir, what is the reason that the General Government cannot do it? To be sure, I expect to be met, by a certain class of statesmen well known to the country, with their grammars and dictionaries, to prove that it is unconstitutional. But, sir, it is not so. The States could do it, so far as exchanging and sending out the seeds raised within the States are concerned; but if we wish to get exchanges in all matters, and between all the nations of the earth, the matter must be taken charge of, and carried on by the Federal Government. Look at this Government. It receives all the revenues from duties on imports, and from the public lands, amounting to fifty millions annually. What does the Government do with it? It disclaims the right and the power to make internal improvements, and it tries to shift the burden of such improvements upon the particular localities, by conceding to the States the power of levying tonnage duties, for the improvements of rivers and harbors. They spend the revenues, for aught I know, in sending examiners to search for some new corners in South America or in Africa, where we can locate a new consul, whose pockets they fill with money.

The States have not ample power of making the improvements to which I have alluded, but they have been doing everything which the General Government has failed to do, and which individuals cannot do. But in doing these things they ran into debt, and into repudiation. It is time we had a little more sound sentiment upon this subject. It is for the purpose of beginning and extending a proper system of improving agriculture, that I am willing to vote for this appropriation.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am opposed to increasing the appropriation $250, because I believe that the sum of $10,000 is quite enough for the purpose indicated in the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CLARK.] I cannot agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] who, a little while ago, said that you might just as well import machinery as seeds; that it was violating a principle, because machinery might be imported as well as seeds. I do not agree with him—because seeds can be put into the earth, and they will propagate; but machinery, without additional manual labor, cannot be productive.

I have in my district, perhaps, the richest neck of land that can possibly be imagined for supplying the choicest vegetables for the Philadelphia market—Passayunk, renowned in political history, at least that of the State of Pennsylvania, inasmuch as it gave a majority to send me here. [Laughter.] That district has among its people a very large number of agriculturists, and they get no protection upon God's earth in the shape of patronage from the Government, except the few seeds that I have been able to distribute among them, which have been sent to me from the Patent Office. [Laughter.] Very well, so far; but they complain that they are not good seeds. [Laughter.]

I do not agree with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that this is not the proper time to continue this experiment of the distribution of seeds. I am generally opposed to experimenting—I do not like innovations, although I think I will vote for the Nebraska bill reported by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON.] [Laughter.] I do not think that I care much about the amendments. I stand flat-footed upon the Constitution; but that has nothing to do with the appropriation for seeds. [Laughter.] I said that I was opposed to the amendment increasing the sum $250; but I will vote for this small expenditure. It is but an experiment, which I hope will be a successful one, for the reason I have indicated, that I desire to have a fair chance, under the distribution, among the Neckers in my district, who send to the Philadelphia market the best vegetables that can be produced anywhere. I desire that they should derive what advantage there is likely to be gained by the distribution of the few seeds among them to which they are entitled, at the expense of the General Government. I do not think that this would be a violation of the letter or the spirit of the Constitution, but that it is included within its purview and provisions.

Hence I state now, clearly and fairly, the reasons which will induce me to give this vote: because it is constitutional, because it does not violate any principle, because it benefits a very worthy set of people in my district, who will be enabled, perhaps, in some small degree, to improve the character of the vegetables with which they supply the Philadelphia market.

The question was then taken on Mr. SIMMONS's amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I move to amend the amendment by increasing the appropriation one dollar.

Mr. Chairman, this seems to be a very fruitful subject for debate—a capital subject for gentlemen who want one to talk about. All profess to be friends of the agricultural interests of the country, and all at the same time profess to be extreme economists. Now, it is an old saying that "time is money;" and I submit to gentlemen of this House, whether it would not be well to give the industrious agricultural population of the country some five or ten thousand dollars, and save twice that amount in time, by taking the question as soon as possible? I withdraw the amendment I have offered.

The question was then taken upon the original amendment offered by Mr. CLARK, and it was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out that part of the amendment which provides that the appropriation shall be paid out of the Patent Office fund.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a question of order. I ask the Chair if the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLARK] has not been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is not in order; for the committee cannot strike out what they have voted to insert.

Mr. JONES. What amendment has been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. JONES. What became of the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. PRATT:]

The CHAIRMAN. It was withdrawn.

Mr. JONES. I gave notice that I should object to the withdrawal of any amendment.

A MEMBER. It is too late now; you cannot take any step backwards.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan has been inserted by order of the committee, and that offered by the gentleman from Tennessee is, therefore, not in order.

Mr. JONES. Well, sir, it is only another evidence of the fact that when men start wrong, they get further and further off from what is right and proper.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have an amendment which I desire to offer; but if the committee will allow the bill to be read through, I will withhold it until that has been done.

Mr. HAVEN obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. BENTON, who said: I have an amendment which I desire to offer in this place, because it belongs to the class of marine hospitals which the committee have been considering. I move to insert the following:

For the entire completion of the edifice and grounds of the hospital at St. Louis, and for putting the whole into a fit state for occupancy, $10,000.

That amendment is in the precise words of the recommendation which has been sent down to us from the Secretary of the Treasury; and all I have to state to the committee is, that this hospital is now at the point of completion, but has never been occupied at all. It is only awaiting this little appropriation to enable it to go into operation. I repeat, that I have copied the words of the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The question was taken, and the amendment agreed to.

Mr. HAVEN. I now move to amend by inserting the following:

For the purchase of the lots or parcels of land, with the appurtenances and the buildings thereon, belonging to the office to the Bank of Commerce, and the other thereof to the Bank of the State of New York, and particularly referred to and described in the two contracts, one with each of said banks, for the leasing and the right to purchase the same, bearing date the 19th of August, 1853: Provided, That before the said purchase is made, the State of New York shall cede to the United States jurisdiction over said land and property, and shall, by law, exonerate the same and the property of the United States thereon from all taxes, levies, and assessments thereon while the same remains the property of the United States, $530,000.

Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen of the committee will refer to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on finance, at page eleven, they will find the reasons for this amendment. I offer it under the instruction of the Committee of Ways and Means. Last year, provision was made for the establishment of an assay office in the city of New York, and the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to procure proper buildings and machinery for the accommodation of that office. On page eleven of his report on finance, the Secretary tells us that he has made two leases, one with the Bank of Commerce, and one with the Bank of the State of New York, running for fifteen years each, at an annual rent for the two buildings of $53,000. The aggregate rent for those two buildings for fifteen years will amount to $795,000. Each lease contains a provision that the Government of the United States may have the privilege of purchasing the buildings and ground at any time within two years, for the amount named in the amendment, $530,000. The Committee of Ways and Means thought that it was wise to purchase the property at once for $530,000, and avoid the payment of the rent, and be the owners of the property at the end of fifteen years, instead of paying during fifteen years two hundred and odd thousand dollars by way of rent, and not own the property at the expiration of that time, more especially when we take into consideration the fact that the Government is now buying up its stocks and securities at a premium of some twenty per cent. on the dollar. It is a question that the committee feel some reluctance to recommend or urge on the House. Still it is a matter of economy; it is recommended by the Department, and I submit to the House that it is wise at least to pay for the property when you can buy it for much less than the rent which the Secretary has contracted to give for it.

This matter is, in my judgment, legitimately and properly before the committee. The Secretary has made no contract binding or pledging the Government in any way; but he has very well reserved to the Government, in his contracts, the privilege of saving the amount of money that I have indicated, by becoming the absolute purchasers of the property.

Mr. FLORENCE. I intend, as I believe it to be my duty to do, to submit a point of order upon this proposition: I ask if it is clearly a "deficiency," within the understanding of the word as applied to the provisions of this bill?

Now, sir, it will be recollected by every gentleman who occupied a seat upon this floor during the last Congress, that when the establishment of an assay office in New York was proposed, $100,000 was considered quite a sufficient sum for that purpose, and when it was intimated that it would lead to heavy expenditures for the erection of a public building for the accommodation of the office, the idea was scouted by those who were the strongest supporters of the measure. Now, I submit to the committee that this is a wasteful and extravagant expenditure of the public money. There is no earthly need of it. For the mere purpose of assaying, a much smaller building than that which has been leased by the Secretary of the Treasury would suffice. I did not hear very distinctly the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] but I understood him to say that this building had been leased by the Secretary for the enormous rent of fifty or sixty thousand dollars per annum.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman is presenting a point of order, it is not debatable. If he is opposing the amendment, it is debatable.

Mr. FLORENCE. I intended to oppose the amendment. I submit that it opens up a question which will be brought before this committee at some time or other. It now unnecessarily postpones the consideration of this deficiency bill. I submit that the amendment is not in order, because it is not within the meaning of the word "deficiency," as understood in this committee; no appropriation having been made for the construction of the building.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, this work is in progress; and therefore the amendment is in order, so far as the rule in reference to deficiencies is concerned. The Chair is informed that the money is wanted for the prosecution of the work before the 30th of June, 1854.

Mr. FLORENCE. Does the Chair overrule the point of order that I submitted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I appeal from that decision of the Chair, merely for the purpose of getting an expression of the opinion of the committee on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, it is claimed, contains an appropriation needed to be expended for the prosecution of the work referred to, between the present time and the 30th of June next. The Chair supposes the amendment to be in order to a deficiency bill, and so rules. From this decision of the Chair the gentleman from Pennsylvania appeals, and the question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. FLORENCE. I submit to the committee whether this appropriation has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury as necessary to complete the work contemplated by an appropriation previously made?

The question was then taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. FLORENCE. I contend that there is no necessity for this appropriation.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. I think that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has already spoken five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's five minutes have not yet expired.

Mr. LETCHER. Has the gentleman five minutes still to speak?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. FLORENCE. I submit that the gentleman from Virginia is himself out of order.

The appropriation proposed by the amendment is extravagant and unnecessary. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] came here last year, and asked for the establishment of an assay office in that city, it was never contemplated that it should be of the magnitude now designed, and which must, I am sure, astound this committee. I have already said that there was no earthly necessity for this expenditure of money for the purpose of refinement. The object of the establishment of the assay office in New York was not the refining of gold. Refining adds nothing to the commercial character or value of gold. The object of the establishment was to stamp upon gold which had been assayed its true value, so that it might be used for commercial purposes—for exportation, or to be sent to the mint for coinage. It does not necessarily require that the gold so assayed shall be refined, either to give it commercial value or character. There is then no necessity for a building for refining purposes. The cost for refining in New York must necessarily be from thirty-three per cent. to fifty per cent. higher than at the parent Mint in Philadelphia.

The increased cost of labor, and the cost of chemicals, which cannot be procured except from Philadelphia, imposes upon the owner of the gold just that additional cost, which might be prevented by sending it to Philadelphia for refining.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to strike out $530,000 and insert in lieu thereof $535,000.

At the last Congress an act was passed to establish an assay office in the city of New York. The fifteenth section of that bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to procure, by rent, lease, or otherwise, a building or apartments, in the city of New York, suitable for the operations of said office, unless he is of opinion that suitable apartments in the custom-house in that city may be assigned for that purpose. Thus we see that the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized, by the last Congress, to rent, lease, or otherwise procure, suitable buildings in the city of New York for this assay office. I do not know, nor can I determine, whether this power has been judiciously exercised by the Secretary or not; but this is the condition of affairs as we find them now.

The Secretary, in pursuance of this law, has leased, for the term of fifteen years, certain buildings and grounds for this purpose, at the annual rent of $53,000, amounting in the fifteen years to $795,000. He has also made a conditional contract with the proprietors and owners of those buildings and grounds, that he may purchase it for the Government, in fee simple, for the sum of $530,000. Now, sir, the question for this House and for Congress to determine is, whether they will go on and pay the $795,000 in the fifteen years, and then vacate the property and let it revert to its owners, or whether they will pay the $530,000 now, and thereby secure the property to the United States. As a matter of economy, if it were left to me at this time to determine, I would prefer to pay the $530,000 cash, and keep the property, rather than the $795,000 in rent, and not obtain the property in fee. True economy would direct the purchase. I think it is good policy to make it. I cannot tell whether this contract has been wisely and judiciously made. However that may be, I prefer the purchase, on the principle of economy, for the sum named, rather than pay $795,000 in rent.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am candid enough to acknowledge to this committee that I do not understand precisely the relations existing between the Government and the lessor of the building for the assay office in New York. I understood, from the imperfect hearing I had of the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] that the right of purchase for $530,000 was limited by this contract to two years, and that it could be abrogated at any moment after that time that the Secretary of the Treasury and the lessor of the building should agree upon. But if it is absolute, and if it cannot be changed—if $53,000 a year is to be paid for fifteen years by way of lease, and the Government can buy the property in fee simple for $530,000—I agree entirely with the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] that it is better to make the purchase. So far as the possession of the building is concerned it does not at all interfere with the opinion I entertain, or that I expressed, as to the impropriety of establishing the refining office in connection with the assay office in New York city. I am candid enough, and I feel it to be my duty to say to this committee, and the country, that I believe it would be better that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York should be adopted, and the money appropriated, than that we should pay in fifteen years $750,000 as rent. Hence I am opposed to the increase of appropriation asked for by the gentleman from Tennessee, and I hope that the appropriation of $530,000 will be made.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon Mr. HAYEN'S amendment; it was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

[A message was here received from the Senate by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had receded from its disagreement to the House amendments to the Senate bill to regulate and disburse the contingent fund of the Senate, and for other purposes, and had agreed to said amendments.]

Mr. RICE. I offer the following amendment:

For finishing the Capitol and Territorial prison in the Territory of Minnesota, grading and fencing the grounds for the same, $10,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Governor of the Territory of Minnesota calls the attention of the Legislature to the fact, that the money heretofore appropriated for finishing these buildings has not been sufficient, and in consequence that they have have received great injury. A memorial upon that subject lies upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask the Delegate from Minnesota whether this proposition has been before any committee of the House? Is it an estimate recommended either by the Department, any committee, or both?

Mr. RICE. It has been recommended by neither. I addressed a letter in regard to this matter to the Secretary of the Interior, thinking that it came within his jurisdiction, with a copy of the message of the Governor of Minnesota. He referred it to the Secretary of the Treasury, who addressed a communication upon the subject to the House yesterday, which was then read.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. As I understand this matter, it is one that commends itself to the sense of justice of the committee in behalf of the Territory of Minnesota. An appropriation has heretofore been made by Congress for the completion of the territorial buildings there. That appropriation, under the circumstances, is proved to be entirely insufficient for the full completion of the capitol and the territorial prison, and for the grading and fencing of the grounds in a manner corresponding to the character of those public buildings.

The attention of the Legislature of Minnesota has been called by the Governor of the Territory to this subject. The estimated cost of what is wanted has been stated by my friend, the Delegate from Minnesota, who knows all about it; and he has given his opinion, which satisfies me, and, I believe, will satisfy every gentleman in this committee, that this appropriation is one we should most cheerfully make for the purposes indicated.

It is true that this matter has not gone to any committee of this House, but the gentleman from Minnesota called the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to it; and a letter from that officer, in answer, has been received, and was read to the House yesterday. I do not know that there has been any regular estimate from the Department made with regard to the amount necessary, but the gentleman from Minnesota, and the Governor of the Territory, state that $10,000 will be necessary for the purpose proposed; and I myself believe that it is but just to that Territory that the appropriation should be granted. Sir, that Territory is a child of our Government, and we should extend to it the fostering care of a parent. We should deal liberally and justly in this matter, and not hesitate to come forward in a case like this, and complete what we have already begun. This appropriation will not only complete your public buildings there, but it will beautify and adorn them. I therefore appeal to the generosity and magnanimity, and the sense of justice, of this committee to sustain the amendment just offered by the Delegate. The Territory has no vote here, and none in the other branch. She has a delegate here—my friend who offered this amendment, and who serves his constituents with great zeal and fidelity—but he cannot vote with us. The appeal to us on that account is, therefore, so much the stronger, and I do trust the amendment will be favorably received by this committee.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I move to increase the appropriation one dollar.

In regard to the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] it is due to the Delegate from Minnesota that I should say, that as I happened to be the only member of the Committee of Ways and Means with whom he was personally acquainted, he requested me to bring the matter before the committee; I did so, but informally, and no action was taken by them upon the subject. I suggested to the gentleman from Minnesota that it would be well to refer the matter to the Treasury Department, and have a communication upon the subject sent from that Department to the Speaker of the House, which could be referred regularly to the Committee of Ways and Means. The gentleman followed my suggestion, and yesterday a communication came from the Treasury Department, which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. The committee, however, have not since had a meeting, and therefore it is that no recommendation from them upon the subject has been made.

The gentleman from Minnesota considers it a deficiency proper to be inserted in the deficiency bill, and that this is the appropriate place to insert it. It is not probable that any action now will be taken upon the subject by the Committee of Ways and Means, and if such action were to be taken it must depend, in a great degree, upon the evidence now in the possession of the committee.

The communication from the Treasury simply transmits the letter from the Delegate from Minnesota, with an extract from the message of the Governor of that Territory. This is all upon which that Department could rely, and it is all upon which we can rely, in addition to the statement of the Delegate in confirmation of the papers. I believe, for one, after conference with the gentleman from Minnesota, that the appropriation ought to pass. Although the Committee of Ways and Means have not, and probably will not make any recommendation, yet it is a deficiency which I hope the House will see proper to grant. If there be no objection I will now withdraw the amendment I have offered.

There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. RICE, it was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move to amend by inserting the following:

For completing the marine hospital at Vicksburg, Mississippi, the sum of $55,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a question of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is that that is an estimate—

Mr. BARKSDALE. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will not be so hasty in making his point of order, but will allow me to explain the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. This is the proper time for me to make it, and it is this: this item is in the regular estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury for the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and is not estimated for as a deficiency. The Department ask nothing for this purpose for this year, but they ask something for the next fiscal year.

I therefore make the point of order, that this being a bill to supply deficiencies, and to furnish appropriations to be used during the current year, and the appropriation contained in this amendment not being for the current year, it is not in order as an amendment to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Mississippi what is the fact?

Mr. BARKSDALE. I will state the facts to the committee. The sum of $10,000 has already been appropriated for the erection of a marine hospital at Vicksburg; a site has been purchased, and the work, that far, has been commenced. But the work cannot be continued until this deficiency is supplied by the appropriation of the additional amount now asked for.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Mississippi whether this sum is wanted during the present fiscal year, or only during the coming fiscal year?

Mr. BARKSDALE. Certainly. The work cannot be prosecuted until the amount I have asked for shall be given. The sum of $10,000 has already been appropriated—

The CHAIRMAN. The question submitted to the gentleman by the Chair is, whether this sum is needed during the fiscal year as a deficiency, or in the course of the coming year?

Mr. BARKSDALE. Most assuredly it is for the present fiscal year, ending on the 30th of June next.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has some doubts whether the amendment is in order or not. It depends upon a fact about which the gentlemen differ—whether this sum is needed during the present fiscal year or during the next.

Mr. ORR. The best evidence upon that point is to be found in the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury. He submits this as an estimate for the general appropriation bill, and not for the deficiency bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has great doubts.

Mr. BARKSDALE. This appropriation is asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury in a letter to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in which he says that $10,000 has been appropriated for this purpose, and that a further sum of $55,000 will be required for the construction of the building, making an aggregate of $65,000 for the site and structure. Now, the committee will see at once that it is utterly impossible to prosecute the work until the additional sum of $55,000 shall be appropriated.

Mr. FULLER. I really hope that the gentleman from Mississippi will withdraw his amendment. The committee will recollect that I had an amendment of precisely the same character, and that I withdrew it this morning, yielding to the urgent solicitation of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and to my own sense of propriety. These appropriations would more properly go into the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and ought not to be tacked on to the deficiency bill, making it a general appropriation bill.

I ask the gentleman from Mississippi, therefore, to follow the example I have set, and withdraw his amendment, for the sake of preserving propriety in our legislation.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I am satisfied that there is no similarity between my case and the one mentioned by the gentleman from Maine.

The CHAIRMAN. Though the Chair thinks, upon the statement made by both gentlemen, that the amendment is more proper to the regular appropriation bill than the present one, yet, the question being one rather of fact than of order, the Chair feels it to be his duty to submit it to the committee for their decision. The Chair, with a great deal of hesitation, decides the amendment to be in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Would the Chair inquire whether this work has been commenced at all—whether anything has been done save the selection of a site?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the belief that more has been done, and that the work is actually in progress. The Chair would inquire whether the work is or is not in progress. He understood it to be stated that it was in progress.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I explained to the committee that it was in progress, in so far that commissioners had been appointed, and a site selected and paid for. I said that it was utterly impossible—and in that I contended the deficiency existed—to continue the prosecution of the work unless this appropriation was made.

Mr. JONES. No work has been done at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Though the Chair has great doubt of the amendment being in order, he decides it to be in order, and submits the question to the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let me call the attention of the Chair to the estimates of the Secretary of the Navy for deficiencies. Among them are these: To complete the marine hospitals at Cleveland, at St. Louis, at Chicago, at Louisville, Kentucky; at Evansville, Indiana; and at San Francisco, and for inclosing and draining, &c., &c. For the prosecution of the marine hospital at Portland, Maine, $50,000. For the prosecution of the marine hospital at Vicksburg, and so on. So far as the Secretary of the Navy then can settle the point, it is settled against the appropriation.

I want now to say a word to my friend from Mississippi—that it is precisely, in every single particular, a parallel case with the one of Portland, Maine.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The difference is, that in that case the site had not been selected.

Mr. HOUSTON. In that case there was a site belonging to the Government.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. I wish to say one word. I have urged the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] not to agree to the request of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] to withdraw his amendment; and I did so for this reason: The gentleman from New Hampshire, in speaking the other day, alluded to the condition of the lower part of the Mississippi river, and, with that liberality which I am happy to say has always characterized his sentiments on this subject, said that if such appropriations were needed anywhere, they were in the lower part of the Mississippi river.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Louisiana that the question of order is not whether the appropriation is needed or not, but whether the amendment is proper in this or in another bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I intend to examine whether the appropriation is for a deficiency or not. Now, what is a deficiency?

Mr. JONES. There is nothing before the committee on which debate is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order; and, if objected to, the gentleman cannot proceed.

Mr. LETCHER. Does the Chair decide the amendment to be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. He does.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. PERKINS. Does that give me an opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to debate the question?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not. The question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania, offered the following amendment:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, out of any unexpended balance of appropriations heretofore made for the construction of the custom-house, post office, &c., at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and which may remain after the application of the same, to apply so much thereof as may, in his judgment, be necessary to furnish in a suitable manner the several rooms and offices in said building, to improve the grounds, and so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the two commissioners who superintended the construction of said buildings three dollars per day each.

Mr. RITCHIE. I desire to say a few words in explanation of the amendment. It asks for no appropriation whatever. The appropriation was made years ago for the building of the custom-house and the post office. The architect has gone on and completed the building, and, in doing so, made his calculation so as to leave a sufficient sum of money out of the appropriation to furnish the house, to—

Mr. LETCHER, (interrupting.) I rise to a question of order. I ask whether this amendment is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not in order. It does not refer to an appropriation for a work authorized by law, but to the regulation of salaries, and other matters.

The Clerk then read the next clause of the bill, as follows:

"For the increased compensation of the surveyor general of Oregon, from the 3d of March, 1853, to the 30th of June, 1854, $1,327 77."

Mr. LANE, of Oregon, offered the following amendment, to be added to the clause last read:

For the payment of the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the provisional government of Oregon in defense of the people of said Territory from the attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians in the years 1847 and 1848, and that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to allow and pay the sums found due, and allowed by the Governor of said Territory, or any one of the commissioners of the Cayuse war claim, $75,000.

Mr. LANE. If the committee will give me their attention for a few minutes, I think I will be able to satisfy them that the amendment I have offered ought to be adopted. When I arrived in the Territory of Oregon in 1848, and entered upon my duties as Governor, my attention was directed to the Cayuse war, and the expenses incurred by the Territory in suppressing the hostilities committed by the Cayuse Indians against the settlers. I called the attention of the Legislature to the subject, and used the following language:

"From the best information I have been able to gather from estimates and otherwise, the expense of the late Cayuse war may be set down at about $190,000.

"This indebtedness has borne heavily on many individuals, who advanced money to the provisional government, some of whom borrowed money for the purpose of arming and subsisting the troops, and have since paid these sums out of their own funds, by which they have been greatly injured in their private affairs.

"The justice of the war, and the good conduct of the citizens in promptly turning out in defense of their country, entitle them not only to the good opinion of Government, but to an appropriation by Congress sufficient to pay the expense of the war."

At that time the books of the subsistence and quartermaster's department were placed in my hands, as also the muster rolls. My knowledge of the service enabled me to estimate correctly the whole amount of the expenses of the war; and I called the attention of the Legislature to the subject. Congress, in 1851, passed an act in relation to this subject in the following words:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the provisional government of Oregon, in defending the people of said Territory from the attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians, in the years 1847 and 1848, upon the presentation by the Governor of said Territory to the said Secretary of the Treasury, of a full, accurate, and detailed statement of the actual and necessary expenses of said defense and hostilities, accompanied by proper vouchers, and satisfactory proof of the correctness thereof, authenticated in conformity with the usages of the Department, and that the sum of $100,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry the provisions of this law into effect."

If they had appropriated $190,000, then, no further action of Congress would have been necessary. I have now in my possession the report of the commissioner, who has examined and allowed the awards in all the claims, and he sets down the balance of the expenses of that war at $75,000—$15,000 less than I made out. Many persons who served in that war are scattered now in various parts of the world; many of them are dead, and their claims will never be presented. Many of them had no heirs and no families. If these claims had been allowed, they would have covered the amount which I estimated in my message. I had the means of ascertaining correctly the expenses of the war. The Secretary of the Treasury, as I understand it, has sent here a communication recommending this appropriation, which has been referred to the proper committee, and which has been ordered to be printed. The commissioner, as I said before, has set down the balance of these Cayuse war claims at $75,000. Congress has authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the actual and necessary expenses of that war; but $100,000 are not sufficient for that purpose, and a further appropriation of $75,000 is necessary. I hope every member of the committee will see that Congress has already assumed the debt and authorized the payment of the expenses of that war; and that they will not hesitate to grant the $75,000 necessary to pay the balance of the expenses.

Mr. MATTESON. This claim came before the Military Committee at the first session of the Thirty-First Congress, and a proposition was made to pay $195,000 for this very purpose. There was no evidence before the committee—no detailed statements—showing that the expenses of this war amounted to any such sum. There was no evidence furnished at all by the Delegate from Oregon, at that time, to show what those expenses were. The committee, under the circumstances, and with such information as they had before them, struck out $90,000, which made the appropriation $100,000. From that time to this I have never seen any detailed statement of these expenses. Such a statement may be here; but, I think, before we vote this $75,000, we should know in what those expenses consist, and whether these charges are fair or legal as against the Government. At this time, and without further evidence, I am opposed to this amendment, and until I know what is to become of these $75,000.

Mr. LANE. I know it is not in order to explain at this time, but I will say to the gentleman, that the appropriation which is now asked to be made is for services rendered and for subsistence furnished, and the reports are now in the hands of the printer.

Mr. MATTESON. The reports are what I would like to see.

Mr. LANE. The report has been received by this House, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed. It has gone to the printer, and, therefore, is not before the committee; but this is the proper time and place to insert the appropriation, and I hope the committee will adopt it. I can assure them that it is right, and that the appropriation ought to be granted. I have the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who has examined into the whole subject, and he says that the $75,000 are actually due, and ought to be paid.

Mr. MATTESON. I understand this communication has been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, but I have not heard of any action by that committee. That is what I want to see. What action have the Committee of Ways and Means taken upon the subject?

Mr. HOUSTON. The communication, I understand, was referred to our committee yesterday. I have not seen it at all, and our committee have, of course, taken no action upon it.

Mr. MATTESON. Well, sir, I desire to see the communication, or some report of the Committee of Ways and Means upon it, before I am prepared to vote for this appropriation. I recollect during the second session of the Thirty-First Congress this claim came before the Committee on Military Affairs, and was looked upon with considerable suspicion. But I will not further allude to the matter, because the Delegate then representing Oregon [Mr. Thurston] has since deceased.

The question was put, and the Chair decided the amendment disagreed to—ayes 12, noes not counted.

Mr. LANE. I now want to say that I am satisfied this committee do not understand this proposition, or they would not reject it.

Mr. MATTESON. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. LANE. The gentleman from New York may call to order, but—

[Loud cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment before the committee, and the gentleman cannot proceed with any remarks unless he moves to amend.

Mr. LANE. I demand tellers upon the adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Chair will entertain the proposition for tellers.

Mr. ORR. Then I suppose the amendment is still open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. ORR. I move to amend by reducing the appropriation $1,000.

I do not know anything of the merits of the amendment, and therefore I voted against its adoption when the question was put. I rise now for the purpose of moving this amendment, in order to give my friend from Oregon an opportunity of explaining the appropriation for the satisfaction of the House. I desire to know why this claim has not been referred to a committee? or if it has been so referred, why they have not reported the amendment?

A MEMBER. Let us have the amendment read. The amendment offered by Mr. LANE was read by the Clerk.

Mr. ORR. I would like, also, to ask the gentleman from Oregon when this commission was organized by the Governor of that Territory for the purpose of ascertaining and adjudicating upon the claims of citizens of Oregon for services rendered during this Cayuse war?

Mr. LANE. I will answer the gentleman's question with a great deal of pleasure. The reason why I have not produced any recommendation of a committee in relation to this matter, is that early in the session I introduced a bill providing for a further appropriation of $75,000 for the settlement of these claims, and had it referred to the Committee on Territories, and that committee has not yet reported upon it. But it occurred to me, that as this was a deficiency, it would be proper to offer it as an amendment to the deficiency bill.

The Legislature of the Territory of Oregon appointed a commissioner to investigate the claims growing out of the Cayuse war. He was a sworn officer, paid by the Legislature. He has allowed every soldier a fair compensation for his services, and he has also allowed compensation to those who had furnished clothing, subsistence, and the munitions of war to the troops, but he has allowed for nothing but what was necessary for the subsistence and maintenance of the force, and for actual service. There is a balance of $75,000 still wanting.

I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina what I said before, that when I arrived in Oregon my attention was called to this subject, and I took the report of the Deputy Quartermaster's Department, and the muster roll, and estimated the expense of the war, and set it down in my message at $190,000; but it is now found that $15,000 less than that sum will pay it. I am glad that it is less than I estimated, though I took care to estimate correctly; and the reason why it is less is, as I have before explained, that many of the persons then in the service, and who furnished subsistence, have since died and left no heirs.

Mr. ORR. I understand that the awards made by this commission were in the shape of certificates, and that the money has not been paid by the Territory of Oregon to these persons. Now, if that be the true state of the case, I would submit to the gentleman from Oregon, in all kindness, that I think it would be better for his claim if he would allow some one of the committees of this House to examine it, and report upon it. It can then be offered as an amendment to the Army appropriation bill, or the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, or the specific bill for the payment of these claims can be taken up, and it will be more likely to pass than if the claim is pressed now.

Mr. LANE. Has the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina been called to the law of Congress appropriating $100,000 for the payment of these Cayuse war claims?

Mr. ORR. I was aware that that appropriation had been made.

Mr. LANE. That law assumed the payment of the just claims growing out of the war, and $100,000 is not sufficient for that purpose. I read from that law:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the provisional government of Oregon in defending the people of that Territory from the attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians."

Now, the Secretary of the Treasury was thus authorized to pay "the actual and necessary expenses" incurred by the Territory, but he has not got the means to do it because the requisite appropriation has not been made. The only question is: will you, after thus assuming the payment of the debt, make an appropriation sufficient to meet it, or will you hesitate to make the appropriation?

The amendment to the amendment was then, by unanimous consent, withdrawn.

Mr. CRAIG. This seems to be a matter of great importance. I am, myself, in some doubt; and in order that we may vote understandingly on the subject, and learning that the committee will probably make a report on it to-morrow, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope my friend will withdraw his motion.

Mr. LANE. I ask leave to withdraw the amendment. I shall endeavor to attach it to the bill as an additional section. By that time, in my judgment, we will have ample opportunity to look into and understand the question.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. CRAIG then, by unanimous consent, withdrew his motion that the committee rise.

Mr. MILLER. I would inquire of the Chairman whether that part of the bill relating to marine hospitals has been passed? I desire to submit an amendment in reference to the marine hospital at Evansville.

The CHAIRMAN. That part of the bill has been passed.

Mr. MILLER. Would it be in order for me to submit an amendment of the kind I have suggested at this place?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. MILLER. I ask leave to submit my amendment at this time. I was informed when the subject of marine hospitals was under consideration that there was no deficiency in the appropriation for the one at Evansville. Since then I have learned otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. When the bill has been gone through with the Chair will give the gentleman the floor to submit his amendment.

The Clerk then proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to strike from the bill the following:

"For paying pensions of invalids who were wounded on board of private armed vessels during the last war with Great Britain, from the 1st of July, 1851, to the 30th of June, 1854, $8,400;

"And the office for paying privateer pensions in Boston is hereby abolished, and the said pensioners shall be paid as privateer pensions are paid at other places."

In the regular bill, the Committee of Ways and Means agreed to a provision of this sort; but it was stricken out in the Senate, and when returned to this House that amendment of the Senate was concurred in. I therefore move the amendment I have, in accordance to what seems to be the sense, not only of the Senate, but also the House.

I ask for the reading of the letter from the Pension Office, which fully explains the entire subject. The Senate struck out a similar provision from the regular bill, on the ground that the privateer fund was exhausted, and has been exhausted, for several years. There has been no appropriation under that head since 1850. This provision, which I propose to strike from the bill under consideration, provides for the pension from that time until now. As the Senate struck out the former provision, and that action was concurred in by this House, I take it for granted that this ought to be stricken out.

The Clerk then read a part of the following communication, but was interrupted by the falling of the hammer, under the five-minutes rule:

PENSION OFFICE, December 16, 1853.

SIR: In pursuance of your request, I have the honor to make the following statement on the subject of privateer pensions:

By the acts of June 13, 1812, 17th section, (Statutes at Large, vol. 2, p. 759,) and February 13, 1813, section 1, (vol. 2, p. 799,) two per centum of the prize money accruing from vessels and cargoes captured, and of the salvage of vessels and cargoes recaptured by private armed vessels, was constituted "a fund for the support and maintenance of the widows and orphans of such persons as may be slain, and of such persons as may be wounded and disabled on board of the private armed vessels of the United States, in any engagement with the enemy."

Section 2, of the latter act, prescribes under what regulations, and at what rates, the invalids shall be placed on the pension list, to be "paid out of the fund above provided, and no other."

Act of March 4, 1814, section 1, (vol. 3, p. 102,) grants to the widows and orphans of officers, seamen, and marines, serving on board of private armed vessels, who have died, or shall die, by reason of a wound received in the line of duty, pensions for five years, rated at half the monthly pension to which the deceased would have been entitled for highest disability.

Act of April 16, 1818, section 1, (vol. 3, p. 427,) renews the pensions granted under act of 4th March, 1814, for the further term of five years.

Section 2 of the act extends the benefits of the privateer pensions to the widows and orphans of those who have died in consequence of accident or casualty, occurring in the line of duty.

Act of April 9, 1821, (vol. 4, p. 18,) continues to all persons now in receipt thereof, the pensions granted to widows and orphans, by the acts of March 4, 1814, and April 16, 1818; provided that such "pensions shall alone be paid from the proceeds of the privateer pension fund, so called, and without recourse to the United States for any deficiency."

Act of May 26, 1824, (vol. 4, p. 71,) extends the same to those whose pensions had expired before the 9th April, 1824, the date of the last recited act.

Act of May 23, 1828, section 2, (vol. 4, p. 288,) renews, for five years, to all "widows who now are, or who, at any time within one year, have been in receipt thereof, the pensions granted by acts of March 4, 1814, and April 16, 1818; the same to be paid out of the privateer pension fund, without recourse," &c.

Act of June 19, 1834, (vol. 4, p. 679,) renews, for a further term of five years, the "pensions of all widows who now are, or have been heretofore in the receipt thereof, under the acts of March 4, 1814, and April 16, 1818; provided that said pensions shall be paid from the proceeds of the privateer pension fund, and without recourse to the United States for any deficiency which may hereafter arise thereon."

Act June 15, 1844, (vol. 5, p. 667,) appropriates $18,000 for the payment of invalid pensioners, heretofore paid from the privateer pension fund, their pensions to commence from the time they were stopped in consequence of the exhaustion of said fund.

By reference to the account of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1844, page 253, it will be seen that the privateer pension fund was then reduced to a balance of $74 07. This date, therefore, may be assumed as that of the exhaustion of the fund.

The appropriations for invalid privateer pensions were continued until August 17, 1850, by the act of which date $3,000 were granted for their payment to the 30th June, 1851, inclusive. No provision has been made for the widows subsequent to that given by the act of 1834.

The dates of the commencement of privateer pensions, whether of invalids or widows, were not defined, but regulated as in the case of navy pensions, according to the completion of proof, the decease of the husbands, and upon renewal by the termination of former pensions.

It cannot, therefore, except in general terms, be stated when the widows' pensions ceased; that as the act of June 19, 1834, renewed them for five years, they may be assumed to have ceased at the end of the fiscal year, 30th June, 1839.

The estimates for the current fiscal year have been made solely with reference to the privateer invalid pensioners. Should it be the pleasure of Congress to make further provision for the widows, the amount required would depend upon the dates prescribed for the commencement of their pensions.

As from inquiries made, there is reason to believe that claims may be advanced by parties not hitherto on the pension list, it is proper for me to add, that such claims could not be adjudicated by this office, without further legislation. The privateer pension laws provided pensions, payable out of a specific fund; that fund being exhausted, the laws have no longer force. The annual appropriations heretofore made, and now asked for, refer only to those pensions already upon the list.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
L. P. WALDO, Commissioner.

Hon. GEORGE S. HOUSTON,
Chairman Com. of Ways and Means, House of Reps.

Mr. DAVIS, of Rhode Island. I do not know that I am very well posted up upon this matter, but I have received a letter from one of my constituents, inquiring for information, and he proposed to send me some papers—which I have not yet received—touching this matter of privateer pensions. When the subject was up yesterday, I intended to make a motion, by way of amendment; but I was not in possession of all the facts, and I let the opportunity pass, that the bill might be amended in the Senate.

But looking at this matter as it is, it seems to me that you will do great injustice to those persons who have received pensions up to this time by cutting them off. Most of them are poor and old, and have done great service to the country. The probability is, if you take this course in regard to these pensions, you will have them here in another shape, and have the whole thing to do over again.

I hope the clause will not be stricken out of the bill, but that it will be retained for the benefit of those persons. I think they are just as much entitled to a pension as the thousand and one who are receiving them. They have all rendered services to the country, and at a time when a great deal of service was done by private armed vessels. Though the fund is exhausted, it seems to me, that with ample means in the Treasury at this time, we should not cut off these pensions because there are a few thousand dollars, more or less, of the fund raised for paying these privateer pensions.

I trust that the House will think these general reasons are sufficient why we should not shut out this meritorious class of men. It will be remembered that at that time we had but few vessels, and they were but small. The power and strength of America were then as well tested in these small vessels as in large ones; and those men were imbued with just as much patriotism as if they had sailed in larger vessels. Privateers were then looked upon with more toleration than they would be in our enlightened days, when commerce has become so vast and extensive, and when anything like privateering would be at once discouraged. At that time our citizens looked upon it as a just, right, and fair enterprise; and I think, in view of that fact, that those who engaged in such enterprise should be put in the same position with other pensioners. I regret that I cannot enlighten the committee more fully upon this subject, as I was desirous of hearing further from those who have written to me upon the subject. If I had not already received some letters in reference to this matter I should not have made these desultory remarks.

Mr. VANSANT. In the hope that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would have given some other reason than the indisposition of the Senate to grant the appropriation as set forth in the bill of the House of Representatives, No. 49—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remind the gentleman that it would not be in order for him to make any remarks, unless he moved an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. VANSANT. I move that the word "four," as it last appears, be stricken out.

I should extremely regret if, at this day, such aid should be withheld from this very meritorious class of citizens. The act of 1812 gave to the citizens of the United States, on private armed vessels, letters of marque and reprisals, and shortly afterwards, within a period of three or four months, an act was passed setting apart two per cent. of the net proceeds of the prizes for constituting a pension fund for the disabled men engaged in such service. This action of the Government shows an earnest on their part to render aid to men who might be thus meritoriously engaged. Notwithstanding that fund has become exhausted from mismanagement, or some other cause, Congress, I think, has, upon more than one occasion, made appropriations to be drawn from the Treasury to fill the vacuum thus created. If these men ever had a claim upon the Government they certainly have it now. Crippled as they are by old age, they are certainly not capable of performing any physical service; and it will be perceived, by referring to the bill, that the amount asked for to relieve them is very small—the whole of it, I believe, not exceeding $9,000.

Sir, in a very short period the whole of these poor old men will be stricken from the roll of time, and it strikes me that it is very small economy upon the part of this House to begin with those who are dependent on it for their very subsistence. They are, in the main, men who were engaged in the industrial pursuits of life; men who had before been engaged in sea service, and who had smarted under the wrongs inflicted by Great Britain. I allude to the impressment of American seamen. I trust that this part of the bill will not be stricken out.

Mr. APPLETON. I ask that the concluding portion of the letter of the Commissioner of Pensions may be read. A portion of it merely was read a few minutes since.

It was read by the Clerk, as inserted above.

Mr. APPLETON. I would by no means say that the Government is bound to pay these pensions, by any act other than that since the pension fund has been exhausted you have from time to time made appropriations for the payment of these pensions.

The number of these pensioners now on the list is less than thirty—I think twenty-three—and, of course, they are all very much advanced in life, and cannot survive much longer; and, of course, other applicants cannot be put upon the list without further action on the part of Congress. I hope, therefore, that this clause of the bill will not be stricken out, but that the sum reported by the Committee of Ways and Means will be allowed to stand.

Mr. VANSANT. I will withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the withdrawal of the amendment?

No objection having been made, the amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. UPHAM. Will it be in order at this time to address some remarks to the committee, without making a motion to base them on?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be necessary for the gentleman to submit an amendment.

Mr. UPHAM. I propose, then, to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, by inserting "five" in the place of "four."

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. DAVIS] regretted that he was not perfectly booked up on this subject. I am sorry to have to express the same regret; but it is not a new subject to me. I have endeavored to make myself acquainted with it.

It seems, sir, that two per cent. was deducted from the gross receipts from the sales of all prizes taken by privateers in the war of 1812, and that that amount was solemnly pledged to invalid privateer pensioners. The sum thus raised, which I believe was more than $200,000, was exhausted in 1814. I am under an impression—and on that point I shall be glad to be corrected by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, if I am wrong—I am under an impression that in keeping the account with these invalid pensioners interest was not allowed, and was not taken into the account.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not able to state anything in addition to what is contained in the letter which has been read.

Mr. UPHAM. I think that the Government of the country has been in the enjoyment of the interest on this fund, and that it has not been taken into the account.

It is true that but a very small number of these venerable and gallant men remain—less than thirty—and I ask this committee whether, at this moment, in the hour of the country's greatness, and with an overflowing Treasury, you are prepared to inflict the stigma upon the honor of this nation which you will do if you withhold this pittance from these heroic, and now aged, men?

Sir, I had the honor to present to this House a petition from those of them still surviving in my own immediate neighborhood. Some four or five of the whole number are citizens of the place in which I reside. The first name signed upon that paper is the name of a man who, in command of a privateer in the war of 1812, fought one of the most desperate—perhaps, I might say, the most gallant battles of the war. I allude to Captain Benjamin Upton. He bore in his aged countenance the scar of the wound that he received on that occasion. That patriot has gone to his grave since his name was attached to the petition which I brought here with me.

Sir, the details of this subject are such that I am sure, if the committee could have them brought to their minds and hearts, the patriotism and gratitude which glow in their breasts would compel them to override all other considerations, and to say that the country will be true until the last of these gallant men has sunk into his grave—true to the pledge which it so publicly and solemnly gave in the hour of its danger and its need.

Mr. MILLSON. Yesterday the House agreed, almost without a question, to the amendment made by the Senate striking out the appropriation for the payment of privateer pensions. Now, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in order to conform to what seemed to be the judgment of the Senate—what certainly was the sentiment of this House—proposes to strike from the deficiency bill a similar appropriation. I confess that I am in favor of the motion made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and opposed to the amendment just now offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. UPHAM.]

I think that this payment of privateer pensions is a matter of questionable propriety, under the most favorable circumstances. How did the country originally become bound for the payment of these pensions at all? Why, sir, when these men, who undertook to equip vessels at their own costs, obtained permission from the Government of the United States to appropriate to their own use all prizes they might capture from the enemy, there was a fund reserved—a very small fund, of two per cent., for the purpose of constituting a pension fund for the payment of invalids. That fund has now been exhausted. The Government never agreed to pay more than what might remain of that fund. For several years past nothing has been paid; and now the proposition is made to pay these invalid privateersmen from the public Treasury. What claim have they upon the Treasury of the United States? These vessels were equipped at their own cost; they were engaged in their own private service, and not in the service of the country. They engaged in privateering as a matter of emolument; I do not say as a mere matter of emolument, for I do not deny that sentiments of patriotism may have had something to do with the determination of some of them.

I do mean to say, however, that they obtained from the Government of the United States the privilege of making captures from the enemy for their own personal profit. No private citizen has a right to take an enemy's property and appropriate it to his own use. This principle has been frequently the subject of adjudication by the Supreme Court of the United States. All writers on international law lay down the same doctrine. Vattel and other publicists all agree that a man cannot acquire a title to such property unless he acts by the authority of his sovereign; and in the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Brown vs. the United States, and in the case of the Dos Hermanos, Judge Marshall, giving the opinion of the court, expressly decided that no private citizen can acquire a title to property captured by him from the enemy, except by the grant of his country. It is for that reason that privateers apply to the Government of the United States for authority to make these captures. When they obtain such authority, they make them for their own emolument, and the proceeds go to their own use.

But it must be recollected that very many distinguished public men have for a long time doubted the propriety of issuing commissions to these private armed vessels at all.

Dr. Franklin was opposed to the whole system, and succeeded in negotiating treaties with some of the European powers, by which it was stipulated that no privateers should be authorized by either nation, in case of the breaking out of war. It seems somewhat inconsistent, that while you will not permit soldiers in war upon land to appropriate to themselves the personal property belonging to an enemy, you will commission private armed vessels for the purpose of depredating upon private property found at sea.

But apart from the question as to the abstract propriety of the system of privateering, what obligation can there be resting upon the Government of the United States to pay pensions to invalid privateersmen, who are not directly employed in the public service of the United States, who engage in these pursuits for their own emolument, and who are allowed by your laws to apply to their own use the captures made from the enemy. It seems to me that the Senate was right, and that the House was right yesterday, in agreeing so promptly to the amendment of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. UPHAM. If there is no objection, I withdraw the amendment.

No objection being made, the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. SKELTON. I propose to amend the amendment by adding $100 to the amount.

I entertain the opinion, Mr. Chairman, that if there is any class of soldiers who have served the United States deserving pensions, it is the class of privateers who volunteer their services from the ranks of private life. What proposition have we here to-day? We find that in the past we have educated men as regular officers in the Navy and Army of the United States. We take them in their poverty and their boyhood and maintain and make soldiers of them. We pay them in times of peace for holding themselves in readiness—and pay them large salaries, too. We pay them during their life time, and in the course of time pension their widows.

Now, sir, I ask this committee if the men who pursue their daily avocations in life, maintaining themselves with industry and integrity in time of peace, and who, in time of war, enter into the contest in defense of their country, with little prospect of gain, and in a cause where they endanger their lives, are they less meritorious than the men we educate and pay in time of peace for fighting our battles? Why, sir, what is the history of the last war, and what is the history of the bravery and patriotism of those privateers? Why, the privateer service of the United States in the war of 1812 accomplished more, and inflicted more injury upon the enemy than the whole American navy. And allow me to say, that in future wars, when we want a naval defense for our country, we shall have to depend mainly upon those composing our merchant marine.

That is the arm of American defense that we have to depend upon. Never will the American nation consent to maintain such a Navy as England, France, and other Powers maintain. We must depend in time of war upon the mercantile marine. Shall we say here to-day that we consider the men who go forth in the hour of battle for the defense of the stars and stripes, from their daily avocations as merchantmen, and who, in time of peace, carry our commodities into every ocean—that they are pirates pursuing a vocation which is so reprehensible? Why, sir, the Government authorized their employment, accepted their services, and received the benefit accruing therefrom. The American flag was maintained with greater valor and with more efficiency by the privateer service than by the whole naval service of the United States. While we are in time of peace sustaining a Navy—and our old worn-out officers, some of them disqualified from performing their duties—at an expense of nearly $10,000,000 a year, we have a very efficient maritime force not only maintaining itself, and adding to the wealth and prosperity of the country, but ready in time of war to enter into combat with the proudest nation upon the face of the globe. I hope for the sake of humanity that the section now under consideration will not be stricken out.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am opposed to the amendment, and I desire to give a vote upon the original proposition.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to make but a very few remarks in reference to this matter. The Committee of Ways and Means were rather balanced in their opinion upon this subject, but upon the whole were inclined to make this appropriation. They recommended placing this appropriation in the deficiency bill; and for the purpose of keeping themselves consistent, they also placed an appropriation for the coming fiscal year in the general pension appropriation bill. That bill was passed by the House, went to the Senate, but that body, in a spirit of economy which seems suddenly to have come over them, struck the appropriation in question out of the bill. It came back here, and this House unanimously concurred with the action of the Senate in that particular. Where do we stand now? We stand directly here: Within the last five years we have enacted by law a provision which declares in effect that we are opposed to this appropriation. The question comes back, shall we give it in this deficiency bill for all the time until the 1st of July next? To be consistent, we should refuse it here. I would rather, and the Committee of Ways and Means would rather have given it; but the House has acted upon the subject, and refused to make this appropriation, commencing with the 1st of July next.

I have made this explanation, so that we may understand precisely where we are. The bill proposes what may be thought to be asking too much; and to remain consistent, we should strike this appropriation out, and make our legislation correspond with that of yesterday. But it is a matter of indifference to me whether it is retained or stricken out.

Mr. VANSANT. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, if this provision of the bill be retained, it is not competent under the rules of the House to reconsider the provision stricken out by the House, and so make our action consistent?

The CHAIRMAN. No further discussion is in order.

Mr. SKELTON, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Rhode Island. Is it in order to speak upon the amendment now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to ask another question. Is it in order to move to insert here the provision heretofore stricken out by the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can move to increase the appropriation by any sum he pleases.

Mr. DAVIS. What I wanted to know was whether, in order to make the action of the House consistent, it would be in order to move to insert in this bill the provision which was stricken out of another bill by the House yesterday?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be in order for the gentleman to move to amend by increasing or diminishing the appropriation to any amount he may propose.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, sir, for the purpose of making a single remark upon the subject, I move to increase the appropriation one dollar.

I will only say that when these pensions have been paid to these people, but a small amount of funds will have been taken out of the National Treasury; and it seems to me that it would be extremely hard to cut them off at this time—much harder than if they had never been paid them at all. When this Government has once adopted a practice, and continued it for a series years, they should not depart from it without very good reasons. Now, these are men, most of them, whose very life depends upon receiving this pension, and, in this point of view, I think it is of great importance that this appropriation should be made.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] has alluded to the morality of the matter. Well, sir, we are not here to decide that question. The courts have settled that. I know that the courts have decided that privateering is not a lawful mode of warfare, and that a law has been passed to that effect; but privateering did exist for a long series of years, and was not objected to by the Government when these persons were engaged in it; and it seems to me that the humanity of the House, that a sense of justice, will impel them to grant these pensions. It will be much harder for these men, if you deprive them of this means of subsistence now, than if you had never given it to them at all. It is not a question of granting it originally—we have passed that point—but it is whether you will discontinue a practice which has been continued for a long series of years.

Mr. HOUSTON. An argument was made by one gentleman, awhile ago, to the effect that it was intended to base this claim upon the ground that a fund still remained, out of which the payment could be made. But it turned out, upon reading the remainder of the letter, that the appropriation was made in the same manner in which it is now proposed to make it for six or seven years after the fund was exhausted. Another gentleman urges the claim upon precisely the opposite grounds, that, inasmuch as the appropriation has been continued for several years beyond the time when the fund was exhausted, it ought, therefore, still to be continued. Now these two arguments will not stand together. It is true the fund was exhausted in 1844, but that the appropriation continued to be made until 1850.

But since that time there have been no appropriations made. On one or two occasions the House passed an appropriation for this purpose, but the Senate rejected it, and the House concurred in the action of the Senate.

I have made this motion upon my own individual responsibility, without consulting the Committee of Ways and Means; and as the facts of the case have been very correctly stated by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] in the few remarks which he has submitted to the committee, I do not wish to consume further time. I am anxious to get along with the bill, and I therefore ask for a vote upon the proposition.

The question was then put on Mr. DAVIS's amendment to the amendment; and it was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. HOUSTON's amendment, and being put, it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ORR. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer the following amendment:

For general incidental expenses in the Indian service in New Mexico, for the present fiscal year, $15,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs asks that this appropriation may be made. The necessity for it is created by the fact that at the last session of Congress the estimates, which were for $20,000, were cut down to $10,000, and this sum is required to be expended between now and the 30th of June.

The Indians in New Mexico are in a very destitute condition—almost starving—and the agents are compelled literally to purchase their peace with the Indians by furnishing them with food, presents, and things of that sort. This appropriation is necessary for that purpose. Of course, if a less sum than $15,000 is required, the whole of this appropriation will not be expended. I hope there will be no objection to the amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CRAIG. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to offer the following amendment:

For President's house and grounds, for fuel for President's house, and for iron fences, $3,800.

For repairs of the Capitol, and improving the grounds around it, $6,500.

For repairs of water-pipes, $200.

To pay two draw-keepers on the Long Bridge up to July 1, 1854, $400.

For trees, tree-boxes, and repairs of pavement, $500.

For lamps and lamp posts on Pennsylvania avenue between 17th street and Georgetown, and between the Capitol and the navy-yard, $1,200.

For completing the pedestal and inclosure of the equestrian statue of Andrew Jackson, $500.

That amendment has been prepared according to the estimates furnished by the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds. The committee have given it a careful examination, and believe it to be correct.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN proposed the following amendment:

For paying William Irvin $625, for service as acting Superintendent of the Seventh Census, for five months from the 30th of May, 1851.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would ask the Chairman whether that is not a private claim, and out of order in this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it is a private claim, and therefore not in order in a general appropriation bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I was informed by some of the members of the committee that this was the proper place to submit the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it is a private claim. If the gentleman withdraws it, the Chair will give it further consideration.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. I move the following amendment:

To complete the construction of the marine hospital at Vicksburg, $50,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. That amendment has been decided to be out of order. I again make the point of order on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decided the amendment to be in order, but the committee overruled that decision. The Chair now decides, in conformity with the vote of the committee, that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. PERKINS. I understood that the committee decided that an amendment somewhat similar to this, appropriating $55,000, was not in order. This amendment is differently worded, and for a different amount, although it may be for somewhat the same purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair presumes that the committee did not act as it did on account of the amount, but on some principle connected with the subject. The amendment was decided to be out of order as not being for a deficiency, but belonging properly to the general appropriation bill, for which the estimate was made, and which is to come up shortly. The Chair is compelled, under the former decision of the committee, to decide the amendment out of order.

Mr. PERKINS. Would it be in order for me, Mr. Chairman, to state the reasons why this is a different proposition from the previous one?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order; but the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I insist on the Chair's proceeding in order.

Mr. PERKINS. It is from a sense of duty that I introduce this amendment; and, as was the case with the Delegate from Oregon, [Mr. LANE,] I am satisfied that the committee do not understand the proposition upon which they are to act. I should like, in a few words, to place the question in the light in which I think it will be regarded by the committee when they come to understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman that debate is not in order. The gentleman is at liberty to state any facts.

Mr. PERKINS. The fact I wish to state is this—

Mr. JONES. I submit that debate is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair has decided.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair; and I desire, as I have the right, to state the ground of that appeal.

Mr. JONES. I raise the question of order, that the appeal is not debatable. Stating facts is debatable; and now all debate is terminated, except on amendments.

Mr. STANTON. I have a right to state my position.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to state the ground of his appeal, but not to go into an argument.

Mr. STANTON. I did not intend to go into an argument. The ground upon which this decision is made is this: that the appropriation asked for by the gentleman's amendment is not for a deficiency. I maintain that it is for a deficiency; and it is so for this reason: Congress has ordered a marine hospital to be built at Vicksburg. They have already appropriated $10,000 for that purpose; and with that amount the work has been commenced. Now, the purpose of this amendment, if I understand it aright, is to enable the proper authorities to continue the progress of the execution of that order. The beginning of the year is the time when preparations are necessarily made.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. With the gentleman's permission I will state in this connection, —and it is a fact which I wish to impress upon the House—that $4,000 was appropriated in the midst of the epidemic, when all business was suspended; and if the appropriation is made at any other time than this, it will come in the sickly season, and will be entirely useless. If made now it will come in advance of the sickly season.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Who knows best whether it is a deficiency, the Secretary, or gentlemen upon this floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana proposes to appropriate some $50,000 for the completion of the marine hospital at Vicksburg. The Chair, in conformity to the decision of the committee, made a few minutes since, decides that the amendment is not in order. The Chair supposes that the ground upon which the committee proceeded in their decision was that the appropriation was not for a deficiency needed during the current year, but was, in fact, regularly estimated for in the usual appropriation bill for the next year. The Chair conforms to the decision of the committee. From that decision of the Chair an appeal is taken, and the question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was put, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Printing, offered the following amendment; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

For the payment of the printing of the returns of the Seventh Census, and paper purchased for said printing, under the provisions of the joint resolution providing for printing and binding of the returns of the Seventh Census, approved March 3, 1853, that is to say—

For the printing of the returns before mentioned, the sum of $15,309 93.

For the paper purchased for said printing, the sum of $27,106 68: Provided, That the sums herein mentioned be paid to the printer who executed the printing, and to the contractor who furnished the paper, respectively, at the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. DISNEY. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish the gentleman would withdraw his motion for a few moments. There are some amendments to be reported from the committees, which can be disposed of in ten minutes, and then we shall stand a chance of getting through the bill to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his motion?

Mr. DISNEY. I do not.

The question was put; and there, were upon a division—ayes 70, noes 40.

So the committee agreed to rise.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 49, being a bill to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th June 1854, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the following clause was stricken out of House bill No. 50, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions.

"For pensions of invalids who were wounded on board of private armed vessels during the last war with Great Britain, $2,500. Privateer pensions in Boston are hereby abolished, and the said pensioners shall be paid as privateer pensioners are paid at other places."

I make this motion in order to make our action consistent with the vote in the Committee of the Whole to-day, by which an appropriation was made for this purpose.

Mr. ORR. Has not the invalid pension bill already gone from the House?

The SPEAKER, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, temporarily occupying the chair.) This bill was passed by the House, sent to the Senate, and they returned it to the House with an amendment striking out the words indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE.] The House yesterday concurred with the Senate in making that amendment. The bill is now in the possession of the House, yet to be enrolled, it having originated here, and the Senate have been notified of the concurrence of the House in that amendment.

Mr. ORR. Therefore it is not in order to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rules prescribe that a motion to reconsider should be made upon the day upon which the vote is taken, or upon the succeeding day. What the effect of the action of the House and the notification of the Senate may have upon it is for the House and not for the Chair to determine. The Chair is of the opinion that a motion to reconsider is not too late. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to reconsider the vote by which the House on yesterday concurred with the Senate in making a certain amendment to the invalid pension bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. WALSH. I rise to a question of order. I understand, by the decision of the Chair, upon repeated occasions here, that no gentleman was entitled to the floor while another was occupying it, unless with his consent. I noticed gentlemen from all parts of the House addressing the Chair—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. ORR. I raise the question of order, that the motion to reconsider could not be entertained, inasmuch as the House had put it beyond its power to reconsider the matter, having advised the Senate of its action on yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has overruled the point of order made by the gentleman from South Carolina, by expressing the opinion that it was in time for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make the motion to reconsider; that it was still in order for any gentleman who voted in the majority to move to reconsider; and that it is for the House, and not for the Chair, to determine the question.

Mr. ORR. I have great respect for the opinion of the Chair, but I think that his decision is wrong in this particular instance, and I therefore appeal from it. It is out of the question for the House to put itself back in the condition which it occupied before the message was sent to the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state, that if the House entertain the motion to reconsider, they can and will notify the Senate that that motion is pending here.

Mr. ORR. Well, sir, I do not think that if the Journals of the House were to be searched you could find a precedent for the House attempting to reconsider a matter which had gone to the other end of the Capitol.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is now in possession of the House, having been returned from the Senate. The Constitution of the United States provides that each House shall make rules for its own government. In pursuance of that provision, this House, in prescribing the rules for its government, has provided that any vote having been taken, a member voting with the majority may, upon the same or the succeeding day, move to reconsider such vote.

Mr. ORR. Is the appeal from the decision of the Chair debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. ORR. Well, sir, if the reasoning of the Speaker be correct, what would be the effect of it supposing this bill had yesterday been engrossed, reported by the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and sent to the President for his signature?

Mr. EWING. I rise to a question of order. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the appeal taken by the gentleman from South Carolina from the decision of the Chair; and that appeal the Chair thinks is debatable.

Mr. EWING. I was under the impression that the appeal was not debatable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair knows of no rule showing why it is not. The gentleman from South Carolina will proceed.

Mr. ORR. I have very little to say in addition. Suppose, after the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate yesterday, the bill had been enrolled, and the Committee on Enrolled Bills had presented it to the President, and it had received his signature, could the House have taken action upon it then? I submit that there is no precedent at all in the legislative history of this House where a motion has been entertained to reconsider a proposition which has passed beyond the control of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ORR. The gentleman from Virginia will excuse me, but I cannot yield to him. I dislike to be interrupted.

Mr. LETCHER. I merely wanted to make a privileged motion, if the gentleman would allow me.

Mr. ORR. If the gentleman desires the floor to make the privileged motion, which I suppose he does, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. LETCHER. The motion I proposed to make was that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ORR. I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. FLORENCE. Do I understand that the floor can be taken from me (for I still hold it) without my consent, for a motion to adjourn? I submit a point of order.

Mr. GREEN. I desire to present a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia will be pleased to withdraw his motion, and allow the report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills to be made.

Mr. LETCHER. I think the Committee on Enrolled Bills had better make their report to-morrow. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands it is important that the bills the committee desire to present should receive the signature of the Speaker to-day.

The question was put upon the motion to adjourn, and, amid confusion, the Chair decided it in the negative.

Mr. ORR. I am now entitled to the floor, am I not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GREEN] is upon the floor, for the purpose of making a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, which he has the right to make at any time.

Mr. ORR. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio, but I insist that the Chair shall divide the House upon the motion to adjourn. There were loud and repeated calls for a division before the result of the vote was announced by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late now to demand a division.

Mr. GREEN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported back, as correctly engrossed, the following joint resolution and bill; which thereupon severally received the signature of the Speaker:

"A resolution authorizing an increase of the force in the office of the Superintendent of Public Printing; and

"An act to regulate the disbursement of the contingent fund of the Senate, and for other purposes."

Mr. ORR. With a view of looking into precedents, and giving my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] an opportunity of having his motion considered, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House adjourned until to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 8, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting statements of the contingent expenses of the offices and bureaus of his Department for the year ending 30th June, 1853; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Also, a communication from the Secretary of War transmitting abstracts of the returns of the militia of the several States; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed:

THE MISSOURI COMPROMISE.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I have received, and desire to present to the Senate, a memorial of the representatives of the religious society of the Friends in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and adjacent thereto. They express themselves in strong terms against the institution of domestic slavery, and especially against what they call a proposed repeal of the Missouri compromise line.

This memorial has been brought to me by a committee of four gentlemen, who represent the society named. They are not political Abolitionists, but they express sentiments which have been long entertained by the society to which they belong. Although I may differ from them in regard to the constitutional power of Congress upon the subject, I nevertheless respect their motives. I will not ask for the reading of the memorial; but as the Nebraska bill is now under consideration, I will move that it lie upon the table. I will not ask it for another reason. One of the committee has informed me that they intend to present a copy to each member of the Senate.

The memorial was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRODHEAD also presented five petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which were ordered to lie on the table.

ADMISSION OF LADIES.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I rise this morning for the purpose of moving that ladies be admitted to occupy the seats immediately in the rear of the bar of the Senate. I make this motion on account of the inclemency of the day, the fullness of the galleries, and the number of ladies in attendance who have not been admitted. This is the first time that I have ever made such a motion in the Senate. I have generally opposed it; but the peculiar circumstances of this occasion seem to appeal to the members of the Senate to allow the admission of ladies who have not been admitted. There are several hundred of them at the door. [Laughter.]

Several SENATORS. Oh, no!

Mr. HOUSTON. At any rate there is a considerable number of them. Suppose there are only a hundred, or even fifty here, it would be exceedingly gratifying to those fifty to admit them. I do trust that, on this occasion, the Senators will extend that liberality, that courtesy—to say nothing of gallantry—which I suggest.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin. I second the motion of my friend from Texas with great pleasure. On this occasion, for the reasons which he has suggested, I think the ladies should be permitted to enter the Senate Chamber, and take the seats in the rear of us. We are to hear a gentleman to-day who is renowned for great eloquence, and I desire very much on this occasion to see the ladies gratified by giving them an opportunity of hearing him.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. President, if it were not exceedingly ungracious and ungallant, I should be compelled to object to the motion of the Senator from Texas. I unfortunately sit here on the frontier, [the honorable gentleman's seat is on the outer row,] and I am sorry to say that the admission of ladies disturbs the quiet of our location here very much, oftentimes rendering it impossible to hear what is said on the other side of the Chamber; and I am very much more disposed to turn my ear to what is going on behind me than to listen to what is said on the other side of the Chamber. But as this motion has been made by my very gallant friend from Texas, I do not wish to be put in the position of opposing it; but I hope the ladies will understand that if they shall come in, I hope they will be as quiet as possible. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIT. I enter an objection in the most solemn form against this proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor in the chair.) As the Chair understands the rules of the Senate, it requires unanimous consent to adopt this motion. It is equivalent to a motion to suspend the rules, and that requires one day's notice, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. PETTIT. I saw the other day a judge of the Supreme Court, seventy years of age, standing here unable to get a seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the motion cannot be entertained.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented twelve memorials signed by citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, asking Congress to provide suitable accommodations for a post office, and for the use of the United States courts of the eastern district of Pennsylvania; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PRATT presented a petition numerously signed by the citizens and property-holders of the District of Columbia, against the construction of a railroad along Pennsylvania avenue, in Washington city; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have received a memorial signed by citizens of Maine, who ask that the existing laws may be so modified that a maximum of $15 per ton duty only shall be chargeable upon the iron imported into this country in any shape, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Finance.

I present also, another petition, and signed, I believe, by the same persons, who ask that the duty on charcoal iron may be reduced to $10 a ton. I ask that this petition also may be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The memorials were so referred.

Mr. SHIELDS presented a petition of the Mississippi and Wabash Railroad Company, praying a grant of land to aid in the construction of their railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the memorial of William A. Duer, administrator of William Duer, deceased, praying compensation for supplies furnished to the Government of the United States, under contract with the Treasury and War Departments; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MALLORY presented the petition of G. J. Pendergrast, Commander United States Navy, praying reimbursement of his expenditures for medical services in consequence of the failure of the Government to provide a naval surgeon; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRIGHT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Washington and Georgetown, praying an appropriation for the purchase of a site and the erection of a custom-house for the District of Columbia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill to incorporate the National Hotel Company of Washington City, reported it back without amendment.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. CLAY gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill granting to the State of Alabama alternate sections of land in aid of the construction of certain railroads in that State.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHIELDS asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce the following bills; which were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

Bill to authorize the sale of Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, and for other purposes.

Bill granting a portion of the public lands to the State of Illinois, to aid in the construction of the Mississippi and Wabash railroad.

Bill granting a portion of the public lands to aid in the construction of the Warsaw and Rockford railroad.

PHILADELPHIA COURTS AND POST OFFICE.

Mr. BRODHEAD asked and obtained unanimous consent to introduce a bill to provide a place for a post office in the city of Philadelphia, and for the courts of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. It proposes to enact that the Postmaster General be authorized and empowered to provide necessary and permanent accommodations for a post office for the city of Philadelphia, and for the courts of the United States, and the officers connected with them, in the eastern district of Pennsylvania, by leasing and fitting up the same, for a term not less than ten years, or by purchase. It provides, however, that no purchase shall take place, except within the limits of an appropriation to be made by Congress.

The bill was read a first and second time, and was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

RAILROADS IN MICHIGAN.

On the motion of Mr. STUART, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Oakland and Ottawa railroad from Pontiac to Lake Michigan, and branches from Corunna and Grand Rapids to the Straits of Mackinaw, and a continuous branch from thence to the Montreal river, in said State.

Mr. DAWSON. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Michigan that, when the bill was under consideration yesterday, the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] whom I do not now see here, intimated his desire to address the Senate upon the subject. I suppose he did not expect the bill to be called up in the morning hour, and therefore is not here prepared to discuss it. I suggest, therefore, that it should go over until to-morrow.

Mr. STUART. I would suggest to the Senator from Georgia, that the Senator from Delaware simply submitted a motion to postpone the consideration of the bill until to-morrow, and that motion being pending, my colleague moved to adjourn.

Mr. DAWSON. I ask that the bill should be postponed until to-morrow. We should accommodate the Senator from Delaware by giving him the opportunity of expressing his views upon it.

Mr. STUART. I should be very glad, Mr. President, to accommodate any gentleman who desires to discuss the bill. It will be recollected, however, that the Senate discussed several bills other than this yesterday, and I had hoped that, this morning, whatever discussion was to be had, might be had at once, so that the bill might pass. For myself, I am not disposed to consume the time of the Senate, nor to prevent any other Senator from expressing any views which he desires to present; but I am very solicitous that the bill should be considered now.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is very obvious that we cannot dispose of this bill to-day. If we take it up, it will lead to debate, and will consume the morning hour, and extend beyond the morning hour. We know that at one o'clock the special order of the day, the Nebraska bill, comes up. I therefore propose to the Senator from Michigan to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. STUART. I certainly would consent to the suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee, but we have passed other bills at this session; and one yesterday morning, precisely like it, we passed through in ten minutes. We have already passed two for the State of Wisconsin. We passed one yesterday morning for the Territory of Minnesota; and it will be recollected here we discussed by the hour general principles entirely disconnected with this bill. The road proposed to be benefited by the bill runs through an unbroken wilderness, so that nine tenths of the arguments submitted to the Senate yesterday had no application to it. Inasmuch as the general principles governing the bills have been so thoroughly discussed in the Senate for the last three years, it does seem to me that we should not become very much enlightened by any further discussion. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will allow us to progress with the bill, and let us see what will be done with it. I assure the honorable Senator, however, that when the time arrives for entering upon the consideration of the special order, I shall not interpose any objection to taking it up. I have no disposition to interfere with that measure at all.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not wish to make any remarks upon this bill; but I do wish to hear the principles relating to all these railroad bills discussed; and I now ask, as an act of justice to my colleague, [Mr. BAYARD,] who is not now in his seat—

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. Yes, he is.

Mr. CLAYTON. He has just come in. If he desires to go on, I will not press the request to postpone the bill.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Delaware is now in his seat, and can discuss the bill if he desires.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall not occupy much of the time of the Senate now, but I shall take occasion hereafter to express my opinions fully in reference to the unconstitutionality, in my view, of these appropriations, and endeavor to show that there is no great distinction between the appropriation of land according to the provisions of these bills and the appropriation of any other property belonging to the United States, and in the hands of the Government for their benefit. I think the distinction cannot obtain. I can understand perfectly that, when, as in the first instance, according to the doctrines of Mr. Calhoun, the Government, as a great land-holder, having in its possession and holding the title to immense quantities of unsettled land, which under the laws of the country are salable at specific prices, or are subject to entry at specific prices, desires to encourage the sale of the lands, it might, without making any donation at all or grant, either to the States or individuals, dispose of one section of land for the purpose of making a road when it reserves the alternate sections for the purposes of the Government; but the moment you go beyond the point at which you reserve the alternate sections to the Government, that moment you make it a donation for the general purposes of internal improvements in the particular States, or to the particular individuals to whom the donation is made.

The distinction seems to me so palpable that I will not now intrude longer on the time of the Senate in reference to it; but I shall take occasion at a future day to express more at length my views in reference to measures of this kind.

It seems further to me, making the suggestion merely now, that you have got to something more than the mere temporary expedients of the hour. It may be perfectly true, as alleged by the honorable senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] that experience has proved that you have made more rapid sales of the land on some of those roads which have been constructed, or are about to be constructed, under your grants and donations.

That may be true, but the ultimate effect of such a system on the political morals of the country, in my judgment, outweighs any temporary advantage, which merely tends to the present benefit of the country and the agricultural population. That effect on the political morals of the country is far more injurious than is beneficial any temporary good derived from these grants.

These are my general views on the subject. I shall take occasion hereafter more fully to express them to the Senate, when some other bill comes before it. For the present, however, I shall not say anything further upon this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOOT.) The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and is open to amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. There is an amendment which I think should be made to the bill. As it stands, it leaves a doubt, in my mind, as to the construction which may be given to one of its sections. The grant is to the State of Michigan, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of certain roads, of "every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers, for six sections in width on each side of said roads and branch road; but in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the lines or route of said road are definitely fixed by the authority aforesaid, sold any section or any part thereof granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption has attached to the same, then it shall be lawful for any agent or agents, to be appointed by the Governor of said State, to select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from the lands of the United States nearest to the tier of sections above specified, so much land in alternate sections or parts of sections, as shall be equal to such lands as the United States have sold or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of preemption has attached."

Does that mean equal in quantity, or in value? I can easily see that the construction might be given to it, that, inasmuch as the sections immediately along the road sold by the United States, exceeded in value the same quantity in a more remote distance from the road, the claim might be made that you should double the number of sections in order to equal the quantity that the State should have. It is capable of that interpretation. I do not say that that interpretation is designed. But, at all events, there can be no harm in stating specifically what we do mean by inserting after the word "equal" the words "in quantity." I move that amendment.

Mr. STUART. I will accept the amendment. I think that is the construction which is now put upon the section. Let the amendment be made accordingly.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. DODGE. I will now ask that the whole bill may be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, but was interrupted by—

Mr. WALKER. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Iowa, that it is unnecessary to occupy the time of the Senate with the reading of the bill. It will take some time to read it. We all understand its provisions. It does not differ from the other bills which have passed.

Mr. DODGE. I withdraw the request to read the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time.

On the question of its passage, Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 32, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Bell, Benjamin, Bright, Brown, Cass, Clay, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Geyer, Houston, James, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Pettit, Rusk, Sebastian, Shields, Slidell, Smith, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of New Jersey, Walker, Weller, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Butler, Clayton, Dawson, Dixon, Hamlin, Hunter, Mason, Norris, Pratt, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Wade, and Williams—14.

So the bill passed.

Mr. STUART. The amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands renders it necessary to change the title of the bill. I therefore move to amend the title, so as to make it read as follows:

"A bill making a grant of land to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Oakland and Ottawa railroad, and a railroad from the Grand Rapids to the Straits of Mackinaw, and a railroad from Pontiac, via Pere Marquette river, Manitowoc and Ontonagon river, to Kewana Point, with a branch to the vicinity of Carp river, upon Lake Superior."

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. BROWN. I now ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill making a grant of land to the States of Louisiana and Mississippi to aid in the construction of certain railroads in those States. I would not ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up this bill at this time, if it were possible that it would give rise to any debate. It contains a grant for three roads. During the last session of Congress three bills passed this body covering the three several grants which have now been combined in one bill. In its principle it is the same as those which have heretofore passed. It is precisely the same as the bill which we have just passed, with the single exception of the change of names. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take it up and act upon it at this time.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will remind the honorable Senator from Mississippi that it was the understanding yesterday that all these railroad bills should be taken up in their order upon the Calendar; and on that account I withdrew my request for the consideration of a bill making a grant for a road in my State, to enable the Senator from Michigan to have his bill taken up.

Mr. BROWN. I certainly do not design to violate any understanding of the Senator; and if that be the understanding, I give way.

Mr. SLIDELL. I now move that the bill granting to the State of Louisiana the right of way and a donation of public lands for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Algiers, on the Mississippi river, to the Sabine river in said State, be taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. No amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed; and the title was amended so as to read: "A bill making a grant of lands to the State of Louisiana, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State."

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of the claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st of July, 1801. Senators will recollect that this bill, as the special order, was assigned for Monday of this week, but for reasons with which every one is acquainted, it was not taken up. I now ask that it may be considered during the morning hour. I do not know a single Senator who desires to speak on it; but if there should be any, and the morning hour should expire before the bill can be disposed of, it may be postponed, and its consideration resumed during the morning hour to-morrow, from day to day, until it shall have been passed. I do not think, however, that there will be any debate. I know of no one desirous to discuss it, and therefore I move that it be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Mr. President—

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to say that the bill is verbatim the same as the bill which passed this body at the last Congress.

Mr. DODGE. That was exactly the question which I wished to ask. I want to hear the bill read. If I am not mistaken, from an examination of some copies of the bill which I have seen, there is an important section omitted in this bill, which may materially affect the interests of the Government. I do not question the veracity of the Senator, who has thoroughly examined the whole subject; but I have perused several of the bills, and I understand that a section, very important to the Government, is withdrawn from this bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I only desire to say that the bill which I introduced to the Senate, and which has been reported from the select committee, was taken from the files of the Senate. It was the identical bill of the last year. If there is an omission, it is one which has escaped my observation. If the section has been omitted, let it be inserted.

Mr. HUNTER. Let the bill be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I find, by an examination of the bill, that I was right in this matter, and I therefore offer the following amendment as an additional section:

SEC. 12. And he it further enacted, That an attorney to the said board shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to resist all unjust claims, and to protect the interest of the United States, and of the fund that may be appropriated to carry this act into execution; and to this end he shall have power to examine witnesses, and to cause testimony to be taken for the United States, and testimony before the commission for the purpose of examining it, and the right to be heard in all cases. He shall be sworn to the faithful performance of his duty as attorney, and shall be entitled to the same compensation as one of the commissioners.

Mr. HAMLIN. The bill which I introduced into the Senate, was, as I supposed, the bill which we passed at the last Congress. I hope the question will be taken on the amendment; that it will be adopted; and then, that the bill may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CLAYTON. I wish to say that I have no objection to the amendment proposed, but I recollect very well that when President Taylor recommended to Congress the appointment of an attorney, such as was proposed by this amendment, to attend a board of commissioners to ascertain claims arising under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, a resolution was adopted to that effect, but no attorney was appointed. I thought that it was proper. I therefore do not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I now move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow, and be made the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

On motion by Mr. BRIGHT, it was ordered that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to establish a court for the investigation of claims against the United States; and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS TERRITORIES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a Territorial government in Nebraska.

Mr. EVERETT, to whom the floor was assigned, proceeded to address the Senate. He occupied its undivided attention for an hour and a half. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. E. having concluded,

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I propose, with the indulgence of the Senate, to submit some remarks on this subject; but I think it is now too late for me to proceed far with those remarks to-day, if I should now commence. I therefore hope that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories will consent to allow me the indulgence of an adjournment.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until tomorrow.

Mr. SMITH. That will suit me.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. DOUGLAS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent in the consideration thereof, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 8, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting a statement of the expenditures of the appropriations for contingencies of the various offices and bureaus of that Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1853; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

Also, a communication from the War Department, transmitting an abstract of the returns of the militia of all the States and Territories, with their arms, accouterments, and munitions, taken from the latest returns received by the Department; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. On yesterday the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] moved to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to a certain amendment of the Senate to House bill (No. 50) "making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1853." The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] raised the question of order, that the motion could not be entertained, inasmuch as he contended that the bill had passed from the possession of the House. The Chair overruled the point of order, and from that decision the gentleman from South Carolina appealed. That appeal is the first business in order this morning, and the question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not see the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] in his seat, and I would rather that this question should go over until he is present. I therefore move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I hope we shall be able to get through with the deficiency bill to-day.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama is in order.

REMONSTRANCE AGAINST NEBRASKA BILL.

Mr. CUTTING. Will the House allow me to present a remonstrance, signed by the officers of a meeting, citizens of New York city, expressing the sense of a public meeting held in that city, at the Tabernacle, in opposition to the Nebraska bill? They have selected me as their organ, and as it is very well known that my political sentiments differ from those of the persons who attended that meeting, the non-presentation of their remonstrance by me in open House might be attributed to motives very different from those that really actuate me; and, therefore, with the consent of the House, I will present the remonstrance, and let it take that direction which the Chair supposes to be proper.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the remonstrance will be received.

Mr. MACDONALD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is aware that he can introduce the remonstrance, under the rule, at the Clerk's table.

Mr. CUTTING. I asked the unanimous consent of the House to enable me to present the remonstrance, simply for the purpose of preventing any possible misconstruction that might arise in the minds of those persons who participated in the meeting. I have accomplished that purpose. I have made an effort, and objection having been made, I will present the remonstrance, under the rule, at the Clerk's table.

Mr. RIDDLE. I hope the gentleman from Maine will withdraw his objection. This morning I received a similar remonstrance, as I suppose, (having just entered the House,) to the one which the gentleman from New York desired to present. It is signed by many respectable constituents, and although differing with them entirely in the views which they have expressed, I would prefer, while I concede to them the right of petition, to express at the time I present their views, the views which I entertain myself, and which will, in every probability, control my vote, if I like to give it.

The SPEAKER. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. MACDONALD. No, sir; I decline to withdraw it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope that motion will not prevail. I desire to make a statement in relation to the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HAMILTON. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, the motion to reconsider is the regular business in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will turn to the rule controlling this matter.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR] who took the appeal from the decision of the Chair, is not here, and I insist that it would not be proper to take up that question until he is present.

Mr. FLORENCE. Rather than be considered discourteous to the gentleman from South Carolina, who is absent, I will not interpose any objection to the postponement of this subject for the present.

The SPEAKER. The rules governing this question are as follows:

"It shall be the standing order of the body, throughout the session, for the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union;" and—

"The House may at any time, by the vote of a majority of the members present, suspend the rules in order to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union."

Mr. FLORENCE. I certainly would not be discourteous to any gentleman on this floor; and, therefore, I do not desire to be considered as interposing any objection to the postponement of this matter.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his motion for one moment, to permit me to ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution calling upon the President for copies of certain papers.

Mr. HAMILTON. I insist on the regular order of business.

The question was then taken on Mr. Houston's motion, and it was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SEYMOUR in the chair.)

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The subject in order before the committee for consideration is House bill (No. 49) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1854. No amendment was pending when the committee rose. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HAVEN. I move to insert, after line 125, the following:

For compensation of two additional clerks in the office of the Superintendent of the Public Printing, $1,200.

The amendment simply provides compensation for the two additional clerks ordered by the joint resolution, which was passed a few days ago.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not see why there can be objection to this amendment. It only provides compensation for the very two clerks the House gave the Superintendent of the Public Printing. It is simply in compliance with the law which we passed two days ago, and against which I voted.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire, by the instruction of the Committee of Ways and Means, to offer another amendment, which, I believe, so far as that committee is concerned, finishes the troublesome and vexed question of the public printing; it is as follows:

For the printing of the Executive Departments, including for paper, and the printing of the annual estimates of appropriations for the year 1855, and for printing, paper, and binding twenty thousand copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on Commerce and Navigation for the year 1853, $9,085.

Mr. Chairman, I will explain the items of the amendment. That portion of it which provides for the printing of the Treasury Department becomes necessary, by reason of the transfer of the charge of the printing from that Department to the office of the Superintendent of the Public Printing, by the general printing law of 1852. The remainder of the amendment, in reference to the printing of the work on commerce and navigation, is to supply a deficiency which occurred two years ago, and in consequence of the change having been made at that time. The account of the public printing was thrown then into confusion. I believe that the passage of this amendment will straighten up all these accounts, so far as the committee, at least, know anything about them.

The question was taken, and the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk then proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to submit the following amendment:

After line 141 insert the following:

For rent of house on the northwest corner of F and 17th streets, and warming all the rooms in it, $385.

For the compensation and expenses of the commission of civilians and military men appointed under the provisions of the first section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854," approved 3d March, 1853, to determine matters connected with the management of the national armories, $5,996 61.

Mr. LETCHER took the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the member from Alabama yield the floor to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to make a speech further than to say that, in relation to this first item of $385, I have a very full explanation from the Secretary of War, in which he says that the necessity for it arises in consequence of the high price of fuel, and the great difficulty of warming the house to which it is proposed to apply it.

The last item is to pay the commissioners who examined the contested question whether work was better done in the national armories, under the control of civil or military men. That committee was in session a considerable length of time. I have that explanation here also. The amendment proposed is in conformity to the estimates recommended by the Secretary of War for the actual time they were in service.

Mr. LETCHER. I know all that. I have no great respect for estimates, and I want some information in respect to this proposition to amend the deficiency bill. I desire to know, Mr. Chairman, what that sum is made up of—what compensation is given to the civilians, and whether it is proposed to give to the officers of the Army, who were engaged in the service, additional pay?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman's question by reading the written estimate.

"Estimate for the compensation and expenses of a commission of civil and military men appointed under the provisions of the Army appropriation act of March 3, 1853, to determine matters connected with the management of the national armories."

"For the compensation of six members, and a secretary for 112, 119, 114, 112, 111, and 112 days respectively, in all 796 days, at $8 per day, $6,368, less the pay of three Army officers for 112, 111, and 112 days respectively, $1,720 05, leaving.....$4,647 95

"Second, to traveling, in all 10,341 miles, at ten cents a mile..... 1,034 10

"Third, printing..... 344 00

$5,996 05

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the state of the case to be this: that the officers of the Army who were engaged in this service are to receive eight dollars per day, deducting their regular pay.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is it.

Mr. LETCHER. Now, sir, if this be the state of the case, I am opposed to the amendment. These officers go into the Army, and receive compensation for their services. That compensation is fixed by law; and I do not think that it is proper for this House to undertake, by this indirection, to increase that compensation in the mode that it is here attempted, at the rate of eight dollars per day.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Virginia allows me, I will say a word on this subject. I believe that the position he occupies in relation to the compensation of military men to be a just and proper one if it were universally followed. But it is not universally followed, and therefore the committee thought it proper, in this case, to conform to what had been the constant and unbroken custom of the Department, sanctioned by Congress.

Mr. LETCHER. I understood, Mr. Chairman, that this was the era of retrenchment and reform—particularly in this House. I had expected to see the Committee of Ways and Means set the example on this subject, by reforming old abuses, and curtailing bad customs. But it seems now that this amendment was introduced here because the principle of it is in accordance with old abuses, and for the purpose of perpetuating and sanctioning this principle in all time to come.

Now, sir, if this be the state of the case, the sooner we get out of the practice the better. I want to go back to the old rule which prevailed in the better days of the Republic. Let us confine these gentlemen to their salaries, and pay them what they are entitled to under the existing law, and no more.

[A message was here received from the Senate by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill entitled "An act to aid the Territory of Minnesota to construct a railroad for postal, military, and other purposes."]

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is discussion still in order upon the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is exhausted upon the proposed amendment, and it will be necessary to offer another amendment before further discussion can be in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to increase the appropriation one dollar.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] that this appropriation should be so far reduced as that it should provide only for the payment of the civilians who sat upon this armory commission, and when so amended, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I should have been better satisfied had the amendment embraced an appropriation for the payment of the counsel and the witnesses who appeared before the commissioners, at Springfield, under the impression, derived from the commissioners, that they were to be paid. But, sir, I am in favor of the amendment.

These commissioners have made a report to the President, I understand, in regard to the working of the military system of superintendence at the national armory, at Springfield; they have reported in favor of a change from the military to the civil superintendence, the news of which has gladdened the hearts of every New England mechanic who has heard (and who has not heard?) of the petty tyranny exercised at the national armories by gentlemen in epaulets, whose education, if not inclination, leads them to look upon the mechanic in the workshop as the soldier in his barracks.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a question of order. I am exceedingly anxious to get this bill through as soon as possible to-day, and if we enter into a discussion of the merits of the original proposition the debate will be indefinitely prolonged.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I believe I am in order, and hope the gentleman from Alabama will not interrupt me.

Mr. HOUSTON. I raise the point of order, that it is not competent to enter into a discussion of the merits of the original proposition, and—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend until the Chair decides the question.

Mr. HOUSTON. If we go into that discussion it will last for days. The question I make is this: the proposition is now to pay the commissioners for the performance of certain services. The labor has been done, and that in pursuance of a law of the last Congress; and I say it is not in order, upon that proposition, for gentlemen to discuss the merits of the original proposition upon which they were acting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Connecticut merely to advert to the value of the services rendered.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will endeavor to make my remarks germane to the question, and I trust the gentleman will not again interrupt me. I hope the amendment will pass unanimously; and when Congress has done its duty in the premises, I hope the President will decide this question in accordance with the report of the commission he appointed; and then I trust Congress will expunge from the statute-book this anti-republican law, which places free mechanics, men of character, industry, and worth, under drum-head orders. Congress will have, I suppose, the report of these commissioners before it in due time—a report signed by such distinguished men as Andrew Stevenson, of Virginia, Governor Steele, of New Hampshire, and Chancellor Walworth, of New York—if the half of what I hear is true, there is a system of petty oppression and espionage exercised at the Springfield armory which is befitting more a penitentiary of convicts than a government institution, in which some of the first mechanics and men of genius in the country are employed.

But I am reminded that this is not the time or the occasion to speak of these things. I hope they will present themselves shortly; and when gentlemen come to know the truth of this matter, sure I am that they will not hesitate to restore the superintendency of the armories to that republican system in which all our institutions are conceived, and which a previous Congress has, in this instance, (in my opinion,) clearly departed from.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] and I desire to say to the Chair and committee, that my opposition to the course of remark pursued by that gentleman does not proceed from any disinclination to hear that subject discussed whenever it shall be proper to take it up.

The proper time, in my opinion, to discuss the merits of these two systems, will be when the armory bill comes up, in which the appropriation is contained. Here we only propose to pay gentlemen for examining and making a report; and that report, I take it, will be submitted to both Houses. If gentlemen desire it, they may discuss this subject upon the proposition to print the report, and when an appropriation is proposed to be made for the armories, discussion of the kind now indulged in will be in order, but it is not in order at present. I hope that the committee will rule it out of order, and that they will agree to postpone it until it comes up legitimately. Let us, if possible, get this bill through as soon as possible, and not discuss matters which will come up more appropriately at another time.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I withdraw the amendment I offered.

Mr. LETCHER. I propose to reduce the amount $3,000.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me I will offer an amendment to that clause, that will, perhaps, better accomplish his object, and it is, if he will hear it read, to insert at the end of the proposed amendment the following:

Or so much thereof as may be necessary, provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the payment or allowance of any compensation to military men employed other than their regular pay or emolument, as officers of the Army.

Mr. LETCHER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] will satisfy me. So far as this military and civil superintendency is concerned, my course is known to be as decidedly against military superintendency as that of the gentleman over the way. I was opposed to it in the last Congress, and I am opposed to it now; but at the same time, I do not think it necessarily follows that we should undertake to increase the salaries of officers because we happen to be in favor of civil superintendency over the military.

It strikes me that there is a great disposition manifested here to add to the salaries of public officers. We find the number of public officers almost daily increased here, and that their salaries are increased also, in the way of percentage, in almost every way which the ingenuity of man can suggest. We find here a proposition to add to the regular salaries of these gentlemen while they are engaged in service far lighter than the performance of their regular duties as military officers. It seems to me that there is no reason in it, and there can be no reason for it.

It affords a little recreation if they have to go upon excursions of this sort, and leave their regular duties in the Army to engage in such service for the time being. The fair rule would be, instead of increasing, to decrease the compensation allowed them. I have no objection to paying the other gentlemen concerned in the commission what is reasonable and right. They have been selected from a different walk in life, and they have no regular compensation except what they get for their services as awarded to them in pursuance of law.

In the other case, they are receiving regular pay, and their compensation ought to be confined to their regular pay.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the amendment to the amendment may be read as it will stand if the amendment I have proposed to it be adopted.

The amendment, as proposed to be amended, was read by the Clerk.

Mr. LETCHER. Is the amount proposed in the original amendment changed by the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. JONES. It is not. The amendment, as proposed to the original amendment, offered by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, provides the same amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary; provided that nothing therein contained shall be so construed as to increase the pay of the officers of the Army engaged in the commission.

I agree perfectly with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] in regard to the payment of additional compensation to these Army officers, whose service is permanent; but in reference to the others, whose employment was merely temporary, the case is entirely different.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the amendment as amended.

Mr. FAULKNER. I propose to increase the appropriation $1,000, with a view of the prosecution of the same inquiry at Harper's Ferry which has been made at Springfield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Do I understand the gentleman from Virginia to propose an appropriation with a view of continuing this commission at Harper's Ferry?

Mr. FAULKNER. I propose to increase the appropriation $1,000, that the President may, if he thinks proper, direct the commissioners to proceed with their duties at Harper's Ferry. The original intention of the commission, as I understand it, was that the investigation should take place both at Harper's Ferry and Springfield. I am one of those who believe that the discretion which was vested in the President of the United States by the act of Congress referred to by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] to decide the question whether the national armories should be under a military or civil superintendence should never have been placed in the hands of the Executive. I protested against it at the time, and my opinion has undergone no change since. It is a question of legislative policy, which ought to have been determined by Congress, and made a fixed and permanent rule.

But as Congress did vest that discretion in the President, it was but proper to give him a commission to investigate the subject fully at the two national armories; and to enable him to decide, from the result of that investigation, whether it is proper that the present system should be continued, or the old system be reinstated.

The commissioners appointed, of able and practical men, proceeded to Springfield, and made a thorough investigation there during a period of ninety or a hundred days. Why it is that that investigation was cut short, and they were not permitted, according to the original appointment, to go to Harper's Ferry, for the purpose of continuing the investigation there, the public has not been informed. Certain it is that the people of Harper's Ferry were prepared there to have thrown much light upon this question. The board which sat at Springfield made its report as early as the latter part of November, and, as has been stated, two thirds of them concurred in the propriety of abrogating the present military system, and restoring the system of civil superintendence.

Sir, to this day that question remains undecided by the President of the United States, no doubt from the pressure of his other public engagements. It is a subject of profound regret to us that the matter continues yet undecided, and more especially that it has not been already decided in conformity to the report of that board, in accordance with opinions expressed by this body, in accordance with the spirit of our institutions, and in accordance with the clearly ascertained popular will of this nation.

Now, if there could be any doubt upon a question of this kind, that doubt I am sure could be removed by the prosecution of that investigation at Harper's Ferry. They are there prepared with testimony to show what has been the past and present operation of the two systems, and how they have respectively operated upon the interests of the Government and the persons employed there. I should demand an investigation, unless I believed the materials now before the President, are sufficient to enable him to come to a conclusion such as we expect and hope he may reach.

I repeat, sir, if I did not believe that those materials now before the President, collected by the labor and industry of the commission at Springfield, were sufficient to enable him to come to a satisfactory conclusion on this subject, I should insist upon my amendment; but believing, as I do, that that information now before him is sufficient to enable him to arrive at the conclusion satisfactory to the country, I will withdraw my amendment, having offered it only for the purpose of making the few remarks which I have done.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the amendment?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope there will be no objection to the withdrawal of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to debate that question.

Mr. LETCHER. I intend to oppose the amendment, because I do not consider that there is any occasion for it.

A MEMBER. It has been withdrawn.

Mr. LETCHER. The withdrawal was objected to. The law of last session made provision for an investigation at both armories, and I am just as much surprised as my colleague that the investigation has been confined to Springfield, and that Harper's Ferry has been neglected. We desired to have an investigation there also, but I do not see that this amendment will accomplish that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER.]

Mr. PRATT. What is it?

The CHAIRMAN. It is to add $1,000 to the appropriation reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PRATT. I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is exhausted on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PRATT. I move to increase the appropriation one dollar.

I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, that anybody in this committee should move to increase that appropriation $1,000. For my own part, as an humble individual residing somewhere near Springfield, where that commission sat, to examine its armory, I am perfectly satisfied that the whole thing was a humbug—perfectly so. I would not give one rush for their report, though by no means calling into question the character for veracity of those gentlemen. Most of the time they were perambulating New England. They were in Springfield only for a brief period; and if I am correctly advised—but I may be mistaken—they were bound for Harper's Ferry, when told not to go there, for the reason that the course pursued at Springfield had rendered the commission unpopular. I believe I am correct when I make this statement.

I wish to be distinctly understood. Individually I have no hostility to the commission; on the contrary, I feel that they are honorable men. Attending parties and dinners and drinking champagne, I believe, was their principal business. [Laughter.] I did not see them there, but I know that the course they pursued was anything but popular with the mass of the people residing in that vicinity. I do not believe that they would do one particle of good if they were to go to Harper's Ferry, more than they did at Springfield. I presume, as the commission was created under an act of Congress, that the Government is bound to pay their compensation and expense.

Mr. BANKS. I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut, for the reason that it is not sufficient to effect a material change in the question. I doubt very much whether any good is to be secured by the appointment of commissions to investigate matters of detail like those submitted to the commission which sat at Springfield. The question at the bottom of this subject is one not so much of details as principle. It is a question of discipline. Now it is as necessary that there should be strict discipline among the mechanics in the armory at Springfield, as among the soldiers of the Army in service anywhere else; but the discipline is of a different character. The discipline of the armory is not of that character which prevails in the Army, and therefore it is not, in the nature of things, proper or right, as a matter of principle, that the mechanics employed at the armory should be placed under the superintendence of gentlemen educated in the discipline of the Army. The mechanics ought not to be required to submit to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the question before the committee is as to the appropriation to pay the commission for the expenses already incurred. That is the general question.

Mr. BANKS. I understand that very well; and I am opposed to the payment of this commission for the reason I have stated. I say, sir, that considering it a question of discipline simply, a commission for that purpose could not be satisfactory or serviceable to the country, and that the proper tribunal for its settlement is the House of Representatives, with the other branches of the Government acting in a legislative capacity. A commission ought not to depend so much on the evidence of gentlemen, in reference to the execution of particular kinds of work, as upon the great principle of discipline which is at the bottom of it. Therefore I am opposed to it; and I hope, as has been suggested by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the question may come up hereafter, when it may be debated in its full length and breadth. I desire to say, at this time, that I am as well opposed also to the extension of the commission for that purpose, and to the payment of the commission which sat in the State which I in part have the honor to represent.

I desire, in addition, to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. PRATT,] as to the commission which sat in Springfield. He says the commission was unpopular. Well, sir, in the nature of things, it would be more or less unpopular. There are different interests. In Springfield, as also in the State of Massachusetts, so far as I am informed, there is among mechanics no difference in sentiment upon this question. This system of military superintendence is unpopular, because it is unserviceable to the Government, and unjust to the men employed. The commission must, more or less, perfectly represent both interests; and in so far as its members, in the progress of the examination, should side with one or the other, dissatisfaction would follow.

Besides the inquiry, departing from the simple and single question of principle which should lie at its foundation, and entering upon minute details as to the execution of work, and treatment of workmen, it would degenerate into personality, upon which different persons would take different sides. This was not the fault of the commission, of course, but it shows that, in the nature of the inquiry, it could have no essential elements of popularity, and therefore could not be greatly serviceable to the Government or the people, in determining the delicate questions submitted by Congress.

The question was then put on the amendment to the amendment to reduce the appropriation one dollar, and it was rejected.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I propose the following amendment:

And the President shall cause the commission to continue their examination at the armory at Harper's Ferry.

Mr. HOUSTON. I make a point on that amendment. This is a proposition to amend the deficiency bill, by appropriating compensation for those gentlemen who have made the examination at the armory at Springfield. I object to the amendment because it proposes new legislation, or additional legislation, on the subject. This is bringing up the whole question, instead of the mere question of compensating the commission. It is bringing up the whole question of legislation on which we do not propose to legislate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has some doubts about its being in order. The original bill is to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1854. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] is not a proviso to any appropriation, but is unconnected with all appropriations for a deficiency. It provides that the President shall hereafter cause the commission to continue their examination at the armory at Harper's Ferry.

Mr. STANTON. I will amend the amendment by saying, "provided further" after "and." Then it becomes a proviso to an appropriation. If I understand the matter aright, these commissioners have not been discharged from their duties. They are still in the service of the Government, and the effect of the amendment simply is to provide that their duties shall not be terminated until they have performed them in full. It was a part of their original duty to examine the armory at Harper's Ferry, as well as that at Springfield; and they have but half performed it by examining and reporting in regard to the latter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is of such a nature as not to be admissible.

Mr. HIBBARD. It is clearly out of order.

Mr. STANTON. I shall have to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. It seems to me that while we are providing for the payment of these commissioners for services partially rendered, we certainly can direct the President to carry out the object for which the commission was originally appointed, and continue the examination.

Mr. HOUSTON. As far as we are informed, that commission has discharged its duties, and is not now in existence.

Mr. STANTON. I withdraw the appeal; and to obviate all difficulties, I propose to put in an appropriation of $500 to continue the examination.

I am not opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the payment to these gentlemen for the services already performed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to hear the amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And the President shall cause the said commission to continue their examination at Harper's Ferry, and that $5,000 be appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. HOUSTON. I make the point of order, in accordance with the decision yesterday, that it is not a deficiency, and not an appropriation proper for this bill. The amendment creates a new commission. It is true it states "for continuing that commission;" but the commission has made its report, showing to the House, as far as it can be shown, that its existence has terminated; therefore, to say "for continuing the commission" does not alter the facts. It proposes an appropriation which is not needed for the service during the current year.

Mr. STANTON. I may be mistaken in my view of the subject; but my opinion is, that the commission was instituted for the purpose of examining both armories, and they have made only a partial report. They examined the Springfield armory, and made a report simply upon that branch of their examinations. The commission exists still; and if that is the case, we can provide for their continuing it.

Mr. HIBBARD. I wish to suggest simply, with regard to this point of order, that one thing is very clear, and that is, that the amendment proposes to change the existing law. It proposes to modify the existing law; and it has been held again and again that you cannot change the existing law by a mere proviso to the deficiency bill. The Chair will remember that amendments have been repeatedly ruled out of order for that reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that when an appropriation bill, providing for deficiencies, is under consideration, it is not competent to make an amendment directing the President in regard to such a matter as this, and therefore rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. STANTON. Then I move to amend by increasing the sum $500.

I think it very proper that these gentlemen, who have been called to serve upon the commission, should be fully paid for their services. Therefore it is that I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] But, sir, I also want this investigation to continue, in order that the evils of military supervision of mechanics, artisans, and other civilians, may be fully developed to the country. I look upon the system of infusing the military men of the country into civil places, to the injury of competent mechanics, as a great evil, and shall do all in my power to break up and destroy it. I do not believe that officers of the Army are educated by this Government to manufacture intricate machinery, either for war, or other purposes. Where is your school for teaching them the practical art of manufacturing fire-arms? Their duty is to use them—not to make them. I venture to say, that where there is one officer of the Army who is qualified to superintend the manufacture of fire-arms, you may find, even in this city six men of practical skill and experience equally as competent, and through the country many who are much better qualified for that duty, and whose supervision would be infinitely more acceptable to the worthy workmen in the shops, who loathe, and detest the arbitrary and exacting requirements of military rule to which the freemen of this country are unaccustomed.

I beg to call the attention of this House to the extent to which this evil of supplanting civilians by officers of the Army, is being carried by this Government, and that, too, I regret to say, under a Democratic Administration. Look around, and you will see in all quarters of the Union these gentlemen of the military establishment, educated and sustained at the public expense, withdrawn from the legal and proper duties belonging to their profession, and usurping the places heretofore occupied by worthy civilians—men who have shed lustre by their genius upon the character of the country, and who have been looked upon with pride by the people. We have, sir, in this country, and I rejoice that it is so, architects and builders, mechanics and artisans, who rank well with any of the same classes who are to be found in any part of the world; and I have seen to my mortification and disgust, some of these men, at least one, with a genius in his profession not surpassed by any of his class now living, reduced to the condition of a mere clerk, draughtsman, or servant, if you please, of one of these military engineers, to record his will, give form to his crude suggestions, and spend superior talents to make eclat and fame for his inexperienced but highly favored superior. Your custom-houses, scattered all over the country, cannot be constructed but you must take an officer from the military department to superintend them. You cannot carry out any river and harbor improvement under civil superintendence, but must have a military man to direct it. You cannot build an asylum or hospital but some one of these favored gentlemen must be taken to supervise the mechanics employed in constructing it. Even your Capitol is under military rule. You cannot provide rooms in which to carry on the usual and ordinary legislation of the country without having a military man to superintend and control the thousand mechanics who work upon them. Why, sir, it is not enough that all these works should be placed under military control, but you see devised a stupendous plan of bringing water to this city, at a cost of millions of money, that a military man may erect a monument to his own fame. Now, sir, what is the effect of all this? Not only to increase enormously the expenditures of this Government, as I shall show upon some future occasion, but to do gross injustice to eminent civilians, by shutting them out from employment for which they are better qualified than military men, and to make the laboring mechanics in the employment of Government subject to the degrading and slavish regulations of military rule.

The system is wrong for another reason. There are other duties, in their legitimate and proper line, which these military men ought to be employed in. Their services are needed by the Government in strictly military duties belonging to their profession. Because they are not in the discharge of their duties Congress is called upon to increase their number. If gentlemen will turn to the documents accompanying the President's message, they will see that the Colonel of Engineers demands an increase of his corps, for the reason that there are not enough of this class of officers for the service of the Government. He enumerates the different employments in which they are engaged, and shows that in consequence of their employment, many of them, in works of purely a civil character, an increase of the number is absolutely indispensable.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is this debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is evidently taking a wide range upon subjects connected with the appropriation.

Mr. STANTON. My purpose is to show that the system of placing military men in civil positions is a great evil, which ought instantly to be corrected; and by continuing this commission, information will be developed which will enlighten the public mind as to that evil, and force from Congress a correction of it. I was endeavoring to show, when interrupted, that one effect of the system would be to enlarge the Corps of Engineers, and thus increase the Army, when it is wholly unnecessary. Already are we called upon by the head of the corps to add to its numbers, because there are not enough of the engineers left to superintend the construction of fortifications, light-houses, &c.

Mr. HOUSTON. My point of order is, that the gentleman from Kentucky, by the precise language of the rules, should confine himself to an explanation of his amendment. If we are to go on with this general debate, we will never get through the bill.

Mr. STANTON. I perceive that this is a subject upon which some gentlemen are very sensitive; and to save further trouble, I will drop it now, and take some other occasion to fully expose the whole matter to the country. It shall be fully understood.

Mr. PRATT. I conceive that there is no possible necessity of either of the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] or the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON.] The whole question lies within the limits of a nut-shell—and it is whether these armories shall be under the supervision of the civil or military superintendency. For my part, I have confidence in some of the officers of the Army of the United States. I do not believe that they are wholly incompetent to discharge these responsible duties. They are generally high-minded, intelligent, and honorable men. To be sure, there may be some civilians as competent to take charge of these armories. The gentleman who has charge of the armory in Springfield is one of the most intelligent, magnanimous, and high-minded men that ever held a commission in the Army of the United States.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BISSELL. What is the question now before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. It is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] providing compensation for the persons engaged in the commission appointed by the President in reference to the national armories, as amended by the committee.

Mr. BISSELL. I move to amend by increasing the appropriation $100.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this is not the first nor the second time that my friend from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] has diverged so far from the legitimate line of discussion as to be found out of order by the Chair, in his endeavors to assail the Administration for what he considers a very reprehensible practice, in employing the engineers of the Army in superintending the public works. Now, I should like to know of that gentleman—since the Government finds these officers under its control, under its pay, and who could not be got rid of if it were desired; men who are, in every respect, competent to superintend these works—what would he have it do with them? Would he have the Government employ civilians to attend to these duties, and send your Army engineers out upon furlough upon full pay?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will recollect that the gentleman from Kentucky, upon being called to order for pursuing the same line of discussion which the gentleman from Illinois is now pursuing, resumed his seat. The Chair thinks this discussion out of order.

Mr. BISSELL. I yield to the decision of the Chair. I knew I could not proceed in this course of remark only until I was called to order. I merely wished to express my disapprobation of the gentleman's persevering efforts to find fault upon points which, if explained, as I cannot now be permitted to explain, could furnish no reasonable ground for dissatisfaction.

I will now, with the consent of the committee, withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I object; and desire to say a word in opposition to the amendment. I simply wish to say, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, who has just taken his seat, that it was not my purpose, in the remarks I made, to assail the Administration. I have no occasion to attack them now. But, sir, I think a great wrong, a great outrage, has been committed by one of the Departments of the Government, in appointing officers of the Army to discharge duties which could be better discharged by civilians, and in consequence of which the officers of the Army come here and ask us for an increase of the Army corps, in order to make up for those who have been drawn from the legitimate service of the Army.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call the gentleman to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides the gentleman from Kentucky to be out of order.

Mr. BISSELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if it is not known—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must call the gentleman to order. No further discussion upon the pending amendment is in order.

Mr. BISSELL. Very well, sir. I am not disposed to continue this discussion further.

The question was put, and the amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. DICKINSON. In order that we may act understandingly upon this matter, I ask that the law under which the commission was appointed may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The law referred to by the gentleman is not in the possession of the Chair.

Mr. DICKINSON. Can it not be procured? I desire to hear this law read before I am called to vote upon the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I can turn to the law in a minute, but without that trouble I can state the substance of it in a word. It authorizes the President to appoint a mixed commission, composed of civilians and military men, to examine and report upon the superintendence of the national armories.

Mr. DICKINSON. I called for the reading of the act because, as I suppose, it contemplated the payment of the commission which, under the authority of the President of the United States, was to visit the armories at Springfield and Harper's Ferry. They have been to one of those armories and made an examination. They now present their bills to Congress for payment, and this proposition to instruct them to go to Harper's Ferry, it seems to me, is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled it out of order.

Mr. DICKINSON. I know that. I want to know, from the reading of the act, under what authority that commission was created.

I want, then, merely to say that if the commission, having been appointed under an act of Congress, have proceeded in part to discharge the duties which they were authorized to discharge, it is of no consequence whether they have been prevented from discharging all their duties or not; we are under obligation to pay them for what they have done. If the question is whether they are entitled to eight dollars a day, or to any other sum, that is a proper matter to come before this committee; but, as I understand it, the only question is, whether they shall be paid for what they have done.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts propose an amendment? If not, remarks are not in order at this time.

Mr. DICKINSON. I propose to increase the amount of the appropriation five dollars.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have sent the law up to the Clerk's table, and if the gentleman wishes it, he can have it read now.

Mr. DICKINSON. I ask that it may be read.

The Clerk read the law, as follows:

"For repairs, improvements, and new machinery at Springfield armory, $46,094: Provided, That from and after the 1st day of July next, the act of Congress approved August 23, 1842, be so modified that the President may, if, in his opinion, the public interest demand it, place over any armory a superintendent, who does not belong to the Army; and in order to enable him to decide to his satisfaction, he is hereby authorized to cause the necessary and proper inquiries to be instituted, through the medium of a commission of civilians and military men, with a view of ascertaining which of the two systems is more economical, efficient, and safe for the management of the public armories; that formerly existing, of superintendence by civil officers; or that now existing, of superintendence by officers of the Ordnance Department."

Mr. DICKINSON. I merely wish to say, further, that so far as the commission have proceeded to discharge their duties they ought to be paid. The question now before the House is, what amount they shall receive as compensation, and this question of civil or military superintendence is not legitimately before us.

As I understand it, the law leaves that matter in the hands of the President of the United States. Whenever it comes up legitimately for discussion here, it will devolve upon me, as the representative of the district in which the Springfield armory is located, to take some part in the discussion. I do not wish now to state what my views are upon the question, but if the matter comes up I shall take occasion to address the House upon it.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. It may not perhaps be germane to the subject or clearly in order, but I desire to ask a single question of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I wish to know whether this commission have performed all their duties, or whether they have been released from the performance of a portion of those duties?

Mr. HOUSTON. Judging from the communications before the Committee of Ways and Means, I should come to the conclusion, without the least hesitation, that they have discharged all the duties that the law devolved upon them, under the direction of the President of the United States.

The commission was to report to the President, and he was to appoint such superintendent as he might choose under the direction of Congress. I take it that they are to perform no more duties than they have already performed, unless another law be passed with that view.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I conceive, if the commission has discharged its duties, and there are none others for it to discharge, its members ought to be paid. The only question is, whether the military men of the commission shall be paid in addition to their regular pay in the Army. For my own part, I am not willing to sanction, by my vote, any increase of pay for the discharge of duties to which these officers were detailed by the President of the United States. Nor do I concur with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL.] I speak for myself, and do not attempt to apologize for the course which the gentleman may conceive it to be his duty to pursue, when I declare that I have no hesitation in saying to this committee that I am uncompromisingly opposed to the discharge, by military or naval men, of the mere mechanical duties of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order. Gentlemen have been ruled out of order on several occasions for alluding to that subject in this connection.

Mr. FLORENCE. I presume that I may be indulged with an opportunity to explain my position so far as the gentleman from Illinois referred to the subject. I am an uncompromising friend of the present Administration, and I do not hesitate to make the declaration upon this floor; but I am not one of those who believe that "the king can do no wrong." I am opposed, I may say in reply, and by way of explanation of the position which I occupy upon this floor, to mere military men superintending the civil, or rather the mechanical, departments of this Government. I am, then, opposed, and I cannot help expressing the opposition, to the superintending of the extension of the Capitol by gentlemen belonging to the engineer department of the Government.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call the gentleman to order. If the course of remark in which the gentleman is indulging be out of order I object to his proceeding in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is out of order. The question is upon increasing the compensation to be paid these gentlemen.

Mr. FLORENCE. I clearly comprehend the amendment. I am giving the best possible reasons why their compensation should not be increased. I do not think that military men are in their proper province at Springfield or at Harper's Ferry. I am of opinion that for the discharge of mechanical duties mechanics should be selected. In constituting this commission it was not necessary to select officers of the Army or the officers of the Navy for the performance of the duties intrusted to it. It would have been better constituted of mechanics, who are more acquainted with the mere details of the manufacturing of arms than such officers. The best person to be selected for the discharge of the mechanical duties of any department of the Government is a mechanic; and, believing thus, I am opposed to the proposed increase of compensation.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. GOODRICH. I propose to increase the appropriation $200.

I concur entirely with my colleague on my left, [Mr. DICKINSON,] that the question before the committee is the amount that we are to appropriate for the payment of the services which have been rendered by the members of this commission; and that is the only question. Suppose the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] should show that this system of military superintendence in our national armories is all wrong. Would that show that we ought not to pay for the services which have been already rendered by this commission, under the law of the last Congress, or what the amount ought to be? But I do not propose to discuss this question. I wish to say a single word in reference to a remark of my colleague [Mr. BANKS] over the way. Referring to the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. PRATT,] which was in substance that the course pursued by the commissioners had been such as to render them very unpopular, my colleague says that the people of Massachusetts are all opposed to the system of military superintendence—that there is but one opinion there on this subject. This is substantially what he said, as I understood him. Now, sir, I think this statement is much too broad. So far as I understand the facts, (and I think I understand something about them,) public opinion is considerably divided upon this question, particularly in Springfield and vicinity, where the armory is situated. Many are very strongly in favor of the military system; and many, and the mechanics, I think very generally, are as strongly in favor of the civil system.

This undoubtedly is the fact, which is all I desire to say at this time, further than to remark, lest what I have now said should be misunderstood, that I voted in the last Congress to substitute the civil for the military superintendence, and should do so again.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. GOODRICH. If there be no objection I wish to withdraw it.

No objection being made, the amendment to the amendment was withdrawn.

The question was then put on the amendment proposed by Mr. HOUSTON, and it was adopted.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania, offered the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to apply such sum as in his opinion may be necessary to complete the building for the custom-house, post office, and court-house in the city of Pittsburgh, and to furnish such building in a manner appropriate to its uses, and also to improve the grounds attached to said building; and also to pay to the two commissioners who superintended the construction of said building a compensation at three dollars a day each for the time they were actually employed in superintending the same, and for which the said Secretary shall think them entitled: Provided, That the sum so, as aforesaid, to be expended by the Secretary of the Treasury shall not exceed the sum now remaining unexpended of appropriations heretofore made for the said building.

Mr. RITCHIE. I desire to state to the House the necessity of passing this amendment at the present time. This building has just been completed. The amendment asks for no additional appropriation whatever, but simply gives authority to the Secretary to apply a sum of money for the completion and furnishing the building, not to exceed the unexpended balance heretofore appropriated for the construction of this building. I desire to have this amendment passed now, because the lease of the building at present occupied by the Government will expire on the first of the coming April. We desire to have the new building put in order for us before the arrival of that time. It asks no additional appropriation whatever. It is to be paid out of an unexpended balance of an appropriation heretofore made; which balance was set aside, for this very purpose, by the architects under whose charge the building was erected. No part of the sum was specifically appropriated for that purpose, and on that account the Secretary considered that there was a technical difficulty in ordering it to be applied to the object which we now seek to accomplish. For this cause it was necessary to come before Congress to ask that this balance may be applied in this manner. I trust there will be no objection to this amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, offered the following amendment:

For the expenses of the House of Representatives for horses and carriages, $840.
For newspapers for members, $2,000.
For pages, $1,936.
For binding documents, $77,596 40.
Miscellaneous items, $10,000.
For binding the Congressional Globe and Appendix for the second session of the Thirty-Second Congress, five thousand and eighty-eight volumes, at sixty cents per volume, $3,412 80.
For messenger for Speaker, $312.
For payment for Annals of Congress ordered for the House Library, being one hundred copies each of the following volumes: the first, second, and third volumes of the Tenth Congress, the first, second, and third volumes of the Eleventh Congress, in all six hundred volumes, at five dollars a volume, $3,000.
For printing Index to Private Claims, ordered to be printed by the House of Representatives, by resolution of 22d December, 1851, $20,000.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I wish to propose a question to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] There is a messenger to the Speaker, and according to the original arrangement in regard to that matter he was to be one of the messengers of the House. That did not involve any original expense.

Mr. HOUSTON. The direction made by the House was that the Speaker should have the appointment of one of the messengers of the House, whose compensation should be four dollars a day, instead of two and a half. The estimate was for an entire new messenger, but the committee have cut it down, and reported the difference between four dollars and two and a half.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

For furnishing the marine hospital at Napoleon, Arkansas, the sum of $10,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no estimate for any such appropriation at all in any of the estimates which have come within my knowledge.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I am perfectly willing that the vote should be taken first upon the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] and I withdraw my amendment for the present, in order that a vote may be taken upon his proposition.

The question was then taken upon Mr. HOUSTON's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

For arrearages incurred prior to the 1st of July, 1853, for running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, $50,000.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

For salaries and incidental expenses of the commission appointed under the act of March 3, 1851, for settling the land claims in California, $37,500.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. This is a very important amendment upon which we are called to vote. I think that we ought to have a quorum of the committee present to vote upon it. I appeal to the Chairman to know whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will state to gentlemen of the committee, that this amendment is to carry out the provisions of a law which we passed a few days since.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania demand a count of the House?

Mr. WRIGHT. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. We can ascertain the fact upon a division whether there is a quorum present. The question before the committee is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.]

Mr. ORR. I call for a division upon the amendment, and we can then ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

The question was put; and, upon a division, 61 rose in the affirmative.

Mr. COBB. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WHEELER and VAIL were appointed.

Mr. WALSH. There is certainly no quorum present now; but there may be, when gentlemen have sent out and called in members from the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will only say in explanation of the amendment, that this amount is rendered necessary by the law passed a few days ago, providing for an extension of the existence of the land commission for California.

Mr. WALSH. How many commissioners are there?

Mr. HOUSTON. Four.

The question was put, and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 38.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I rise to a question of order. I ask the Chair whether gentlemen outside the bar of the House, when the question is put, have a right to come in and pass between the tellers?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The rule with reference to members outside the bar applies only to a vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. SAGE. Well, is it in order for a gentleman to vote twice by tellers?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. COBB. A gentleman has a right to change his vote, I suppose?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to offer the following amendment:

For compensation to Francis Dainese, for the discharge of the United States consular duties at Constantinople, from the 16th of May, 1849, to the 30th of December, 1852, in conformity with the act of Congress, approved 11th August, 1848, $3,594 50.

Congress has fixed the compensation for this consularship at $1,000 a year. I have before me a letter from the State Department, which assures us that the person mentioned in this amendment discharged the consular duties for the time named, but has not been paid, because no appropriation has been made for the purpose. The amendment merely proposes to make that appropriation. It is hardly necessary to debate so plain a matter.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I offer the following amendment:

For furnishing the marine hospital at Napoleon, Arkansas, the sum of $1,000.

The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, remarked, when I had the floor a few minutes since, that he saw no estimate for this appropriation. That is true; but it is a very small amount, and I believe that it is absolutely necessary, in order to place the marine hospital at Napoleon in a fit condition for the accommodation of the sick seamen who may be brought there to be cared for.

At the last session of Congress the sum of $4,000 was appropriated for the purpose of completing this hospital. That appropriation was never applied, or ordered to be applied, until the present session of Congress. I am apprised, from sources that I can rely upon, that it is thought by the gentleman who has charge of the building, that, by the strictest economy, the sum of $4,000 appropriated last session will complete it, but that it will not be sufficient to place it in a fit condition for the reception of patients. Now, it is absolutely necessary that the building shall be furnished as well as completed. What is the use of an hospital unless it is furnished? This building ought to be completed and furnished before the sick season commences; and if it was necessary to construct it at all it is equally necessary to furnish it.

It is thought that $1,000 will be sufficient for the purpose. These are the reasons why the appropriation has not been made before.

I understand that the committee have been against all the estimates made by the proper Departments. I know that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has not seen proper to report a bill in pursuance of the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of other officers at the head of various bureaus.

I will conclude by saying that if the appropriation be not made now for furnishing this hospital it cannot be made until the next session, before which time the sickly season will arrive. I therefore ask most respectfully of this committee to grant the appropriation, so that the hospital may be placed in a fit condition to accommodate the sick seamen who may be compelled to enter it.

Mr. LETCHER. I find in the report on the finances this statement in reference to the hospital under consideration:

"Napoleon, Arkansas.—Site purchased September 15, 1837, at a cost of $1,000. There have been expended in the structure $53,250. There yet remains much to be done, before the building will be ready for occupation. This includes the completing of the interior finish, the hanging of the doors, painting the interior and exterior, arranging the bathing rooms, grading, terracing, and draining the grounds. The title deed is on file, as above."

Now, sir, it seems to me that the proposition which has been submitted by the gentleman from Arkansas of $1,000 to finish this establishment—

Mr. GREENWOOD. To furnish the establishment.

Mr. LETCHER. The house must be finished before it is furnished. It seems to me that the sum proposed will not be sufficient to accomplish the purposes which the Secretary of the Treasury reports to this House as necessary yet to be done. Here he prescribes various things necessary to be done to this establishment; not only the furnishing, but the painting, and all these various purposes; and I take it that $1,000 would be hardly sufficient to furnish a house which cost some $60,000 for its construction. It would be altogether insufficient for that purpose; but it shows this: that we ought to have some data, either from the Secretary of the Treasury or somebody else who knows the facts, and advise the appropriations of money here for this as well as for all other purposes.

Now, have we anything from any Department of the Government, or from any informed person connected with this marine hospital at Napoleon, which goes to show that $1,000 is necessary for this purpose; or even, if that sum be appropriated that it will be sufficient to accomplish the purpose designed? Hence it is, in consequence of making appropriations in this way, that we are constantly called upon at each succeeding session for increased amounts. There are deficiencies at almost every session, and they go on year after year. Now, would it not be much better to have some additional definite information on the subject? I suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GREENWOOD] that he had better ascertain, through the Treasury Department, how much money they need to accomplish this purpose specified. It seems to me that we ought to have some definite information before we undertake to vote $1,000, or any other amount.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. I move to increase the appropriation from $1,000 to $6,000. If it be in order, I would move also that the same amount be appropriated for the marine hospital at Natchez, Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can only offer one amendment at a time.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I will say, in reference to the Napoleon amendment, what I designed to say in regard to both. I proposed the appropriation for the Natchez marine hospital at the request of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HARRIS.] He will, no doubt, offer it himself when the opportunity occurs.

It is really very difficult, Mr. Chairman, to meet the views of gentlemen on this subject. Yesterday the appropriation was too large; to-day it is too small. Another objection urged is, that there is no proper estimate before the House as to the necessity for the appropriation. Who is responsible for this neglect? We were told yesterday by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that the Secretary of the Treasury had made no estimate, and that the committee had made none. Then how is the House to have the information which it requires? I, sir, can speak from personal knowledge of the destitution of the Southwest in this particular. I reside upon the banks of the Mississippi, and was there during the raging of the epidemic the past year; and I saw the men whom it is the object of this amendment to provide for, display such heroism in keeping up intercourse from point to point on the river, as is displayed and rewarded on the field of battle. They contracted in New Orleans the seeds of disease, and were put out at the different towns along the banks of the Mississippi—the objects of individual charity. And yet, though their mortality excited general attention, and roused the sympathy of the whole country, the Secretary of the Treasury has not regarded it, it seems, a matter of sufficient importance to be the subject of an estimate, although we have ample items of all the little establishments along the Ohio.

But, sir, there is something very peculiar also in the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means. I desired to call the attention of the committee to this point yesterday, but owing to the system which is pursued by some old members, of holding in terrorem questions of order over new members, I postponed doing so at that time.

Look at the estimates of the Committee of Ways and Means. They do not bring in any appropriation for this hospital. Like the Secretary of the Treasury, they ignore the existence of everything on the Mississippi river, from Cairo to New Orleans, while estimates and appropriations are made to the heart's desire for States which have Representatives on that committee, and we hear no opposition to them. Why is this? On that committee are found a gentleman from Missouri—and Missouri is attended to; there is upon that committee a gentleman from Kentucky—and as the Secretary of the Treasury is also from Kentucky—that State is doubly provided for; there is a gentleman on that committee from Alabama, and another from Tennessee—and how are they provided for, sir? Mr. Chairman, I will explain. The manner, as well as the fact, is worthy of attention—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, (interrupting.) With the permission of the gentleman from Louisiana, I will say that I voted against every one of these appropriations for marine hospitals, whether located in Tennessee, Mississippi, or Louisiana.

Mr. PERKINS. I was not thinking of the gentleman from Tennessee; and if I mentioned him, he must excuse me—it was as a mere copulative, connecting the others. I was thinking of the gentleman from Alabama, and the appropriation for Paducah, which, though nominally in Kentucky, is at the mouth of the Tennessee river, which passes through the district represented by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] and runs along for miles in close proximity to the district represented by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones.]

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] yesterday objected, and, I thought, with great propriety, to the erection of custom-houses along the Ohio and the Mississippi, because all the work is done in New Orleans; and the gentleman from New Hampshire, whose general liberality of views I acknowledge, and for which I am grateful, tells us that these appropriations are not needed on the Ohio, but in the Southwest; and yet, sir, the Committee of Ways and Means, of which both these gentlemen are prominent members, come forward with not a single appropriation, of any character, from Cairo to New Orleans; and when members rise on this floor and propose $50,000 to complete a building, they get up and call it extravagance. If we change the character of our demand, and come forward, not as suppliants, but asking an appropriation—not to erect gorgeous palaces, like such as are seen on the Ohio, but such as is absolutely necessary to prepare a covering for the sick—we are told that it is too little, and will do no good!

Sir, we do not ask this appropriation for ourselves. We assert the claim of humanity and justice. These people, for whose benefit it is designed, are not citizens either of Arkansas, Louisiana, or Mississippi. They come down from Indiana, and from Ohio. They are thrown upon our shores; and we have taken them in and nursed them. We ask you to do what? To make us some return? To take something from the public treasury? To violate any constitutional scruples? Not at all. As early as the year 1802, every mariner and seaman on the Mississippi river paid twenty cents per month ($2 40 per annum) into the public treasury, as a provision against periods of sickness. With the wages of no other class of laborers, except the sailor, does the Federal Government directly interfere. It is not then a charity you have to dispense, but an obligation to discharge. From New Orleans to Cairo, a distance of more than one thousand miles, there is not a single marine hospital completed. The one at Natchez, although in an unfinished state, is the only one which can receive a patient. From Cairo to Pittsburg, a distance of another thousand miles, there are four; at Paducah, Evansville, Louisville, and Pittsburg. I appeal to gentlemen if this is justice, not to the South, but to those unfortunate persons who should be the recipients of this fund? Is it legislation worthy of this House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to inquire of the gentleman if he understood his amendment as only increasing the amount proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. PERKINS. My amendment was to increase that amount from $1,000 to $6,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Louisiana, in the ardor of his investigation of this subject, it seems to me, runs into very extraordinary errors. He attempts to analyze the Committee of Ways and Means, in order to account for this appropriation. Now, sir, the gentleman has not done himself justice in that; and he has not only not done himself justice, but he has not done the Committee of Ways and Means justice; for the estimates upon which the Committee of the Whole have heretofore acted, were all made by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PERKINS, (interrupting.) So far from complaining of this matter as solely the act of the committee, I spoke of it as a mystery which I did not pretend to understand. It seems strange to me, however, that the members of the Committee of Ways and Means should be so much opposed to these appropriations, and yet be the only ones to get them for their districts, and that without even assuming the responsibility of advocating them.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is wandering, and does not extricate himself. I stated distinctly—and this committee will remember what I stated—that I believe these appropriations for marine hospitals and custom-houses are all wrong, and I resisted the appropriations to custom-houses until I found that resistance did no good; and I then yielded to what I believed to be the sense of my colleagues upon the committee.

The same was the case in regard to the marine hospitals. I have none in my district. My State asks for nothing except for the Mobile custom-house, and the Committee of Ways and Means did not recommend that. All these appropriations for marine hospitals were rejected by the Committee of Ways and Means, because they believed—I speak for myself—because I believed the appropriations were extravagant, wasteful, and unnecessary. I am not one of those who can be made to believe that a hundred thousand dollars, or even eighty thousand dollars, are necessary to build marine hospitals at any of the points mentioned in this deficiency bill.

The gentleman speaks of the marine hospital at Paducah as a matter of mine. No, sir, the gentleman is mistaken. If he had put himself to the trouble to examine the subject, he would have found that I have been voting for years against these hospitals in the interior. They are too close to each other; and not only that, but they are upon a scale of extravagance and wastefulness which is in conflict with sound discretion in the care and treatment of the sick seamen.

At Memphis there is a marine hospital, which accommodates all our sick at three dollars and a half per week. At some points it costs us as much as ten dollars a week. At Buffalo we have made an arrangement for our sick seamen at three dollars a week, aside from medical attendance, which is but a small item. The city establishments are the only ones where we get accommodated at a fair price.

We are wasting money on this matter. We are wasting it in decorating cities and points where we propose to establish these hospitals, by making a splendid show in the erection of the buildings. I do not object to hospitals as such. Not at all. I want one wherever it is necessary, and where a private establishment cannot be had.

A word in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, who presented it in a fair and proper manner, without making an attack upon the committee or upon anybody else. The gentleman says the Committee of Ways and Means did not bring in a bill for that hospital. There was no estimate for it, and it was not referred to us, and we are not in the habit of bringing in bills upon subjects which are not referred to us. There was no recommendation for the hospital at Napoleon, in Arkansas.

At the last session of Congress—the phraseology used here is singular, and I believe that it is a mistake—we appropriated for completing and finishing the marine hospital at Napoleon, Arkansas, $4,000. "For completing and furnishing" I believe was the language intended to be used. We have no estimates from the Department, and no papers before us, to show us that this additional sum is necessary.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask some of the gentlemen who have spoken upon this question from what fund this money is to be taken?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WALSH] is reminded that the debate is exhausted, and that he can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for no favors.

The question was then taken upon Mr. PERKINS's amendment to the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon Mr. GREENWOOD's amendment, it was taken, and there were—ayes 25, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for tellers.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask for a call of the roll, as there is no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that tellers were called for in time.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. VAIL and WHEELER were appointed.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 51.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DISNEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to offer the following amendment:

For payment of draftsmen and clerks employed under resolution of May 4th, 1848, upon the maps of the public lands, $5,675.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman that there is any necessity for me to give a particular explanation in regard to this amendment. As I have already said, I offer it in obedience to the instructions of the Committee on Public Lands—a decision made by that committee unanimously, and after careful and full consideration of the matter.

By a resolution adopted by the House on the 4th of May, 1848, it was provided that maps of the public lands should be prepared for the use of the House and of the Committee on Public Lands. These maps are kept in the room of that committee, and are constantly referred to. Their utility and necessity are conceded by all who know anything about the matter, and, I believe, by all who wish to know anything in regard to the public lands.

At the last session of Congress, for reasons advanced at the time, the House refused to make any appropriation for the continuation of the work, it being supposed that the work could be continued under the supervision and control of the General Land Office. The matter was left in that condition; but, subsequently, upon a reference to the imperative character of the resolution, it was deemed proper by the parties who had been at work on the maps to continue their labors, and they have continued them. This amendment is to provide for their compensation for the time they have been employed.

As I said, at the commencement of my remarks, the Committee on Public Lands have carefully and fully considered the case, and have unanimously directed me to report the amendment to the House, and I hope it will be adopted.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following amendment:

For paying William Irving $625 for services as acting Superintendent of the Seventh Census for five months, from the 30th of May, 1851.

Mr. HOUSTON. That amendment was ruled out by the Chairman yesterday.

Mr. LILLY. Was it not voted down?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The gentleman withdrew it before any vote was taken on it.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the Chair decide that this is not a private claim?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make that point of order?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that this is a private claim. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from New York whether, under any existing law, Mr. Irving is entitled to the pay provided for by this amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. There were a great many cases of this sort provided for last year. It is only necessary to refer to one of them to show that the House has been in the habit of ingrafting cases of this sort on appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman turn his attention to the point whether there is any law already in existence under which Mr. Irving is entitled to this pay.

Mr. MORGAN. He was acting Superintendent of the Census, and was for a time the only Superintendent, and of course there is a law authorizing his payment.

Mr. HOUSTON. But has not the regular Superintendent of the Census already drawn the salary for this time?

Mr. MORGAN. No, he has not. He has not been paid. It is an unliquidated debt; one that has never been settled.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question at this precise point. Has not the regular Superintendent filed his account, claiming the salary for this period of time?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; but it has not been allowed him.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then who has been paid?

Mr. MORGAN. No one has been paid; but of course the man who did the work ought to receive the pay.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Kennedy, who was the regular Superintendent at the time, claims the compensation, and is no doubt entitled to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN]

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

- 33d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1854.

NEW SERIES....No. 25.

that if the object of this amendment be to decide who is entitled to this money, it would not be in order, for then it would be a private claim, and should be considered as such.

Mr. MORGAN. It is not in the nature of a private bill. He was, at the time specified, the only Superintendent. Mr. Kennedy was in Europe, and he remained there for five months. I have Mr. Irving's commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed with his statement of the facts in the case, and when he has concluded, the Chair will decide whether the amendment is or is not in order.

Mr. MORGAN. On the 30th day of May, the Superintendent of the Census, Mr. Kennedy, went to Europe, and was absent for five months. Mr. Irving at that time was a clerk in the Interior Department, at a salary of $1,000 per annum; and, without his solicitation, a commission was made out by the Secretary of the Interior, directing him to enter upon the discharge of the duties of the office of the Superintendent of the Census. He took charge of the Census Office. He had the superintendence of many clerks, and, in fact, his duties were doubled. The following is the commission which he received:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, May 30, 1851.

SIR: You are appointed Acting Superintendent of the Seventh Census during the absence of the Superintendent, and will at once enter upon the discharge of your duties as such. Respectfully,
A. H. H. STUART,
Secretary of the Interior.

WILLIAM IRVING, Esq., Census Office.

It is upon that commission he bases his claim for compensation. He is entitled to what the Superintendent was. These are the facts of the case.

Mr. ORR. Does the Chair rule the amendment to be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does rule the amendment to be in order.

Mr. ORR. My attention has not been sufficiently directed to this matter to say anything that is calculated to enlighten the committee. I desire to have some information myself before I can vote for it. I should like to know whether this gentleman did not receive his compensation as clerk all the time he was acting in the capacity of Superintendent of the Census?

Mr. MORGAN. He did receive $1,000 per annum. He now asks for the difference between that salary and the salary of the Superintendent for the time he was employed as such. He had to discharge double the duties of his previous position.

Mr. ORR. Then I understand that the gentleman for whose benefit this amendment is proposed claims the same compensation that he would have received if he had been the Superintendent at the time?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ORR. Now, I would inquire whether the Superintendent continued to draw his full salary for the time he was absent?

Mr. MORGAN. He claimed its payment, but it was not paid him by the Department.

Mr. HOUSTON. The regular Superintendent has filed his claim for the compensation, but the Department has not yet allowed it. My recollection is that the universal practice has been, in these cases, that whenever the head of the bureau is absent for a few days, the chief clerk, or some one else, is directed to discharge the duties of the bureau. That practice is without exception. The chief clerk gets nothing, unless he gets it by legislation in a private bill. I know the Senate are passing upon some bills of that sort now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, and on which a division is called for. The House was divided; and the Chair reported 22 voting in the affirmative.

Tellers were demanded and ordered. Messrs. WHEELER and KERR were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 32, noes 55.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum voting, the Clerk will call the roll.

The call of the roll of the House was then proceeded with, and one hundred and twenty-nine members answered to their names.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee reported to the Speaker that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the deficiency bill, and it appearing, on a vote, that there was no quorum present, the roll was called, and the Chairman was directed to report the absentees to the House.

The SPEAKER. There being a quorum now present, the committee will resume its session.

Mr. SEYMOUR accordingly resumed the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question under consideration when the committee rose was on the amendment proposing to pay to William Irving $625 for services as Acting Superintendent of the Seventh Census for five months to 31st May, 1851.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it in order, Mr. Chairman, to move now an amendment to that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order.

Mr. LETCHER. Then, sir, I move a proviso that but one person shall —

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (interrupting.) Do I understand that the Chair rules that after tellers are ordered it is in order to move an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly it is.

Mr. WASHBURN. If so, it was ruled differently the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware that the question was ruled differently.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to know if this is not a private claim? and if so, it cannot be properly brought up here to-day. I raise a question of order, that the proposition before the committee is a private claim.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark that the question of order was raised before, and the whole subject discussed; and though the Chair thinks that it might have perhaps been decided on as a private claim, yet as the whole matter is before the committee, the Chair will leave it for their decision.

Mr. LETCHER. I propose to add to that amendment a proviso:

Provided, however, That but one person shall obtain his salary as Superintendent of the Census for the time specified in the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I accept the amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. The object of my amendment is this: Mr. Kennedy was appointed Superintendent of the Census, and he performed the duties appertaining to that office until he was dispatched to Europe for the purpose of collecting statistics abroad in regard to the mode of arranging the census returns. While he was in Europe he received, as I understand, or, at any rate, he claims that he shall receive, the regular pay of Superintendent of the Census.

Now, sir, I am opposed to paying two men for the same service. I am opposed to allowing to Mr. Kennedy pay as Superintendent of the Census, and at the same time allowing to this gentleman, who occupies the position of a clerk in the Census Bureau, the pay which Mr. Kennedy himself receives. This individual went into that office upon an understanding that he was to get a certain compensation for his services. He remained in that office, and received that compensation. Now, after it has been received, and after the contract has been fulfilled on the part of the Government towards this individual, he comes forward and asks that an extra compensation may be allowed him; and that he shall be raised, by the action of this House, to a far higher grade than that which the contract contemplated.

Now, it seems to me that if this principle is to be carried out in this case, it is needless for any of the committees of this House to resist any applications for extra compensation. We have numberless claims of this character now pending, which we are endeavoring to resist. But if this House shall undertake to establish this precedent, it is in some respects a rebuke to the committees, who are endeavoring to resist these claims, and it establishes the principle that an officer may contract his services for a particular sum, and then be allowed double the amount, upon application to this House.

I hope no such precedent will be set. Let individuals be held to the terms of their contract; and when the Government has fulfilled it on its side, let the party be required to perform his, and let him understand that he will not be allowed to receive any other compensation than that which is the legitimate result of the agreement upon which he went into office.

In addition to all that, this is a mere private claim, and nothing more nor less than a private claim; and if the House undertakes to vote it in here it will be competent, and within the rules of order, to take this as a precedent, and under it to bring in any other private claim now pending before any committee of this House and undergoing investigation there. Does not the House see the results to which this will lead? Do they not see the monstrous frauds which will be perpetrated upon the Government if you allow these claims without investigation, and in the absence of all knowledge as to their justice and right? I hope the House will pause and consider this thing, and not establish so dangerous a precedent. If this gentleman wants extra compensation let him present a petition and have it referred to the Committee of Claims, who will investigate it and report upon it to the House.

Mr. McMULLIN. I rise to a question of order. My point is that the amendment before the committee embraces a private claim, and is not therefore in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That point of order has already been raised and decided.

Mr. McMULLIN. Not upon this particular question.

The CHAIRMAN. It was made before the subject was fully discussed, and the Chair decided it in the affirmative.

Mr. McMULLIN. Was there an appeal taken from the decision?

The CHAIRMAN. There was not.

Mr. McMULLIN. Then I desire to take an appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. It is rather late to take the appeal now.

Mr. McMULLIN. Was the decision upon this particular question?

The CHAIRMAN. It was.

Mr. McMULLIN. I make the point again; and if the Chair decides that the amendment is in order I beg leave to take an appeal from the decision.

Mr. WASHBURN. I submit that it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is in order to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WASHBURN. I submit that the point of order is made too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is not too late.

Mr. McMULLIN. Is the question of appeal debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not debatable. When a question somewhat similar to this was introduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORGAN,] the Chair supposed that it was probably a private claim; but upon inquiry of the gentleman from New York the Chair understood that it made an appropriation, but that the question, Who was entitled to it? was settled by the existing laws. Under those circumstances, the Chair decided that the amendment was in order. The Chair now doubts whether the amendment now offered is in order; but, in conformity with the prior decision made by him, he decides it to be in order. From that decision the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] appeals. The question now is, whether the decision of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was then put, and it was decided in the negative.

So the decision of the Chair was not sustained, and the amendment was ruled out of order.

Mr. MILLER, of Indiana. I propose the following amendment:

To complete the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, $2,000.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Mississippi. I move to amend the bill by inserting the following:

For the completion of the marine hospital at Natchez, in the State of Mississippi, the sum of $6,000.

In offering this amendment, my object is to bring this matter of appropriations to supply deficiencies in previous appropriations for marine hospitals to a conclusion, one way or the other. There appears to be no consistency in the action of the House, nor in the objections that are constantly interposed. I am rather gratified that my friend from Louisiana [Mr. PERKINS] so far pushed the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to the wall as to compel him to assign his true reason for opposing these appropriations. That reason is, we are informed, that he was in principle opposed to all these appropriations. The Committee of Ways and Means seem to experience the same emotions of surprise and horror when an additional appropriation is asked for that the parish officer felt when poor, starving Oliver Twist "asked for more." At first we were told that these appropriations do not come under the head of deficiencies, and when, at last, under the pointed explanations of my friend from Louisiana, as to the facts of particular cases, and of the urgent necessities of particular localities, it became apparent that neither under the plea that the appropriations asked for is not germane to the deficiency bill, nor upon objections to the justice and propriety of the expenditure, could the opposition indiscriminately offered be sustained, we are met with the explanation that the opposition is general to everything which touches the money of this Government. Sir, I do not envy the reputation gained in this House, or before the country, by our objecting to everything on the score of guarding the Treasury, by lying in wait in a sort of ambush for private claims, playing the ant bear, in snapping up small insects that crawl tremblingly into the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the object of the gentleman is to state my argument, I tell him that he is precisely wrong.

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman has told everybody in the House that they were wrong, until he has exposed the fact that he himself is seldom right.

Mr. HOUSTON. I tell the gentleman that I made no such argument.

Mr. HARRIS. I know I am right. The appropriation asked for the hospital at Natchez is a deficiency upon all fair rules of construction. It is not so reported by the Secretary of the Treasury, and for that reason it is held to be out of order. It is not reported as a case requiring appropriation at all, even under the general appropriation bill. So that when that comes up I shall be met with the objection that it is not recommended by the Secretary—that the estimates are not furnished. It is quite easy for the Secretary, who has ascertained that certain things remain to be done, to complete a building, and knowing what remains to be done, it is easy for him to state what sum will be required. He has done so in regard to other cases, but does not do so in this particular case, and the failure to furnish this information is to be taken as a condemnation of the marine hospital at Natchez. If information is wanted to enable the House to come to a correct conclusion I will now furnish it. I do so gratuitously. But the information which I give is about as good as that upon which the House usually acts. I say that the appropriation is necessary to complete the hospital, in such a way as to render it comfortable and serviceable to those for whom it was designed, and there can be no reasonable objection to it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I had not expected to say anything further, or to take any other part in the debate upon this proposition; and I should not have risen now if the gentleman from Mississippi, who was last up, had stated my position correctly. I had hoped that when I called his attention to the misstatement of the argument I made, that he would have corrected himself; but he has failed to do so; and I am, therefore, under the necessity, in order to set myself right, to restate the position I assumed.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to your recollection, I ask this committee, I ask the gentleman from Mississippi himself, whether he is correct in characterizing me as saying that I opposed everything connected with marine hospitals?

I said the other day, in the only speech that I desired to make upon the subject, that I was in favor of building hospitals by the Government for sick and disabled seamen, at all prominent locations where the use of private hospitals could not be obtained. I further maintained, that we were building hospitals in places where they were not needed. But I asserted upon that occasion, and I repeat it now, that I am in favor of affording to sick and disabled seamen all the aid they need upon the part of the Government. That has nothing, however, to do with the matter of appropriating $100,000 for the construction of a hospital where we have no evidence that it is needed. That was what I said the other day, and I am satisfied that this committee so understood me.

I did not say I was opposed to all marine hospitals. I said that I had voted against extravagant appropriations for all these marine hospitals. I have stated, both publicly and privately, that I am willing to vote for the establishment of these hospitals wherever they are needed, and that all I desire is that the appropriations shall be kept within reasonable and proper bounds. That is the ground which I have all along occupied upon this question.

The gentleman from Mississippi says that the proper Department reports that this hospital at Natchez is incomplete; but they ask for nothing for its completion. Well, what are we to infer from that? I have not the report before me, nor has there been anything referred to the Committee of Ways and Means in reference to this work requiring action at the hands of that committee. I infer, however, from the statement of the gentleman himself, that the Secretary does not want this appropriation now. True, the Secretary reports that the building is incomplete, but what is his object in saying that to the House? If he wants additional money why does he not ask for it? The fair presumption—alike fair to the Secretary and to ourselves—is that he has a balance of unexpended appropriations enough to complete it.

Why at the last session of Congress we passed an appropriation of $4,000 for the marine hospital at Natchez. No one knows whether that money has been expended yet. There is no report on the subject. The gentleman does not undertake to say that that appropriation is all exhausted, or that any of it has been applied yet. The gentleman merely says that the building is incomplete. The Secretary also says that it is incomplete, but fails to ask for anything to complete it. It is, therefore, fair and reasonable to suppose that there is enough money on hand to complete it.

I do not care what appropriations this committee sees fit to put in this bill. I do not intend to resist these appropriations after the sense of the House has been taken, and the question has been decided against me. I made war against them when they were first presented. My opposition, I am sure the House will sustain me in saying, was a fair and manly opposition; and I care not for these assaults, let them come from whatsoever quarter they may. It is rather a singular course for gentlemen to pursue when they offer amendments that do not meet with the support and sympathy of this committee to assail the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. I have no desire to discuss again the necessity, the absolute necessity, whether in the light of justice or humanity, of appropriations of this kind for the lower branch of the Mississippi river. One of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means has himself confessed the necessity of erecting these hospitals on that river—

Mr. HIBBARD, (interrupting.) I presume my friend refers to me, and I thank him for the liberal manner in which he alluded to me in his previous remarks. I meant to say that I believed some marine hospitals were needed. I did not mean to be understood as saying that these appropriations were needed. I think money enough has been appropriated.

Mr. PERKINS. I must accept, then, the good will without the assistance, it seems, of the gentleman, although I cannot draw the distinction between the desire for marine asylums to exist and the disposition to appropriate money for their existence, unless the gentleman desires that we shall continue to do what we were obliged to do last year—support these individuals that the Government has bound itself by a sacred pledge to provide for. If Congress will not provide hospitals, when another pestilence sweeps through the country, we must and will take care of these men. None of them are residents either of Mississippi or Louisiana. Some are thrown upon us by necessitous circumstances, and some by business. And yet a committee, composed of western members, under these circumstances, come into this House, and, if not recommending at least acquiescing in appropriations for little spots along the Ohio river, oppose everything for the lower Mississippi. Sir, I ask where are those persons to come from who are to receive this bounty? It has been said in argument that some of those hospitals on the Ohio have not had the past year a single patient. I am not surprised at it. Those who were destined for them were buried on the banks of the lower Mississippi, before they reached the Ohio; and in consequence of the kind charity that nursed them disease was scattered all along our shores. It is for this reason, and not that I regret the charity, that I speak with feeling.

At this very time, Natchez, in Mississippi, is petitioning the Legislature of my State to make some sanitary provisions to protect the mouth of the Mississippi, and the points along the river; and a committee appointed by the State of Louisiana is investigating the subject; while the Governor, under a sense of its importance, has suggested, in its aid, an appropriation of a considerable portion of the land given for internal improvements. And for what, Mr. Chairman, is all this? Is it to make New Orleans healthy to the citizens of that city or that State? Why, sir, they are not the subjects of disease. The purpose is to extend the hospitalities of the State to, and secure the health of, those citizens of the West, and other portions of the country, who visit us either for pleasure or business.

Mr. Chairman, I have not designed to reflect on the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or to prefer charges against him. I have sympathized from the first in the embarrassment of his position, in being compelled to ask appropriations from this House against the principle of which, even in their advocacy, he has been obliged to argue. I have made this to myself an excuse for the many illogical speeches he has been obliged to deliver during this discussion; and I did not, therefore, expect a satisfactory answer to the remarks of my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. McMULLIN. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana; and I beg for a moment to call the attention of the committee to one or two facts which present themselves to my mind, and which I regard as of importance in the decision of this question. The gentlemen have not been able to draw to their aid the report of your able Secretary of the Treasury, as was the case when this subject of hospitals and custom-houses was formerly before the committee. Here the Secretary of the Treasury is not at war with this much-proscribed committee. I do not envy the position of the Committee of Ways and Means. They are a sort of target, to be shot at by every member whose particular bill and appropriation they oppose.

Now, how stands this particular case? There have already been appropriated for that hospital some $60,000. Your Secretary of the Treasury is sworn to report the facts to the House, and if more is wanted to complete the hospital, and he has not reported that want, he has been derelict in his duty. Let me say to my friends from Mississippi and Louisiana, that if they need more money to finish this institution, let them come forward and ask the Committee of Ways and Means to appropriate a sufficient sum in the general appropriation bill.

Mr. PERKINS. An appropriation in the general appropriation bill would be entirely useless. That bill will pass in August next. Appropriations for the North can then be profitably expended. At the South they could not be, for it is the season of sickness. It is therefore we ask if you intend to give the appropriation in August that you will give it now, and we will anticipate it by a judicious application.

Mr. McMULLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has satisfied this committee that—

Mr. FULLER, (interrupting.) I see from the report of Colonel Long, who has charge of the hospitals in the southwest, that of the sum appropriated for Natchez there is $4,035 37 unexpended.

Mr. McMULLIN. I thank, very kindly, my friend from Maine for stating this important fact. Here are four thousand odd dollars unexpended in April last. If this be not sufficient to complete the institution, then I would tell my friend from Louisiana that in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, if necessary, he can vote for the deficiency. It is not necessary to make the appropriation in this deficiency bill. Facts here show to the contrary. Then I ask the committee, if they will, in violation of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and in violation of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, force the appropriation of this money which was not asked for?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Louisiana, to add $500 to the appropriation.

Mr. PERKINS. If there be no objection I withdraw the amendment.

There being no objection the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HIBBARD. I move to reduce the amendment one dollar. I had not proposed, Mr. Chairman, to have entered into this debate about these marine hospitals, because I believed it useless, as the sense of the House has already been manifested on the subject; and when that is done by a legislative body, deliberately, decidedly, and repeatedly, as in this case, even though it may be against my own convictions, I have not, on that account, deemed it necessary to contest that will any further. I am disposed to defer to the voice of the majority thus expressed. I have been content to vote according to my convictions, without consuming time by useless discussion.

But, Mr. Chairman, the references made to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means make it proper, in my judgment, that I should say a word or two in reply to my friend from Louisiana, [Mr. PERKINS,] who, I know, will not intentionally misinterpret me, though he misunderstood what I did say. I stated, sir, and repeat now, that marine hospitals, at some points, are needed. I believe one is needed at New Orleans, and if there had not been enough already appropriated for that purpose, I would go for an appropriation. That place is not now under discussion. It is possible marine hospitals may be needed at other points. But what I said was, that for those which are needed we had already appropriated enough, as many of them had left sums unexpended, while others were not needed at all.

Now, sir, as to this point at Natchez, I know little about it. I have no particular objection to the hospital there. My impression is that it comes under the class of those for which no more appropriations ought to be made. It appears, sir, that at Natchez they had unexpended in April last upwards of $4,000. The Secretary asks no more. He does not understand that any present deficiency exists there; but he goes on in his report and tells us what remains to be done. He says, on page 297, that this building, though not yet completed, is occupied. It is plain, therefore, that the appropriation has been nearly enough; the building, if it was occupied, must be nearly finished; and as to what is remaining, he says:

"That which remains to be done is mainly the construction of hot-air furnaces and heaters, the erection of force pumps, to serve as fire-engines, with conduits to convey the water to all parts of the building, the making of a brick pavement, and the construction of a balustrade in front of the hospital."

It will be seen by this that what remains to be done is comparatively unimportant, mere matter of finish, and I dare say the Secretary believes that the sum of money already on hand is sufficient to do it. There is no deficiency now that he calls for; at least it is to be inferred that there is none, or an estimate would have been made therefor.

It has become very common for gentlemen to read lectures to the Committee of Ways and Means. I do not propose to reply to such attacks because I am not troubled thereby. I believe gentlemen mean their attacks in a Pickwickian sense. They make them when they have nothing else to say. When their propositions are such as to admit of no other argument, they fall upon our much-abused committee. I might have been troubled by these allusions if I had not become used to them. Having served upon the Committee of Ways and Means for some four years, I have become very indifferent to this kind of talk; we have become so accustomed to being scolded about, that we do not feel it. We have got used to it, and appreciate it at its true value, which is nothing at all. I think, sir, we shall continue to do our duty, nevertheless. I am not at all troubled about these attacks, but I am sorry to see the public money voted away in a manner so prodigal and indefensible. The judgment of the country, and the sober sense of these gentlemen themselves, will assuredly be with us in the end.

The House has already voted an appropriation to Paducah, Kentucky. We had before appropriated for that point the sum of $49,625. Five thousand has been added now, making in all, over $54,000 for that point. The hospital is occupied, and in operation. Nine persons are employed there, and the annual amount of their compensation is over $3,000. The annual interest on the money already appropriated is about $3,000 more, making nearly $6,000 as the annual expense, in addition to the $54,000 expended there, at a point where there is not a patient, where there has not been one during the last year, and where I am not aware that there ever has been, or ever is likely to be, a patient. And notwithstanding this the committee voted the appropriation of $5,000.

It is probably useless to contest the Natchez appropriation now, after such a vote, to say nothing of others like it, and I do not propose to. If the issue is to be made before the country upon such a system of appropriations, I am prepared, for one, to meet it. I am willing that it should go before the country, and that the country should settle it; I read no homilies to other gentlemen on this floor. If they are content with their position I am with mine. I say to gentlemen—and I address myself particularly to this side of the House—that we are starting out upon a programme of appropriations which, if carried out, will require an annual appropriation of $70,000,000.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the original amendment, it was put, and decided in the negative.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, offered the following amendment:

For compensation to Peter Parker, for services as chargé d'affaires in China from 24th May, 1852, to 31st January, 1853, being the difference between the salary as Secretary of Legation and interpreter and that of chargé d'affaires for the above stated term, $1,370 78.

Mr. CHANDLER. In pursuance of the direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I directed a letter to the Secretary of State in reference to this matter, and he answered that Mr. Parker served during that time as chargé d'affaires, and that it was proper to make the appropriation.

Mr. FULLER. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether there has been any such officer as chargé d'affaires to that Government?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly. When the former Commissioner retired, he appointed this gentleman as chargé d'affaires.

Mr. FULLER. Was he not a mere secretary of legation, performing the duties of the Minister? Is there any such officer known to the law as chargé d'affaires?

Mr. CHANDLER. He is, in diplomatic language, a chargé d'affaires, and is charged with the duties belonging to a Minister.

Mr. FULLER. I understand that we have a grade of Ministers—chargé d'affaires—inferior to a full Minister. There was a full Minister to that court, with a secretary of legation, who, in the absence of the Minister, performed the duties pertaining to the mission. I am, therefore, opposed to the principle of giving pay to any officer not known to the law or accredited to that Government.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order upon that amendment. I do not understand that that amendment proposes to supply a deficiency in any respect; but that it proposes nothing more nor less than this: to give an additional sum of money to an individual for what is represented to be extra service. That is about the amount of it.

The CHAIRMAN. While upon this point, the Chair would make the same inquiry that he did of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORGAN,] whether the law now authorizes the payment of this money, or whether the appropriation is merely for the purpose of paying money now due?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will read a clause of a letter from Secretary Marcy upon that point.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would like to hear the whole letter read.

The letter was then read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, Feb. 7, 1854.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th inst., inquiring, under instructions from the committee of which you are a member, whether Dr. Peter Parker is entitled to the pay of a chargé d'affaires of the United States from the 24th of May, 1852, to the 31st of January, 1853.

In reply, I have the honor to inform you that it appears from the files of this Department, that Dr. Parker acted as chargé d'affaires ad interim of the United States in China during the term above mentioned, and that it is usual for Congress to grant a secretary of legation in such cases the difference between his salary and that of a chargé d'affaires.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
W. L. MARCY.

Hon. JOSEPH R. CHANDLER, of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives of the U. S.

Mr. LETCHER. I insist upon my point of order being decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that this case is somewhat like the case from New York. The Chair then decided the claim to be in order, and that it was not a private claim; but the Chair was overruled by the decision of the committee. This case differs somewhat from that, and the Chair agrees with the Secretary in the opinion that this money is due to the individual named for his services. The Chair therefore decides the amendment to be in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not think that the Chairman states, as the Secretary has stated, that it is due according to usual courtesy, and not by law.

Mr. CHANDLER. We have precedents of this kind every year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment to be in order. Does the gentleman from Virginia appeal?

Mr. LETCHER. I think it is like the New York case, and I do appeal.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would be glad to get some information upon this subject. I understand that this Mr. Parker was an officer sent upon this mission, and that he has received the pay due to his position. The whole account is, therefore, closed. I ask whether or not this particular sum is proposed to be given to him as chargé d'affaires ad interim, and whether it is a deficiency or not. What is the deficiency here? I desire to be informed upon this point.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a deficiency in the gentleman's salary.

Mr. SMITH. I am not aware that the gentleman has any salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in order. From this decision the gentleman from Virginia appeals; and the question now is, "Shall the opinion of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was taken, and the decision of the Chair was not sustained; and the amendment was ruled out of order.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee do now rise, and report the bill and amendments to the House.

Mr. EDGERTON. I have another amendment to offer. I move to add the following:

And that Abelard Gulbin, late chairman for a seat in the House of Representatives from Nebraska, be allowed the same per diem and mileage that was allowed to Hugh N. Smith and Almou W. Babbitt, of New Mexico and Utah, under similar circumstances.

Mr. HAMILTON. I rise to a question of order. There is no law authorizing such an appropriation, and I submit that it cannot be made as a deficiency.

Mr. EDGERTON. I can state to the gentleman that it has been the custom heretofore to make appropriations of this character without any specific law authorizing them.

Mr. HAMILTON. Is there any law authorizing the election of a Delegate from the Territory of Nebraska, or recognizing such a person at all?

Mr. EDGERTON. Again, I state to the gentleman and to the committee, that appropriations have heretofore been made, paying the per diem and mileage of Delegates sent from a Territory without any law authorizing them to be sent, and when the Territory had not been organized. Such was the fact in reference to the Delegates first sent from Utah, from New Mexico, and from Minnesota. The Delegates sent from those Territories received their regular per diem and mileage, notwithstanding the fact that the Territories were not organized when they were elected.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman permit me to make a single statement?

Mr. EDGERTON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In the case provided for in the amendment offered by the gentleman, the Delegate came on, but was not admitted to a seat upon this floor. In the cases to which the gentleman alludes as precedents, however, the Territories were subsequently organized, and the Delegates obtained their seats—if my recollection be correct—so that the cases are not parallel ones.

Mr. EDGERTON. In reply to the gentleman I would say, that Delegates came on from Utah and New Mexico and obtained this per diem and mileage when they had not been admitted to seats upon this floor.

Mr. ORR. Do I understand the Chair to decide this amendment to be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was in doubt, and desired information in respect to the amendment.

Mr. EDGERTON. I have only to repeat what I have already said. These Delegates to whom I have referred were elected from New Mexico and Utah, and came on here. They were denied seats in this House, but were, nevertheless, paid their per diem and mileage.

The CHAIRMAN. From the precedents heretofore set in committee, the Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is clearly out of order, and he so ruled it.

Mr. McNAIR. I move that the committee do now rise, and report the bill and amendments to the House.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I demand tellers upon the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WHEELER and VAIL were appointed.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a point of order. I demand—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" and much confusion.]

Mr. McNAIR. I withdraw the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I move to amend the bill by adding the following:

For the payment of the balance of the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the provisional government of Oregon in defending the people of said Territory from the attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians, in the years 1847 and 1848; and that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to allow and pay the sums found due and allowed by the Governor of said Territory, or any one of the commissioners on Cayuse war claims, $75,000.

Mr. Chairman, I am reluctant to consume the time of this committee upon any question. I never do so unless the interests of my constituency are involved. The amendment I propose concedes nothing more than a further appropriation, required in order to meet a liability assumed by Congress, by the original appropriation, and in which this sum appears now as a deficiency. I propose it in behalf of those who voluntarily turned out and performed military service in defense of the lives and property of the people of Oregon, for a period of from six to eight months, against the attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians. The troops, for the expenses of whom this further appropriation is asked, subsisted themselves during the entire period of this war, and have never been paid for their services or their expenses remunerated, the appropriation having proved insufficient.

When it is remembered that the people of Oregon have never enjoyed the benefit of the protection afforded by troops stationed in the Territory, and that by some means or other it seems to have become the settled policy of the Government to leave that country without any protection whatsoever—save that which may be afforded by the people themselves—I can imagine no reason why they should not at least be remunerated for the actual and necessary expenses incurred by them in the discharge of a duty which rightfully pertains to the General Government, but which, being there neglected, is performed by the people.

During the last summer, when Indian hostilities again occurred in the Rogue River valley, and the settlements were about being swept away and destroyed by the depredations of the Indians of that valley, Captain Alden, a gallant and brave gentleman, commanding a post in northern California, and within striking distance of the scene of trouble, came over, with his entire command at that time capable of service, which was but nine only, and by his prompt action with this handful of "regulars," aided by the gallant citizens of the Territory who volunteered to the service, succeeded in preserving the settlements of the valley from the destruction with which they were menaced by the savages of that country. In doing this we lost a number killed, and many more crippled for life. The wounded, however, of our service are not here soliciting pensions for their wounds. We defend ourselves, and ask pay only for the time we are engaged in the service, and for our subsistence while we are in the field in defense of the country, and in quelling the Indian disturbances.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, I had time to detail the cause and history of that Cayuse war. It will be recollected that the Indians attacked the settlement of Mr. Whitman, a missionary among them, and wantonly and barbarously murdered him, his wife, and others then residing at the station. To this wanton and unprovoked butchery is to be traced the cause and commencement of that war. That it was repressed without the sacrifice of our settlements in Oregon is to be attributed to the gallantry, self-denial, and courage of those for the payment of whose expenses this amendment is proposed.

Mr. Chairman, I have already submitted to this House a bill, now in the hands of the Committee on Military Affairs, making an appropriation for the payment of the expenses of the late war with the Rogue River Indians, to which I alluded a few moments since. The citizens, in that instance, were called out by Captain Alden for the suppression of the hostilities of those savages, and are, it seems to me, of course entitled to compensation for their services. Will the committee now determine that these appropriations shall not be made to pay the just and necessary expenses of the people of Oregon in defending themselves, their families, and their property from the attacks and hostilities of the Indians of the country, who are thus left unrestrained by a neglect and seeming indifference for which the people of Oregon are in no sense responsible? I trust not.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to say to the committee, and to the gentleman from Oregon, also, that after this matter was up in committee yesterday a communication on the subject came from the proper Department, and was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. That committee have looked into it to some extent. The communication is somewhat of a lengthy and involved character. And while it is the feeling of the Committee of Ways and Means—if I may be allowed to say as much as that of their action—to go any reasonable and rational length, I may properly say that I fully concur in what is reasonably claimed not only for Oregon but for any of the Territories. Yet the committee think that this appropriation ought to be delayed for the present. So far from there being any deficiency, the communication from the Department says that of the $100,000 heretofore appropriated to pay the expenses of the war there is yet an unexpended balance of $3,224 59. Still, justice to the Delegate from Oregon requires me to say, that, under the existing laws, that amount is not at present applicable to claims, for reasons which I could not take the time now to state without wearying the committee.

There have been five commissioners appointed by the Legislature and the Governor of Oregon, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of these claims. The first commissioner, Mr. Skinner, reported $10,400, and Mr. Wait, the second commissioner, reported $76,830, making $87,230 in all. Some additional claims have been added by the Government, and when they have all been paid, there is the balance left which I have mentioned. Still, in fairness to Oregon, I must say that there have been three other commissioners, Messrs. Harding, Rice, and Terry, who have examined, or are engaged in examining those claims. The papers which the Department has sent to the Committee of Ways and Means, do not show that any report has yet come in from either of those three commissioners. Now, if it be true that there is a report showing the act of these commissioners, if it be any satisfaction to the Delegate from Oregon, I assure him that I am willing to make provision for it. For one, I am willing to say that, so far as I am concerned, he shall have my cordial support, if a report come in showing that these commissioners have acted, and that that action requires further appropriation. I will, at least, give him my feeble aid for the purpose of taking a proper care of these claims. Suffice it for this purpose to say that, as far as the Committee of Ways and Means are concerned, they were of the opinion that the thing was not in a position where it was proper for them in this deficiency bill to appropriate. When the regular bill comes up, and we have more information on the subject, it will be time enough to answer all the purposes of the Delegate from Oregon. I therefore hope that he will be satisfied with this explanation, and not press his claim further at this time.

Mr. LANE. I am unwilling to press anything which the committee think that I ought not to press. My demand is only for justice to the Territory which I have the honor to represent upon this floor.

In explanation, however, I beg to be allowed to read the communication from the last commissioner. My friend from New York has truly said that there have been five commissioners to examine and allow claims of persons on account of that war. He has given what has been reported by two of them. The books of the commission have been turned over by each commissioner to his successor. They show the amount of awards. The awards are not all here, and it is not necessary that they should be all filed in Washington city until an appropriation has been made to pay them. The communication to which I have referred is as follows:

OFFICE OF COMMISSIONERS, }
SALEM, OREGON, November 23, 1853. }

SIR: I have been quite busily engaged, for the past few days, in examining the books of the Cayuse war, in order to ascertain, as near as practicable, the whole cost of that war. I find, after said examination, that the whole cost of the Cayuse war will amount to one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, ($175,000,) needing another appropriation of seventy-five thousand dollars ($75,000) to cover the full expenses of said war.

Hoping that the appropriation will be speedily passed for the benefit of those concerned, I will ever remain your obedient servant,
CHESTER N. TERRY,

Commissioner on Cayuse War Claims.

HON. JOSEPH LANE.
Now, sir, as exhibited in the books, the commissioner has allowed all the claims, and the awards were allowed as granted. And permit me to say here, that the comptroller, whom I regard as honest a man as there is in the world, has told me, over and over, that the awards made by the commissioner have been made in so strict and correct a manner that he had not found it his duty to refuse the payment of a single charge.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that if the committee think I ought to withdraw the amendment I will do so with pleasure, for I never would ask anything which I did not think right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to understand whether the gentleman from Oregon withdraws his amendment.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Chairman, some of my friends think it better that I should withdraw it; I am willing to do so, and leave the bill as it stands.

The amendment was therefore withdrawn.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee do now rise, and report the bill, with the amendments adopted, to the House.

The question was put, and agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee [Mr. Seymour] took the floor to report—

Mr. FLORENCE, (interrupting.) Mr. Speaker, I submit that under the rule—I having addressed the Chair before the motion was made for the committee to rise and report the bill to the House—that it is not in order to make a final report, asking the sanction of the House to it, till the amendment is acted on.

The SPEAKER. That is an action which has reference to the committee, and not to the House. It is too late now to mention the matter.

Mr. SEYMOUR, Chairman of the committee, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under their consideration, according to order, House bill No. 49, and had directed him to report it to the House, with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that the bill, as amended, do pass.

Mr. FLORENCE. I submit a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state his proposition.

Mr. FLORENCE. If it is not a just one it may be decided in a moment. I do not desire to detain the House, but inasmuch as I have been deprived of my privilege, I now move to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not the floor at this time for any such proposition.

The SPEAKER then informed the House that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had reported that the committee had had under consideration the deficiency bill, and had made sundry amendments, and recommended that the bill and amendments do pass.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion, and let the previous question be seconded, and the main question ordered, and then renew his motion.

[Many voices, "That is right."]

Mr. WASHBURN. I withdraw the motion. The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. WASHBURN. I now move that the House adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House, accordingly, (at half past three o'clock,) adjourned until to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 9, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of Mrs. Nannie Denman, widow of Lieutenant F. J. Denman, of the United States Army, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CASS presented a memorial of citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the ratification of a treaty whereby a reciprocal international copyright is proposed between this country and Great Britain; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BRIGHT presented the memorial of the heirs and representatives of Colonel George Gibson, praying five years' commutation pay; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, the memorial of George Mattingly, praying the United States to confirm his title to square four hundred and ninety-five, sold to him by mistake by the corporation of Washington; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAYARD presented a petition, numerous signed by citizens of Delaware, remonstrating against the passage of any bill which will permit the introduction of slavery now or at any future time into any portion of the Territory of Nebraska; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a memorial of citizens of the State of Delaware, praying a further appropriation for the completion of the piers at Reedy Island; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented the petition of Rebecca Bright, widow of Jacob Bright, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRATT presented documents in relation to the claim of the heirs of Major Andrew Leitch, deceased, praying interest upon seven years' half pay allowed under an act of 20th June, 1834; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. SEWARD presented a document containing statistical information in relation to the line of mail steamers proposed to be established by Christian Hansen between Brooklyn, New York, and certain ports in Europe; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a petition of Horatio Seymour, and other citizens of New York, praying that the bill to secure the rights of citizenship to children of citizens of the United States born abroad, may become a law in the form it which it passed the House of Representatives; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, the petition of Joseph Goyette, one of the descendants of John B. Laboute, a captain during the war of the Revolution, praying to be allowed bounty land and commutation pay; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Also, a petition of voters of Bergen and its vicinity, in the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of Clinton county, New York, praying the passage of a law to grant to the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States, in the second war of independence, one hundred and sixty acres of land; or, if deceased, to their widows and heirs-at-law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a petition of citizens of New York, praying the prohibition of the sale of slaves for debts due the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WADE presented the petition of Elizabeth Summers, widow of Cornelius Summers, who served in the last war with Great Britain as a substitute for one Gray, praying to be allowed bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BELL presented the petition of Thomas B. Eastland, late major and quartermaster in the Army in the war with Mexico, praying to be credited with an amount of money disallowed by the United States in the settlement of his accounts, and compensation for the performance of certain services not in the line of his duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of John H. Thompson and others, composing a company of volunteers raised under a call by Major General Gaines, during the war with Mexico, praying to be allowed the pay due them; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Also, the petition of John H. Thompson, praying payment for provisions and provender furnished to a company of mounted men, raised for service in Mexico, under a call by Major General Gaines; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a joint resolution explanatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of Abigail Stafford;" which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Gray, McMurdo, & Co., reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Benedict J. Heard, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. BRIGHT moved that 5,000 additional copies be printed of the report of the Secretary of War, communicating copies of all reports of the engineers and other persons employed to make explorations and surveys to ascertain the most practicable and economical route for a railroad from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean that have been received at that Department.

The motion was referred to the Committee on Printing.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives, granting the right of way to the St. Louis and Iron Mountain Railroad Company, through the arsenal, magazine, and Jefferson barrack tracts, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INDIGENT INSANE PERSONS.

Mr. FOOT. I desire to ask the indulgence of the Senate this morning to allow me to call up the bill making a grant of public lands to the several States and Territories of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons. I desire to remark that this bill was referred, at an early day of the session, to the Committee on Public Lands, and early reported by that committee, and it stands upon the general orders in advance of all other bills making appropriations of public lands. I should be entirely willing to allow it to be taken up in the order in which it stands on the Calendar, if the practice of the Senate would allow it to be reached in that order; but the practice, as our experience has taught us, is that bills standing in the rear of it are from day to day taken up, and made special orders in advance of it. I therefore desire to have this bill taken up at the present time.

I may remark, however, that if any Senator present shall express his determination or desire to discuss the bill, I will not ask the Senate to proceed with its consideration at this time. I do not desire to interpose this or any other question in the way of the consideration of the pending special order; neither do I desire that when this bill shall be taken up and presented to the consideration of the Senate, if it shall elicit discussion, that that discussion shall be interrupted, but that it may proceed until the action of the Senate be finally had upon the bill. Therefore, if any Senator shall express a desire to debate the measure, I will only move that it be made the special order for some early day, with the understanding that the Senate on that day, if it shall not be in the way of any other special order, will take it up, debate it, act upon it, and finally dispose of it.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. I understood the Senator to say that if there were objections to the bill, he desired to fix a day for its consideration. With that understanding I did not object to taking it up, but for one, I never can consent to vest the title of lands in one State for any purpose in other States. An important principle is involved in the bill, and I shall certainly object to its passage.

Mr. FOOT. What I said, Mr. President, was, that if any Senator present desired to debate the bill, to occupy any time in the discussion of it, I would agree to make it the special order for some early day, and would not press its consideration at the present time; but if there be no objection, causing delay in the action of the Senate on the bill, I should desire to have a vote now.

The amendment to the bill, reported from the committee, in the form of a substitute for the whole bill, was read by the Secretary.

Mr. PETTIT. I propose to discuss the bill when it shall come up fully before us for action. I now desire to offer an amendment to it. I am not prepared, from the reading of the bill, to say in what section it should be inserted. It can, however, be inserted in the proper place. The object of the amendment is to confine the grant of lands to the States in which the public lands lie. It is as follows:

Provided, That all the grants of lands provided for by this act shall be confined to such States as have public lands in them equal to the amount hereby granted to such State.

Mr. FOOT. That amendment is, of course, entirely inconsistent with all the provisions of the bill. Inasmuch as the Senator from Indiana expresses his determination to discuss the bill, I will move, agreeably to the announcement with which I called it up, that its further consideration be postponed until Monday next, and made the special order for that day.

Several SENATORS objected to the day as being too early.

Mr. FOOT. I will modify the motion, and name Monday week.

The motion was agreed to.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801.

Mr. HAMLIN. On comparing the printed bill, which was reported from the committee last year, with the engrossed bill as it passed, I find there are verbal amendments which I propose to make to this bill, so as to make it precisely like the bill which passed last year. I therefore propose to amend the first section by inserting after the word "assignment," in the proviso, the words "except gifts or donations," and to strike out the word "claimant" and insert "assignee," so that the proviso shall read:

Provided, also, That in all cases of transfer or assignment, except gifts or donations, no assignee shall be entitled to receive an amount beyond the consideration paid and interest thereon.

And also in the seventh section to strike out the words "twenty years from," and insert at the end of the section "upon twelve months' notice," so that the clause will read:

And such certificates of stock shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, at any time after the date of the termination of said commission upon twelve months' notice.

The amendments were agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendments were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. That is the bill providing for the payment of French spoiliations committed prior to 1801, and in the language that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Dawson] employs, when he speaks of land bills, I desire to call the attention of the country, the people of the old as well as the new States, to the fact, that the Senate of the United States are now about to pass a bill which I believe would not have been read, but for the amendment which I offered. I think the Senator from Maine proposed to pass it through without reading, informing the Senate that it was the bill which had passed at a previous session.

Mr. WELLER. Appropriating only $5,000,000.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Only $5,000,000, my friend from California says, were to be appropriated, without the bill being read. I know how vain any opposition is which I may attempt to make to a bill such as this, which has grown with its age and strengthened by every possible appliance. Suffice it then to say, that a bill which could not get a committee of men who lived at the day and generation when the obligations were incurred, to report it to the Senate of the United States; which could not get a corporal's guard to support it in the earlier history of the country, when the actors in the scenes out of which the claims grew were living, and upon whom the obligation rested to repay that country which acted so noble a part with us in our Revolution, and towards which I shall ever cherish the most kindly sympathies—now, since the jobbers, the men who crowd and fill up the aisles here around Congress, urge their claims, the bill can pass, pass without a struggle and without opposition; and yet let the homestead bill—let a bill which is for men, for muscle, sinew, and bone, upon the frontier, come up, or a bill which is to aid a State, and not take one dollar from the Treasury of the United States, and you will see how it will be fought to desperation by every sort of appliance that the rules will favor. This bill, vetoed by one President, rejected by all the men that lived in the days when the obligation was incurred, is now so powerful that it is to pass, and will pass triumphantly, unless it should meet with a presidential veto, or a defeat in the other branch of Congress.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire only to correct one mistake which the Senator from Iowa has made. He says that when these claims had their origin in the history of the country there were found none to give them a favorable report.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. A bill, I said.

Mr. HAMLIN. Why the Senator is wholly and totally mistaken. The very year succeeding the settlement of these claims, when our Government appropriated them to pay their own debts, a report on the bill was made to Congress, and every Congress from that day to this has followed it up.

Mr. PRATT. There is one other observation made by my friend from Iowa in which I think he is mistaken. He says that the owners of the claims embraced in this bill, are now stock-jobbers who crowd the lobbies of your Senate Chamber, and that therefore the bill will pass without any opposition; but when the homestead bill is brought up it will be fought and opposed on every side of this Chamber. Now the distinction between these two bills, in my apprehension, is this: that the bill now before us is to pay your own citizens a debt which was honestly due from your Government to them; while the bill to which the Senator refers is only a premium offered to the immigration of foreigners to this country. That is the distinction which I see between the two bills. I think the bill before us, which is for the payment to your own citizens of an honest debt which has been delayed for years and years, ought to pass. The Senator says it has not even been read; it has been read; it has been read in this Chamber year after year, and it has been passed whenever brought to a vote here, under every state of political parties in the Senate. It has always passed the Senate; and whenever a vote has been given in the other branch of Congress, it has always passed there.

Mr. President, I thought the allusion to the homestead bill, in this connection, on the part of my friend from Iowa, was unkind towards those citizens, at any rate; I speak of those from my own State, which I represent here. They are not besieging the Senate or any one here, in reference to their claims; they are honest citizens of Maryland, who were owners of the vessels, and the debt is honestly due from this Government, because it has received from the French Government a quid pro quo. Therefore, I do think that my friend from Iowa is unkind in characterizing them as he has done.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. It was the least of my design to be unkind to anybody, and certainly not to the Senators from Maine and Maryland; but I declare before God and man that with all my reading on the subject—and I admit that it is not a very great deal, but I have read numerous speeches in relation to it, and I have heard one from the honorable Senator from Virginia, not now in his seat, and from the late Senator from Missouri—I believe the claim has no foundation whatever in justice. And, although my friend states bills have passed, I ask him if a bill ever passed the two Houses of Congress before 1846? From 1800, then, to 1846, these claims were before Congress, and petitioned for, but a bill never was passed, I believe, before 1846.

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, no.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. It passed the Senate, but never, until 1846, did Congress pass it, and then it was after a violent struggle. Now it passes almost unanimously; and I now refer to that which I believe to be the case; and I neither wish to misrepresent, nor do any injustice to any one of the claimants, or anybody else. I understand, though, that those interested—the purchasers of these old claims—have put on foot, among other appliances, one of sending out agents to the capitals of different States, and getting up grand champagne parties, with a view to get instructions through the different State Legislatures, and that there are high-minded, honorable Senators here now upon this floor who vote for the bill because of the instructions which are thus gotten up in different parts of the country. I have heard that in relation to it. Sir, the claims are strengthening, and I believe will continue to strengthen. There was a tremendous struggle to pass them before; but they pass now almost without objection.

Mr. PRATT. I desire to ask one question of the Senator from Iowa—whether a vote in either branch of Congress has ever been taken upon this bill, in which it has not passed by a decided majority? I can answer that no such vote has ever been taken.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President, as I propose to vote for this bill, I will briefly state to the Senate my reasons for that vote. I may be misinformed as to the historical facts of the case; but if I am not, I can conceive of no bill which commends itself with greater force of justice to the Senate and the country than this.

I will say to the Senator from Iowa that I will not, however, oppose his homestead bill, but will endeavor to be a co-laborer in that great measure. There will, therefore, be one Senator in the body who will vote for both these measures, believing them not to be incompatible, but to be demanded by the highest considerations of public and private benefit.

Mr. President, if I understand the history of the matter, it is briefly this, without reference to dates particularly: During the revolutionary war we were weak and needed assistance. We at that time applied to the powerful monarch of France to become our ally. We made with France a treaty offensive and defensive. We stipulated that she should furnish us with money and men to aid us in our struggle, and we stipulated to return a like equivalent to her. We agreed, also, to protect her in the continued and perpetual possession of her West India islands. Our war ceased, and came to a final, glorious, and advantageous termination, not more by the prowess of our own ancestors than by the assistance of the French Government. As I said, we made an alliance, offensive and defensive, with France, and we stipulated to defend her against her enemies, and particularly against Great Britain, and especially to protect her in the continuance of the possession of her West India islands. Our difficulty passed away. Hers came on, and she in vain appealed to our Government to come forward and render that service which we had stipulated to render in return for what she had done for us. We failed to render her any assistance. The condition of our country was such that we could not do it. We had neither the men, nor the money, nor the navy, to carry out our stipulation with her. We had, therefore, like a bankrupt creditor, to say, "You have got our bond, but we cannot perform its conditions." Such I understand to have been precisely the condition of things.

France, then, incensed by our unwillingness or inability; unwillingness, as she called it, for her magnanimity would probably have induced her to pardon us if we had been able to show her clearly that we were unable to perform it, and she would have been an indulging creditor; but believing that we were perfidiously and meanly refusing to perform our part of the contract, for which we had received a valuable consideration, she authorized, indirectly, if not directly, her cruisers, her privateers, and men-of-war, to commit depredations on our commerce. They did commit innumerable depredations upon our commerce, against which we protested. But when we protested, they said, in substance, in return, "You are a perfidious nation; you are justly liable to these reprisals; you have not performed your engagements with us, and we are now driven to the extremity of war, when you, our ally, to whom, in times gone by, we rendered good service, and liberated you from the bondage of Great Britain, now refuse to perform your part, and we will seek our indemnity and redress in what way we can."

These spoiliations took place upon our merchant commerce, and were carried on for years and years. Then we applied to France, as it was our business, and our duty to do; for I hold that it is the duty of every Government to apply for redress for any injury or wrong done its citizens in the lawful pursuit of commerce at home or abroad. When peace was again restored, we said to France, "here is our bill of particulars; you have captured, seized, and destroyed when we were at peace with you and all Europe, vessel A, and vessel B, with their cargoes, and they have been condemned; we therefore demand of you an indemnity for these acts."

France substantially said, she did not pretend to deny that the stipulations were true, but that she did not know the citizens, and only the Government of the United States; she had nothing to do with the citizens, but only the Government of this country. And she said to the Government, "we have a set-off against you; here is your bond, in which you stipulated to return us services for those which we rendered to you; you stipulated to defend our West India possessions, but you have not done so; and we have lost them in consequence of your failure to perform that stipulation; we will therefore not pay your citizens; we were justified in these acts; they were the only means which we had of getting redress for the non-performance of your pledged faith."

After various attempts at negotiation, after the matter had been talked over at Paris and at Washington, repeatedly, and again and again brought to the consideration of the two Governments, it was finally settled that these claims should be mutually merged, that they should be mutually abandoned—that France, in consideration of our abandoning and releasing her from her liability to our citizens for these spoliation committed against the laws of war, and in consideration of our no longer importuning her to pay for them, would release us from the non-performance of our engagements entered into in our treaty with her during the revolutionary war, for mutual defense and protection. That, I understand, is the case precisely.

I voted for this bill years ago in the other House. I then gave it a more thorough examination than I have now given it. What I have now stated is from general recollection, having no documents or particular dates before me; but the substance of my remarks will be found to be literally true, and to comport entirely with history.

Now, sir, in what condition does this place us, is the next question? We, as the sovereigns of the individuals of this country, or as their guardians, if you prefer that term, have appropriated the debts due our wards, the people of the United States, to liquidate our own debts. That is as good an illustration as I can give of it. A guardian is indebted to A, and A is indebted to the ward. The guardian goes to A, and tells him, "Sir, you owe money to my ward." That is precisely what we told France: "You owe our citizens, whose interests we are bound to protect." In the case which I have put, the guardian says to A, "I demand that you shall pay this bond in favor of my ward, or that you shall pay him for the trespass you have committed, or the violation of his rights." A says, "I will not do it; you are the guardian, it is true; but here is your bond, and according to it you owe me so much. Now, why not settle this matter with me, and go back to your own house and settle with your ward as you can? You owe this amount, and more. Then cancel this debt, receipt to me for what I owe your ward, and I will receipt to you for what you owe me, and then you may go and settle with your ward as you please."

Well, sir, it is not only mutually stipulated so to do, but it is actually carried out and is done. The guardian gives A. full receipt and discharge; that is nothing more nor less than your release of the debt, and nothing more nor less than you have done by your treaty with France. You have exonerated, absolved, and discharged, and released France from these liabilities long and long ago, more than half a century ago—so long, that those to whom the debts were first due, and justly due, as I hold, have long since, almost without exception, been swept from the face of earth and gone to their long homes, leaving heirs to wrangle with Congress and the Government for their just dues.

Well, sir, the debt is released; the guardian releases A, and takes a receipt in return for what is due from him. In what condition in law, in equity, and, much more, in morals, does it place the guardian? I ask you, if he can go home to his ward and tell him, "Sir, true I have released this bond, as I had the power to do, and discharged your debtor A, but I will not pay you myself." Sir, in your private life would not such a man be scorned and hooted from any community? I feel precisely in that situation here. While I am clothed with authority or power anywhere for the public interest, I will, at least, be as honest in the service of those who sent me here as I would feel that honor and honesty required me to be in individual transactions. Sir, I desire to represent, and will represent, no constituency who would not allow me to say, "take as much money from our pockets as shall be necessary honorably to discharge our public engagements."

It is suggested that it is one o'clock, the time for the special order, and if it is desirable to go on with that business I will give way now, and resume my remarks hereafter. I had desired to say something further, but I give way.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, the further consideration of the bill was postponed to, and made the order of the day for half past twelve o'clock, to-morrow.

CHARLES GORDON.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am instructed, by the Committee on Public Lands, to ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Charles Gordon, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims. I will say, that the documents in the case made a favorable impression on the minds of the members of the committee as to the justice of the claim; but as it was thought that the jurisdiction of the subject belonged to the Committee of Claims, and as there was some testimony wanting, it was resolved that the Senate should be asked to discharge the Committee on Public Lands, and to refer the memorial to the Committee of Claims.

It was so ordered.

BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed the following enrolled bill and resolution; which had previously received the signature of the Speaker of the House:

"An act to regulate the disbursement of the contingent fund of the Senate, and for other purposes."

"A resolution authorizing an increase of the force employed in the office of the Superintendent of the Public Printing."

NEBRASKA TERRITORY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a Territorial Government in Nebraska.

Mr. SMITH proceeded to address the Senate, and when he had spoken an hour and a half,

Mr. SEWARD. It is apparent to the Senator that he cannot conclude his remarks to-day. I beg leave, therefore, with his consent, to submit the motion that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH. I did desire to finish my remarks to-day, but I see that I cannot possibly do it.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. WELLER. I shall have to object to that arrangement. There are a good many Senators here—perhaps myself among the number—who desire to speak upon this question; but if we go on, allowing the Senate to adjourn upon a speech of an hour and a half each day, it will be utterly impossible to arrive at a decision of the question for many weeks to come. Now, if the Senator will proceed with his remarks until the usual hour of adjournment of the Senate, I shall have no objection, if he should not have got through with his remarks then, to a postponement until to-morrow. But I do not see that the Senator is greatly exhausted by his remarks this morning; and I would prefer still more of the dose to-day, that I may have the less to take to-morrow. Therefore it is that I am not willing to agree to the motion.

Mr. SMITH. I do not choose, after the remarks of the Senator from California, who suggests that I should go on until the usual hour of adjournment—

Mr. WELLER. Mr. President—

Mr. SMITH. I do not yield the floor. The gentleman says, he wants to get as much of the dose to-day as possible, so that he may have as little as possible to-morrow. That is a remark made by a Senator of the United States, and in the presence of the whole American Senate. It is an eminently characteristic remark. That is all I have to say about it. I am perfectly willing that the honorable Senator shall display himself—

Mr. WELLER. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. SMITH. He may make such displays as he pleases. I have nothing in reserve but silent contempt for such conduct.

Mr. WELLER. If the Senate will indulge me, I said nothing, in my judgment, calculated to give offense to the Senator. I may say, I did not intend it. I did not say whether the dose was palatable or unpalatable. I desired to have as much of it to-day as possible, if the Senator would allow it, in order that we might have the less of it to-morrow. I do not know what I have said that should have provoked the indignation of the Senator from Connecticut. He well knows, of course, the opinion I entertain of him. I have never regarded him as a gentleman, and, as a matter of course, I would not have intruded myself at this time upon the Senate for the purpose of offending him. I am sure such was not intended. The relations which we have heretofore sustained were well understood by the Senate. It is a matter of no sort of importance to me whether the Senator regards me with contempt or not. All that I desired, in the remark which I made, was to hasten the determination of this question. I made that in good faith, because I desired to bring it to a vote in the Senate at the very earliest day I could obtain.

Now, so far as the language of the Senator is concerned, I have no reply to make to it. At the previous Congress, I was compelled from public consideration to give my opinion of him. That was heard by the Senate. I have no disposition to repeat it now. I cherish no unkind feelings to him. He took occasion, some years ago, when I was commissioner upon the boundary survey between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, to make unfounded charges against me. When I came here as a Senator from that glorious State upon the Pacific, I took occasion to demonstrate that the charges against me were false and unfounded. He had not the manliness then to say that he had fallen into an error. He made no explanation. He neither attempted to justify nor to explain himself. I was then compelled to make use of language that I had trusted I never would be compelled to make use of in the American Senate. In what I said to-day, I intended no offense to him, nor to any other Senator; for when I desire to insult, those who know me know that I am not in the habit of using equivocal language. Such was not my design to-day.

I ought perhaps to apologize to the Senate—to the Senator I shall not—for the very innocent manner in which I have been drawn into this personal discussion here to-day. If I said anything, therefore, at the outset, which was calculated to wound the feelings of any Senator, I cheerfully withdraw it. But my opinion of the Senator from Connecticut, as a matter of course, remains unchanged.

Mr. SMITH. The remarks which the Senator has now made are not of such a nature as to lead me to change the feeling with which I look upon them. What he has said has very little to do with the question before us, and it is not necessary for me to make any further reply to his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SHIELDS in the chair.) Is the motion to postpone withdrawn?

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. PRATT. I think it would be better to postpone it until Saturday,—that will probably suit the Senator as well. To-morrow is private bill day. Last Friday private bills were postponed at one o'clock for the purpose of considering this subject. I hope that will not be done to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH. I would inquire whether, if the subject be postponed until to-morrow, it being private bill day, it would not necessarily go over until Saturday?

Mr. PRATT. Not if the Senate fix upon to-morrow. Would it not suit the Senator as well to conclude his speech on Saturday?

Mr. SMITH. I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator will have a better opportunity of arranging his remarks by a postponement until Saturday. I hope the sense of the Senate will be taken upon so postponing it.

Mr. SEWARD. If it is more agreeable to the honorable Senator and the Senate, I will modify my motion to postpone until Saturday.

Mr. MALLORY. I would ask whether, if we postpone this subject until to-morrow, we could not have the entire morning hour for private bills?

Mr. BADGER. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. Then I suggest that we should not postpone it until Saturday, but until to-morrow, at one o'clock.

Mr. PRATT. To-morrow is the day upon which private bills cannot be arrested by the objection of one individual. I understand that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] intends to discuss at large the policy of a class of bills which have been reported from the committee of which I have the honor to be a member. It will not be competent for us to decide upon these bills in the morning hour. I therefore think that the subject had better be postponed until Saturday, when the Senator from Connecticut can conclude his speech, so that we may have the whole of to-morrow for the consideration of private bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question on the postponement until Saturday, and declared that it appeared to be carried.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall have to appeal to the friends of the measure and to the indulgence of the Senate not to postpone the bill for a longer period than to-morrow.

Mr. BRIGHT. I presume the Senate will hardly sit on Saturday. I take it that there is not a Senator present but would prefer to give the Senator from Connecticut an opportunity of finishing his speech to-morrow, and to dispense with the consideration of private bills. I therefore move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow, at one o'clock. I think that will meet with the approbation of the Senator. There is no rule for the Senate adjourning over Saturday, but it is our custom.

Mr. PRATT. I suppose the question will be put on the longest period first.

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw the motion to postpone until Saturday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be on postponing the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. PRATT. I move to amend, by substituting Saturday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is first on postponing until to-morrow.

Mr. PRATT. I have renewed the motion to postpone until Saturday, and, according to parliamentary rule, as I understand it, the question must first be taken on the longest period.

Mr. BADGER. I think my friend from Maryland is mistaken. The privileged motions when there is a question before the Senate, among others, are, to postpone until a time certain, and to postpone indefinitely; but these motions are not amendable. If a motion is made to postpone indefinitely, an amendment cannot be offered to strike out "indefinitely" and put in "to-morrow," they are specific privileged motions; and a motion being made to postpone until to-morrow, it must be put to postpone until to-morrow.

The motion to postpone until to-morrow was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. BRIGHT, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 9, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th ultimo, a report from the Chief of the Topographical Engineers, with such plans and estimates as were in the War Department, for the removal of obstructions at Colbert Shoals, in the Tennessee river.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is a communication in response to a resolution which I had the honor to offer. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and be printed.

The question was put, and the motion agreed to.

GUANO TRADE.

Mr. FRANKLIN. I hold in my hand resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of Maryland in regard to the present monopoly in the sale of guano. I ask leave to present the same to the House, and move that they be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and be printed.

No objection being made, the resolutions were introduced and referred, as above indicated.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. On yesterday the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] moved to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to a certain amendment of the Senate to House bill (No. 50) "making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1854." The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will it be in order to postpone the consideration of this subject until my colleague, [Mr. FLORENCE,] who made the motion to reconsider, shall come into the House? I perceive he is not in his seat.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection, and the House will proceed to the next business in order.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The SPEAKER. The business in order is the consideration of House bill (No. 49) "to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1854," upon which the main question has been ordered. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union yesterday reported the following amendments, which will be read by the Clerk.

Mr. HOUSTON. There are a good many amendments to that bill, and I suppose it will be the better way, if the House will agree thereto, to read over the amendments, and if any member desires a separate vote upon any of them, let him indicate that wish, as the reading progresses. To such as are not objected to one vote can be taken upon the whole.

The SPEAKER. That is the usual and convenient mode of proceeding, and if not objected to, that course will be pursued.

The Chair hears no objection. Should any gentleman desire a separate vote, he will indicate it as the reading proceeds.

The Clerk then read the following amendments, to which no objection was made:

First amendment:

In line 33 strike out "For outfit of a commissioner to reside in China, $9,000."

Second amendment:

In the following clause—

"For the usual return allowance for Ministers of the United States to Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, Spain, Brazil, Mexico, Peru, and Chili, $20,250"

Strike out the word "Peru" and "$20,250" and insert in lieu thereof "$18,000."

Third amendment:

In the following clause—

"For the usual return allowance of chargé d'affaires, as Ministers resident to Portugal, Austria, Denmark, Sweden, Holland, Belgium, Naples, Sardinia, the Papal States, New Granada, Venezuela, Buenos Ayres, Bolivia, Guatemala, Ecuador, and Nicaragua, $18,000"

Strike out the word "Guatemala," and also "$18,000," and, in lieu of the latter, insert "$15,750."

Fourth amendment:

Add to the clause "For outfits of chargé d'affaires, $2,439 02" the words "for outfit of chargé d'affaires to Austria, $4,500."

Fifth amendment:

In the following clause—

"For the employment of workmen, materials, and other expenses necessary to put the Branch Mint at San Francisco, California, in operation, $40,000"

Add these words:

"To purchase a site for a custom-house at Providence, Rhode Island, $40,000: Provided, That the entire cost of said site and building thereon shall not, in any event, exceed the sum of $74,000."

"To complete the public buildings in New Mexico $50,000."

Sixth amendment:

Insert "For the completion of the custom-house at Cincinnati, $40,000."

Mr. LETCHER. I ask for a separate vote on that amendment.

Seventh amendment:

Insert "For the completion of the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, $30,000."

Pending the reading of the last amendment,

Mr. PRESTON said, I rise to a question of order. Is it the will of any member of the House to demand a separate vote upon each amendment relating to custom-houses?

The SPEAKER. By the unanimous consent of the House it was ordered, that the amendments should be read as a whole, and any gentleman desiring a separate vote upon any one proposition should signify the fact—the object being to have a vote taken at once upon all those to which no objection may be made.

Mr. PRESTON. The question I ask is whether it is competent for any gentleman to demand a separate vote upon each case?

The SPEAKER. It is competent for any gentleman to demand a separate vote upon any of the amendments which have not been read.

Mr. DRUM. I demand a separate vote upon each case.

The Clerk then proceeded to finish the reading of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendments to which no objection has been made.

The question was then taken; and the amendments not objected to were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question will be on the adoption of the following amendment:

"For continuing and completing the custom-house at Cincinnati, Ohio, $40,000."

Mr. ORR demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being taken, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ball, Benson, Benton, Bissell, Bliss, Breckinridge, Bugz, Campbell, Caruthers, Chandler, Clark, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, John G. Davis, De Witt, Dickinson, Disney, Dunbar, Eastman, Edmunds, Ellison, English, Everhart, Farley, Flagler, Florence, Fuller, Giddings, Green, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Hendricks, Henn, Hiester, Hill, Hunt, Johnson, Kerr, Knox, Lane, Latham, Lindsey, Macdonald, Mace, Macy, Matton, Middleasworth, John G. Miller, Morgan, Norton, Mordecai Oliver, Pennington, Phillips, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sapp, Shannon, Simmons, Gerrit Smith, William R. Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, and Zollieffer—84.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, Barksdale, Barry, Bocock, Carpenter, Chastain, Chrisman, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Curtis, Dawson, Dent, Dowdell, Drum, Dunham, Fenton, Franklin, Goode, Grow, Hamilton, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hibbard, Hillyer, Houston, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kittredge, Kurtz, Lamb, Letcher, Lilly, McNair, McQueen, Millson, Morrison, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Pratt, Ready, Reese, Robbins, Ruffin, Sage, Seymour, Shaw, Samuel A. Smith, George W. Smyth, Stratton, Tront, Walker, Walsh, Wheeler, Witte, and Hendrick B. Wright—65.

So the amendment was concurred in by the House.

Mr. PRESTON. I move to reconsider the vote last taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put, and the latter motion was agreed to.

The question being on the following amendment:

"For completing the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, $40,000"

Mr. HAMILTON demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKENS, its Secretary, informing the House of the passage by that body of bills of the following titles:

Senate bill (No. 84) "making a grant of land to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Oakland and Ottawa railroad, from the Grand Rapids to the Straits of Mackinaw; and a railroad from Pontiac, via Pierre Marquette river, Manitowoc and Ontonagon river, to Kewana Point, with a branch to the vicinity of Camp river, upon Lake Superior."

Senate bill (No. 7) "making a grant of land to the State of Louisiana, to aid in the construction of a certain railroad in said State."

The question being taken on the seventh amendment, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ball, Benson, Benton, Bliss, Breckinridge, Bugz, Campbell, Caruthers, Caskie, Chandler, Chase, Clark, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Dickinson, Disney, Dunbar, Eastman, Edmunds, Ellison, Everhart, Farley, Flagler, Florence, Fuller, Giddings, Green, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Henn, Hiester, Hill, Hunt, Johnson, Kerr, Knox, Latham, Lindsey, Macdonald, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Meacham, Middleasworth, John G. Smith, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Walker, Walsh, Wheeler, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—77.

So the amendment was concurred in by the House.

Mr. PRESTON. I move to reconsider the vote last taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. CRAIGE. Upon the motion to lay upon the table, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only twenty-four members having voted therefor.

The question was taken; and the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Upon the following amendment:

"To complete the custom-house at Bath, Maine, $20,000."

Mr. WALSH demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being taken, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ball, Banks, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Benton, Breckinridge, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Caskey, Chandler, Chase, Clark, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Dickinson, Disney, Dunbar, Eastman, Edmonds, Everhart, Farley, Flagler, Florence, Fuller, Giddings, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Henn, Hiestler, Hill, Hughes, Hunt, Kerr, Kidwell, Knox, Latham, Lindsley, Macdonald, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Meacham, Middleswarth, John G. Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, Trout, Vansant, Walsh, Wheeler, Witte, and Daniel B. Wright—74.

So the amendment was concurred in by the House.

Mr. BENSON. I move to reconsider the vote last taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put, and the latter motion was agreed to.

The ninth amendment was next read, considered, and agreed to:

"To complete the whole works in and about the custom-house at Bangor, Maine, $20,000."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move that the vote last taken be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The question was put, and the latter motion was agreed to.

The tenth amendment was next read, as follows:

"For the completion of the custom house at St. Louis, Missouri, $100,000."

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana, demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment, which were ordered.

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ball, Banks, Belcher, Benson, Benton, Breckinridge, Bugg, Campbell, Caruthers, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chase, Clark, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Dickinson, Disney, Dunbar, Eastman, Edmonds, Ellison, Edgeridge, Ewing, Farley, Flagler, Florence, Fuller, Giddings, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Henn, Hiestler, Hill, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, Kerr, Kidwell, Knox, Lindsley, Macdonald, Mace, Macy, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Noble, Mordecai Oliver, Pennington, Phelps, Phillips, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Shannon, Simmons, Gerrit Smith, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Upham, Wade, Walker, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, and Zollcoffer—84.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Ashe, Barksdale, Barry, Bennett, Bissell, Brooks, Carpenter, Chastain, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Craige, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dowdell, Drury, Dunham, Eddy, Edgerton, Edmundson, Faulkner, Fenton, Goode, Grow, Hamilton, Hastings, Havens, Hendricks, Hibbard, Hillyer, Houston, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kittredge, Kurtz, Lane, Leitcher, Lilly, McCulloch, McMullin, McQueen, Millson, Morrison, Murray, Nichols, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Ready, Reese, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Shaw, Skelton, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Stratton, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Walsh, Wheeler, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—74.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of Missouri. I move that the vote last taken be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The question was put, and the latter motion was agreed to.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States, by SIDNEY WEBSTER, his Private Secretary, informing the House that he did, on the 8th instant, approve and sign a bill of the following title:

House bill (No. 198) "giving further time for satisfying claims for bounty lands, and for other purposes."]

The eleventh amendment was read, as follows:

"For completing, in a fire proof manner, the custom-house at Wilmington, Delaware, $12,000."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is this the last of these custom-house amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands there are one or two others.

Mr. JONES. I would suggest that the others be read, and all included in one vote.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES. We certainly have had votes enough to test the sense of the House upon these amendments; and it is but a waste of time to take separate votes upon the other amendments.

The SPEAKER. The suggestion of the gentleman can only be followed by unanimous consent.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. Then separate votes must be taken upon every amendment.

Mr. LILLY. I demand the yeas and nays upon concurring in the pending amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the amendment agreed to.

Mr. RIDDLE. I move to reconsider the vote last taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was taken, and the latter motion was agreed to.

The twelfth amendment was read, as follows:

"For the completion of the custom-house at Mobile, Alabama, $64,900."

Mr. HENDRICKS demanded the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendment; which were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barksdale, Benson, Benton, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bugg, Campbell, Caskey, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Cunningham, Thos. Davis, De Witt, Disney, Dunbar, Eastman, Edmonds, English, Farley, Flagler, Florence, Fuller, Giddings, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Grey, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Henn, Hill, Hunt, Latham, Lindsley, Lindsley, Macdonald, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Noble, Norton, Mordecai Oliver, Pennington, Phelps, Phillips, Preston, Puryear, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Rogers, Russell, Sapp, Shannon, Shaw, Simmons, Gerrit Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Upham, Wade, Walker, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, and Hendrick B. Wright—82.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Barry, Belcher, Bennett, Bissell, Brooks, Chastain, Chrisman, Cobb, Craige, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dowdell, Drury, Dunham, Eddy, Edmundson, Ellison, Goode, Grow, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Haven, Hendricks, Hibbard, Hillyer, Houston, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kittredge, Kurtz, Lane, Leitcher, Lilly, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Matteson, Milson, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Nichols, Andrew Oliver, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Ready, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Skelton, Samuel A. Smith, Snodgrass, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Walsh, Wheeler, Witte, and Zollcoffer—67.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put upon the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

Thirteenth amendment:

"To complete the marine hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, $25,000."

The question was put; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion; and it was agreed to.

Fourteenth amendment:

"For the construction of stone steps and railings to the hospital at Chicago, Illinois, and for grading the grounds and inclosing the site of said hospital with a suitable iron fence, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, $8,000."

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

Fifteenth amendment:

"For inclosing and draining the site, and for the necessary out buildings, of the marine hospital at San Francisco, California, $44,000."

The question was put; and the amendment was agreed to.

Sixteenth amendment:

"For the construction of hot-air furnaces, fencing, paving, &c., of the marine hospital at Louisville, Kentucky, $12,500."

The question was put; and the amendment was agreed to.

Seventeenth amendment:

"For the completion and improvement of the marine hospital at Paducah, Kentucky, $5,000."

The question was put; and the amendment was agreed to.

Eighteenth amendment:

"For the collection of agricultural statistics, and purchasing seeds; to be paid out of the patent fund, $10,000."

Mr. ORR called for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then put; and, on a division, there were—yeas 75, noes 38; no quorum voting.

Mr. CHANDLER asked for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and VAIL were appointed.

The question was again put; and the tellers reported—yeas 84, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question was next taken upon the following amendment, and it was agreed to:

Nineteenth amendment:

"For the entire completion of the edifice and grounds of the hospital at St. Louis, Missouri, and putting the whole into a fit state for occupancy, the sum of $2,000."

The Clerk read the next amendment, as follows:

"For the purchase of the lots, or parcels of land, with the appurtenances, and the buildings thereon, belonging to the one thereof, to the Bank of Commerce, and the other thereof to the Bank of the State of New York, and particularly referred to and described in two contracts; one with each of said banks, for the leasing and right to purchase the same, bearing date the 19th of August, 1853: Provided, That before the said purchase is made, the State of New York shall cede to the United States jurisdiction over said land and property, and shall, by law, exonerate the same, and the property of the United States thereon, from all taxes, levies, and assessments thereon, while the same remains the property of the United States, $530,000."

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

On the demand for the yeas and nays there were, on a division—yeas 24, noes 57; no quorum voting.

Mr. ROBBINS. I call for tellers on the demand for the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The House was again divided; and, 29 voting in the affirmative, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was adopted—yeas 87, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Appleton, Ball, Banks, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Bissell, Bliss, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chase, Clark, Cook, Corwin, Cunningham, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dunbar, Edgerton, Edmonds, Edmundson, Farley, Giddings, Greenwood, Grey, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Hughes, Hunt, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Knox, Latham, Leitcher, Lindsley, Macdonald, McMullin, Mace, Macy, Matteson, Maxwell, Morgan, Murray, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Peckham, Pennington, Preston, Reese, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Rogers, Sapp, Simmons, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walker, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Wells, Wheeler, and Zollcoffer—85.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Thomas B. Bayly, Barry, Benton, Brooks, Chandler, Chastain, Chrisman, Clingman, Craige, Crocker, Curtis, Dawson, Dent, Disney, Dowdell, Drury, English, Faulkner, Florence, Green, Grow, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hibbard, Hiestler, Hillyer, Johnson, Roland Jones, Kittredge, Kurtz, Lane, Lilly, Lindsley, McCulloch, McNair, Middleswarth, Smith Miller, Millson, Morrison, John Perkins, Puryear, Ready, Robbins, Ruffin, Russell, Shannon, Shaw, Skelton, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, Trout, Walsh, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—60.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Speaker, is it in order here to make a motion to postpone the consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion would not be in order, as the House is acting under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. FLORENCE. How does the previous question operate?

The SPEAKER. First upon the amendments reported to the House by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and then upon the bill.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am satisfied. I asked the question simply because I desired information upon which to base a motion.

Mr. WALKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment above was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. The question was put on the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

The following amendments of the committee were severally read, voted upon, and agreed to:

Twenty-first amendment:

"For finishing the capitol and territorial prison of the Territory of Minnesota, and for grading and fencing the grounds of the same, $10,000, to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

Twenty-second amendment:

Under the head of Interior Department, after "$8,400," at the end of line 182, page 6, insert the following:

"For the President's House and grounds, for fuel for the President's House, and for iron fences, $3,800.

"For repairs of the Capitol, and for improving the grounds around it, $6,500.

"For repairs of water pipes, $200.

"To pay the two draw-keepers on the Long Bridge, $400.

"For repairs of the pavement, and other purposes, $500.

"For lamps and lamp posts on Pennsylvania avenue between Seventeenth street and Georgetown, &c., $1,200.

"For completing the pedestal of the equestrian statue of General Jackson, $500."

Twenty-third amendment:

"For the general and incidental expenses of the Indian service in New Mexico, for the present fiscal year, $15,000; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior."

Twenty-fourth amendment:

"For the payment for the printing of the returns of the Seventh Census, and for the paper purchased for said printing, under the provisions of a joint resolution approved March 3, 1853; that is to say, for the printing of the returns before mentioned $15,909 93; for the paper purchased $27,106 68: Provided, That the sums hereinbefore mentioned be paid to the printer who executed the printing, and to the contractor who furnished the paper, respectively, by the Treasurer of the United States."

Twenty-fifth amendment:

"For compensation for two additional clerks in the office of the Superintendent of Public Printing, $1,200."

Twenty-sixth amendment:

"For the printing of the Executive Departments, including for paper, and the printing of the annual estimates of appropriations for the year 1855, and for printing, paper, and binding, twenty thousand copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on Commerce and Navigation for the year 1853, $9,085."

Twenty-seventh amendment:

After line 141 insert the following:

"For rent of house on the northwest corner of F and Seventeenth streets, and warming all the rooms in it, $385.

"For the compensation and expenses of the commission of civilians and military men appointed under the provisions of the first section of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1851,' approved 3d March, 1853, to determine matters connected with the management of the national armories, $5,996 61, or so much thereof as may be necessary; provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the payment or allowance of any compensation to military men employed other than their regular pay or emolument, as officers of the Army."

Twenty-eighth amendment:

"And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to apply such sum as in his opinion may be necessary to complete the building for the custom house, post office, and court house in the city of Pittsburg, and to furnish such building in a manner appropriate to its uses, and to improve the grounds attached to said building; and also to pay to the two commissioners who superintended the construction of said building a compensation at three dollars a day each for the time they were actually employed in superintending the same, and for which the said Secretary shall think them entitled: Provided, That the sum so as aforesaid to be expended by the Secretary of the Treasury shall not exceed the sum now remaining unexpended of appropriations heretofore made for the said building."

Twenty-ninth amendment:

On page 10, after line 221, insert the following:

"For the expenses of the House of Representatives for horses and carriages, $840.

"For newspapers for members, $2,000.

"For pages, $1,936.

"For binding documents, $77,596 40.

"Miscellaneous items, $10,000.

"For binding the Congressional Globe and Appendix for the second session of the Thirty-Second Congress, five thousand and eighty eight volumes, at sixty cents per volume, $3,412 80.

"For messenger for Speaker, $312.

"For payment for Annals of Congress ordered for the House Library, being one hundred copies each of the following volumes: the first, second, and third volumes of the Tenth Congress, the first, second, and third volumes of the Eleventh Congress, in all six hundred volumes, at five dollars a volume, $3,000.

"For printing Index to Private Claims, ordered to be printed by the House of Representatives, by resolution of 22d December, 1851, $20,000."

Thirtieth amendment:

"For arrearages incurred prior to the 1st of July, 1853, for running and marking the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, $50,000."

Thirty-first amendment:

"For salaries and incidental expenses of the commission appointed under the act of March 3, 1851, for settling the land claims in California, $37,500."

Thirty-second amendment:

"For compensation to Francis Dainese, for the discharge of the United States consular duties at Constantinople, from the 16th of May, 1849, to the 20th of December, 1852, in conformity with the act of Congress, approved 11th August, 1849, $3,594 50."

Thirty-third amendment:

"For furnishing the marine hospital at Napoleon, Arkansas, the sum of $1,000."

Thirty-fourth amendment:

"For payment of draughtsmen and clerks employed under resolutions of May 4, 1848, upon the maps of the public lands, $5,675."

Thirty-fifth amendment:

"To complete the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, $2,000."

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

The bill having been engrossed, it was subsequently read a third time by its title.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON. Upon that I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Appleton, Banks, Benson, Bissell, Bliss, Bugg, Chamberlain, Chandler, Crocker, Cutting, Thomas Davis, Disney, Dunbar, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmands, Ellison, Everhart, Farley, Goodrich, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Haven, Hiestler, Houston, Hunt, Ingersoll, Lindsey, Lindsley, Macy, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Noble, Phillips, Preston, Riddle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchie, Robbins, Shannon, Simmons, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tweed, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walker, and Israel Washburn—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, Ball, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Bennet, Boyce, Campbell, Chase, Chastain, Chrisman, Clingman, Cobb, Corwin, Cox, Craig, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dowdell, Drum, Dunham, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Goode, Green, Grey, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Hendricks, Henu, Hibbard, Hill, Hilyer, Johnson, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kidwell, Kittredge, Knox, Kurz, Lane, Lilly, McCulloch, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Mace, Matheson, Meacham, Millson, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Nichols, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Peckham, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Pratt, Pringle, Ready, Ruse, Rogers, Ruffin, Russell, Sage, Sapp, Shaw, Skelton, William Smith, Stratton, Tracy, Trout, Walsh, Elihu B. Washburne, Wheeler, Witte, Hendrick B. Wright, Yates, and Zollcofer—93.

So the bill was rejected.

Pending the call of the yeas and nays, and before the result was announced,

Mr. LETCHER said: Had I been in the House when my name was called I should have voted against the bill.

Mr. PURYEAR said: Had I been in the House when my name was called I should have voted for the bill.

Mr. CARPENTER said: Had I been present I should have voted against the bill.

Mr. FLORENCE said: I voted against this bill because—

[Cries of "Order," "Order," all over the House.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I call the gentleman to order. The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The Chair then announced the result, as above indicated—yeas 57, nays 93.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

[Cries of "Oh, no," "No."]

Mr. CLINGMAN. Does not a motion to reconsider and lay upon the table take precedence of a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider and lay upon the table will be entered if the gentleman desires it, in order to save his right; but a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, is in order at any time.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the motion will be voted down.

Mr. ORR. I ask for tellers upon the motion. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS of Alabama, and ROBBINS were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—yeas 66, noes 78.

So the House refused to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the deficiency bill was rejected, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. FLORENCE. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MACE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question will be put on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. McNAIR demanded tellers on the motion. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. McNAIR and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—yeas 51, noes 91.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurred upon the motion that there be a call of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. MILLSON. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. Will it be competent for the House, if the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected should prevail, to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. If the House reconsiders the vote by which the bill was rejected, and then reconsiders that by which it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, it will then be in order to move to recommit the bill.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the House do now adjourn, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must inform the gentleman that no business has intervened since the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. READY. I wish to inquire of the Chair what will be the effect of the motion to reconsider in the event—

The SPEAKER. That motion is not the one immediately pending. The question upon which the House is about to vote, is, "Shall there be a call of the House?" and upon that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 114; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Appleton, Banks, Bliss, Carpenter, Caskie, Chamberlain, Chandler, Clark, Cobb, Craig, Disney, Ellison, Faulkner, Florence, Goode, Green, Greenwood, Grow, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Henu, Hibbard, Hill, Houston, Hunt, Johnson, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kidwell, Lane, Lindsey, Macdonald, McQueen, Matteson, Maxwell, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Millson, Nichols, Noble, Phillips, Preston, Riddle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchie, Robbins, Shannon, Shaw, Tweed, Upham, Vansant, Walker, Elihu B. Washburne, Wells, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—59.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly

Ball, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Bennett, Benson, Bissell, Boyce, Brooks, Bugg, Campbell, Caruthers, Chase, Chastain, Chrisman, Clingman, Colquitt, Cox, Crocker, Cullom, Curtis, Cutting, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dickinson, Dowdell, Drum, Dunbar, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Edmunds, Everhart, Ewing, Farley, Franklin, Fuller, Giddings, Goodrich, Grey, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Hiestler, Hilley, Hughes, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, Kerr, Kittredge, Knox, Kurtz, Lamb, Latham, Leicher, Lilly, McCulloch, McMullin, McNair, Mace, Macy, May, Middleswarth, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Peckham, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Phelps, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, Rogers, Ruffin, Sabin, Sage, Sapp, Seymour, Simmons, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Vail, Wade, Walsh, Wheeler, Witte, and Zollicoffer.—114.

So the motion for a call of the House was disagreed to.

Mr. NICHOLS moved that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put, and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question then recurred on Mr. CLINGMAN'S motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the deficiency bill was rejected; and being put, there were—yeas 89, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Belcher, Bennett, Boyce, Brooks, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Chase, Chastain, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Corwin, Cox, Craige, Cullom, Curtis, John G. The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative.

So the motion to reconsider lies upon the table.

This announcement was received with loud applause.

Mr. CLINGMAN then moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon (at half past three o'clock) the House adjourned until to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 10, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The Hon. JACKSON MORTON, of Florida, appeared in his seat this morning.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT. This being private bill day, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to present a report from the Postmaster General, in answer to a resolution of the Senate in reference to the steps taken in carrying out the provisions of the post route bill of August 31, 1852.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. That communication is in response to a resolution which I offered some days since. Not knowing whether it will require any reference to a committee, I move for the present that it lie on the table, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL DAY.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Are petitions in order?

The PRESIDENT. Petitions are not in order. Nothing is in order but the consideration of private bills on the Calendar.

Mr. PETTIT. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to report back from the Committee on Private Land Claims some bills which have passed the House, and which have been referred to that committee.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the report will be received.

There was no objection.

LAND CLAIMS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PETTIT. The Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill from the House supplementary to an act entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," approved March 3, 1851, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it back, and recommend its passage. It is so clear a case that I ask that the bill may now be considered and passed.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded as in Committee of the Whole to consider the bill.

It proposes to allow certain parties who are named, or their representatives, to present their claims to the commissioners appointed under the act of March 3, 1851, within six months after the passage of the supplementary act, and to empower the commissioners to hear and dispose of them, as though the claims had been presented in due time. It also proposes to limit the persons named in their claim to purchases made of Don Salvador Vellejo, a Mexican grantee, for a tract situated in Nappa county, California.

Mr. PETTIT. It will be seen that this bill simply extends the time within which the parties named may present their application.

Mr. WELLER. I hope this bill will be passed by the Senate immediately. The necessity for it has been produced in consequence of the fact that the attorney who was originally employed to present these claims to the land commissioners was stricken down with the small-pox, and persons were prevented from going to see him. During his sickness, the time limited by law for filing the claims expired, and the object of this bill is simply to allow persons, who were deprived by this accident of the opportunity of presenting their claims in time, an opportunity of doing so now.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

HERCULES L. DOUSMAN.

Mr. PETTIT. The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred House bill to confirm to Hercules L. Dousman his title to farm lot 32, adjoining the town of Prairie du Chien, in the State of Wisconsin, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage, and to ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to confirm the title and direct a patent to issue for it, with the proviso, however, that it shall only be a relinquishment to all claim on the part of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be read a third time, and was read a third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PETTIT asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill authorizing a patent to be issued to Peter Poncin for certain lands therein named; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred a memorial and resolution on the subject, reported a bill constituting San Pedro, in California, a port of entry and delivery; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

C. A. WICKLIFFE.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill for the benefit of the heir-at-law of Lieutenant C. A. Wickliffe, reported it back, by unanimous consent, without amendment, and recommended its passage, and asked for its immediate consideration.

The Senate accordingly, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to issue to C. A. Wickliffe a land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land, in satisfaction of the claim of Lieutenant C. A. Wickliffe, deceased, for bounty land, under the act of Congress "granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved September 28, 1850.

C. A. Wickliffe, jr., joined General William O. Butler's staff in 1847, and proceeded with his division to the city of Mexico. He remained upon the staff until he was appointed Lieutenant in Captain Thomas Mayfield's company of the fourth regiment of Kentucky volunteers. He served as lieutenant until he was honorably discharged at Louisville, on the 25th of July, 1848, by reason of the expiration of his term of service. On the 15th November, 1850, he filed his claim in the Pension Office for bounty land, under the act of September 28, 1850. Pending his application he departed this life, leaving his father, C. A. Wickliffe, his only heir-at-law.

Upon the application of the heir-at-law, the Commissioner of Pensions decided that as Lieutenant Wickliffe died, leaving no widow or minor children, a bounty land warrant could not be issued. From that decision an appeal was taken to the Secretary of the Interior, who, while he affirmed the decision, acknowledged the justice of the claim. Inasmuch as the Secretary acknowledged the justice of the claim, and as the warrant would have been issued by the Commissioner to Lieutenant Wickliffe before his decease, had not a press of business in the office prevented it, the committee were of opinion that the warrant should issue to the heir-at-law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. SMITH presented the petition of Samuel Colt, of Hartford, Connecticut, praying an extension of his patent for improvements in fire-arms; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. EVERETT presented a petition signed by citizens of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of the law giving further protection to patentees; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of Mr. SIDNEY WEBSTER, his Private Secretary:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate several messages in writing.

I am also directed to inform the Senate that the President has this day approved and signed,

A joint resolution authorizing an increase of the force in the office of the Superintendent of the Public Printing; and

An act to regulate the disbursement of the contingent fund of the Senate, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing the passage by that body of the following bills:

A bill for the relief of Harriet Leavenworth, widow of the late Brevet Brigadier General Leavenworth;

A bill for the relief William B. Edwards; and

A bill for the relief of Anthony G. Willis, deceased.

NEBRASKA AND KANSAS.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, it is known to the Senate that the Senator from Connecticut did not yesterday finish his speech on the territorial question; and as he is ready now to proceed and anxious to finish it, I hope the unanimous consent of the Senate will be given to allow him to proceed now.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I thought the understanding was, when we adjourned yesterday, that we would meet to-day for the purpose of considering private bills under the rule, and that the honorable Senator from Connecticut was to proceed to-morrow with his speech. Why not say to-morrow? I think it would be more agreeable to him to deliver the remainder of his speech to-morrow. I feel bound, as chairman of the Committee of Claims, to insist upon the rule being observed.

The PRESIDENT. It requires the unanimous consent to permit the Senator from Connecticut to proceed now.

Mr. BRODHEAD. But, still, if it is the unanimous wish of the Senate that the Nebraska bill shall be considered to-day, I will not interpose an objection. I do not wish to do anything contrary to the general sentiment of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the proposition.

Mr. STUART. I wish to say now—not for the purpose of interposing an objection here to-day, although I should feel myself perfectly justified in doing it, because I suggested it to all the Senators around me yesterday—that I may not be regarded as captious, that I shall insist hereafter, so far as my own action may go, on considering the private business on Friday. I do not believe, sir, that there is any more important business; at this time, for the Congress of the United States to perform or transact, than to do justice to the private claimants against this Government, some of whom, they and their heirs, have been applying here for a quarter of a century.

Mr. CLAYTON. For fifty years.

Mr. STUART. I, sir, have a case of a friend of mine which has actually been crowded out of these Halls, in consequence of the discussions in 1850. It is only one of numerous cases. And now, sir, I desire to say, while under the circumstances, notwithstanding the notice which I gave yesterday, I shall not interpose to-day. I shall feel myself not only justified, but almost bound to make objection hereafter. To-day I will consent to it, but with the express understanding that hereafter, so far as my action goes, I shall insist that Fridays be consumed, whenever there is private business here, in the consideration of that business, which, by a resolution of the Senate, has been set apart for it.

No objection was made, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. SMITH proceeded to address the Senate in conclusion of the remarks which he commenced yesterday. [Mr. S.'s speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. WELLER. I desire to submit a few remarks to the Senate upon the question now under consideration. If the Senate should meet to-morrow, I can go on then; if they should adjourn until Monday, I will then be prepared to proceed; and I now give notice to any other Senator who may desire to speak, that I shall not occupy one hour.

Mr. BRIGHT. With the consent of the Senator, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WELLER. I understand there is some business requiring the action of the Senate in Executive session. I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until Monday, in order that we may have an Executive session.

Mr. HOUSTON. Do I understand the Senator to say that he will not take up more than an hour on Monday? I shall desire to submit some remarks myself.

Mr. WELLER. I certainly shall not occupy an hour.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 10, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the business first in order was the consideration of bill No. 125.

Mr. FULLER. This being private bill day, I wish to inquire what business would be in order, if a majority of the House, under the operation of the 29th rule, should determine not to go to private business?

The SPEAKER. The business before the House would be the consideration of certain private bills upon the Speaker's table, and then, no motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or any other privileged motion being made, the Chair would proceed to call the committees for reports.

Mr. FULLER. That is the business I desire to get at. I move, if it be in order, that the House proceed to the call of committees, and the other regular business of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order. There are two or three private bills on the Speaker's table reported from the Committee of the Whole House when it was last in session, but which have not yet been disposed of. Upon one of those bills the previous question was demanded. When that is disposed of there are three other private bills upon the table, which it will be the duty of the Speaker to present to the House.

Mr. FULLER. The 29th rule provides that the Friday and Saturday of each week shall be appropriated to the consideration of private bills, unless otherwise ordered by a majority of the House.

The SPEAKER. Another rule, however, prescribes that the order of business shall not be changed, except by a vote of two thirds.

Mr. HAVEN. I call for the regular order of business, if it pertains to private business.

On motion by Mr. HAMILTON, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers of Colonel Johnson, for the purpose of presentation to the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have a privileged motion to make. I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to reconsider the vote rejecting the deficiency bill was laid upon the table yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair neglected to call the attention of the House to the manner in which the Journal is made up. On a count of the vote yesterday on the motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider, referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee, the report to the Speaker was yeas 88, nays 88, and thereupon the Chair gave the casting vote, as it was his duty to do under the rules. On reexamining the vote, however, it was found that the yeas were 89, the nays 88, and the Journal has been made up according to the facts of the case.

Mr. HAVEN. It does not change the result.

The SPEAKER. No; the result is the same.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Unless the Speaker changes his vote.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker has no right to change his vote to-day.

Mr. COBB, (sotto voce.) Perhaps a great many of us would change our votes to-day if we had the power.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the Chair decides that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is in order I am content.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the motion is not in order, according to the practice of the House.

Mr. JONES. Will the Chair have the 56th rule read?

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to submit a point to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend, until the rule is read.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to pass—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has already a question of order before the Chair.

Mr. JONES. An appeal is not debatable; and therefore it is not in order for me to make any explanation. But I desire that the 56th rule may be read, which I think is most clear and explicit.

The Clerk then read the 56th rule; which is as follows:

"When a motion has been once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move for a reconsideration thereof on the same or succeeding day, and such motion shall take precedence of all other questions, except a motion to adjourn, and shall not be withdrawn after said succeeding day without the consent of the House, and thereafter any member may call it up for consideration."

The SPEAKER. The Chair states that the universal practice of this body has been to regard a vote to lay a motion to reconsider upon the table as final; unless the bill be resuscitated by a motion made in order, which would take it from the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If I may be permitted one remark—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please suspend his remarks until the Chair has explained.

It will be recollected, by the gentleman from Tennessee and others, that the same question of order was made at nearly the close of the last session of Congress; the decisions in the case have been uniform; and the Chair will remark, that if the practice be reversed we shall hardly ever see the end of any bill about which there is controversy on this floor. It will be for the House, however, to determine what its practice shall be in that respect; the Chair is not disposed to change that practice; he thinks that it is a very good one.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the deficiency bill was defeated yesterday?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. STEPHENS. And the motion was then made to reconsider the vote by which that bill was defeated; and that that motion be laid upon the table. Upon the latter motion there were—yeas 89, (as now reported,) nays 88. If the Speaker should vote "no," of course that motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table would fail. I hold that the Speaker must vote. His vote may change the result, and under the rules he is required to cast it. I therefore now call upon the Speaker to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has the right, under the Constitution, equal to any other member, to cast his vote. He has cast his vote, and is not now disposed to change it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not know that there is any objection to again referring the deficiency bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, if it be desired. I agree with the Chair on the point of order; but I hope, by general consent, that the bill may be recommitted, if the Committee of Ways and Means want to have it again. I presume some of its appropriations are proper in the opinion of every member. In this way we might get out of the difficulty, if nobody objects.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina proposes that, by the unanimous consent of the House, the deficiency bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I beg to call the attention of the Speaker to a decision made during the Thirty-First Congress. It arose on the Texas, or New Mexican, boundary bill. An amendment submitted by the present Presiding Officer failed. A motion to reconsider the vote by which it was rejected was laid upon the table. Then, if my recollection be right, a motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table. The Speaker decided that motion to reconsider could be made, and in that decision he was sustained by the House.

Mr. ORR. I do not think the gentleman's recollection is correct.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] is mistaken in regard to the history of that case. It is true that the amendment to attach the Mexican territorial bill as an amendment to the boundary bill was voted down; it is true that vote was reconsidered; it is true that it was voted down a second time; it is also true that this House overruled the decision of the Chair, declaring it could not be reconsidered a second time, notwithstanding an amendment had been made. I suppose that is the only case of the kind on the record of any deliberative body. The times were revolutionary, gentlemen will recollect. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I appeal from the decision of the Chair in this case. The case of the Texas boundary bill is not at all analogous to this.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable.

Mr. JONES. I only want to state the grounds of my appeal, and that I have a right to do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has a right to state the grounds of his appeal; but he has not a right to make an argument upon it.

Mr. JONES. I do not purpose making any argument, but merely wish to state the ground of my appeal, which is this: Under the 56th rule of this House I, having voted yesterday with the majority to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, have a right on this day to move for a reconsideration of that vote, it being a vote of this House on a motion made, and I voting with the majority. This right is clearly secured under the rule, to me and to each of the other eighty-eight persons who voted with me on that occasion.

A MEMBER. Is not this debating the question?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; I am not debating, or making an argument. I am simply stating my right, and the ground of appeal. And I would refer the Chair to one case analogous, to some extent, with this one, which occurred in the Thirty-First Congress. That was a case where a motion was made to lay a bill upon the table.

Mr. HAMILTON. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is debating the question.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman from Maryland will wait I shall be done in a minute. I was referring to a case, Mr. Speaker, that occurred in the Thirty-First Congress, where a motion was made to lay a bill upon the table. That vote was negative. The House continued in the consideration of that bill till the adjournment. Under the practice of this House the bill went to the Speaker's table. On the next day, one of those who had voted against laying the bill upon the table moved a reconsideration of the vote. I made the question that this could not be done; that it was such a motion as the rules of the house prohibited—

Mr. HUNT. I call the gentleman from Tennessee to order. He is out of order, and has been already overruled, but he contumaciously persists in occupying the floor. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES, (continuing.) And the House sustained the motion—

Mr. HAMILTON, (interrupting.) I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. And on that motion I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question: If this bill had been decided, either by a vote rejecting or passing it, it would be in order to move for a reconsideration of that vote. In this case, a motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected, and that motion was laid upon the table. What did the House do by laying that motion upon the table? It determined that it would not reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] moves to reconsider the vote by which the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table. The Chair states, that the practice of this body has been uniform on this subject; and he thinks he may defy the gentleman from Tennessee, or any other member, to point to a single case in the history of this House differing from the course which the Chair here deems to be the correct one; which is, that a motion to lay upon the table such a vote as that is final, until it be in order to take that vote or bill from the table.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to ask the Chair one question. It may not be improper to state that my recollection is different from that of the Chair. But the question I desire to propound is—conceding the usage—if the usage is contradicted by the express statute provisions, what is the usage worth?

Mr. PECKHAM. A good interpretation of the statute.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Decision under the common-law would not do against the statute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already answered the question of the gentleman from Ohio, in simply stating the fact, that the uniform practice of the House has been in such cases to make the vote final, and it has been final in regard to every bill. If it is the wish of the House to change its own practice, it is a matter of propriety which it can determine for itself.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I trust the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] will withdraw his motion, and that the House will not reverse its long-established and judicious practice. I take it for granted that the House will pass all necessary appropriations for deficiencies, and if there are any provisions in this bill which are wrong the House can rectify the wrong; and I therefore suggest that they let this bill rest upon the table until Monday next, when a motion can be made to suspend the rules; and under that suspension the bill can be taken up, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. JONES. There is another difficulty in the way of that. This bill has been engrossed, and no committee, nor the House itself, can amend an engrossed bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to ask one single question. I wish to know if this is anything more than a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House laid the motion to reconsider upon the table?

The SPEAKER. Nothing more.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish the House would give its general consent to make a compromise, by allowing me to introduce a bill to the House, and by having it referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order, if objected to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Georgia. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the gentleman cannot offer the bill.

Mr. McMULLIN. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is the motion to lay upon the table the appeal taken by the gentleman from Tennessee from the decision of the Chair. Upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" it was put, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 134, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Appleton, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Benson, Bissell, Bliss, Bocock, Boyce, Breckinridge, Buzz, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chastain, Christmas, Clingman, Colquitt, Corwin, Cox, Craig, Culom, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dick, Dowdell, Drum, Dunham, Edgerton, Edmunds, Edmundson, Ellison, English, Ewing, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Flagler, Franklin, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Greenwood, Grey, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hill, Hilyer, Houston, Hunt, Ingersoll, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, Roland Jones, Kerr, Kittredge, Knox, Kurtz, Lamb, Lecher, Lilly, Lindsey, McCulloch, McMullin, McNair, Mace, Mateson, Maxwell, Meacham, Middlesworth, John G. Miller, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Nichols, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Peck, Peckham, John Perkins, Phelps, Pratt, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, Reese, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Rogers, Ruffin, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Sapp, Seymour, Shannon, Simmons, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Frederick P. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Tracy, Trout, Tweed, Upham, Vail, Walker, Walsh, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Wheeler, Witte, and Zollcoffer—134.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Chandler, Churchwell, Clark, Cobb, Crocker, Dickinson, Disney, Dunbar, Eastman, Everhart, Florence, Green, Grow, Hiester, Hughes, George W. Jones, Lane, Macdonald, Macy, Smith Miller, Millson, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Richardson, Riddle, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Thurston, Israel Washburn, Wells, and Hendrick B. Wright—35.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. HOUSTON. As I understand, the objection to the introduction of the bill which I before offered is withdrawn by the gentleman who made it, I now ask to introduce it, and that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is again made, and it is not in order to present the bill.

Mr. EDGERTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would suggest to the gentleman that we had better first dispose of the business upon the Speaker's table, which is of a private character.

Mr. EDGERTON. I withdraw my motion for the present.

The SPEAKER. The first business upon the Speaker's table is the bill which will now be reported by the Clerk.

The following bill was then read, by its title:

"A bill for the relief of Harriet Leavenworth, widow of the late Brevet General Leavenworth.

The SPEAKER. The question first recurs upon the demand for the previous question, which was made when the bill was last under consideration.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask that the bill may be read.

The bill was read in extenso.

It provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall place the name of said Harriet Leavenworth upon the pension roll at the rate of $30 per month, for the period of five years, from February 1, 1853.

The question recurring upon the demand for the previous question—

Mr. CAMPBELL demanded tellers, which were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and VAIL appointed.

The House was then divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 39.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The main question being upon ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time, it was put, and decided in the affirmative.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was taken, and the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question then being, "Shall the bill pass?" it was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The bill coming up next in order upon the Speaker's table was the bill for the relief of William B. Edwards. This bill provides for granting him a pension, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 1st day of January, 1854, and to continue during five years. The committee propose the following amendments to the bill: In line sixth to strike out the word "four," and in the seventh line to strike out the words "five years" and insert in lieu thereof the words "his natural life."

The several amendments were agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and having been engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The House next proceeded to consider the bill for the relief of Anthony G. Willis, deceased, with the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole House.

The bill was read through by the Clerk. It provides for the payment of $251 to the heirs of the late Anthony G. Willis, deceased, as compensation for the use of a wagon by the United States during the last war with Great Britain.

The amendment strikes out the words "heirs," and inserts the words "executors and administrators."

The question was put, and the amendment agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and having been engrossed, was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

The following Senate bills were next taken up in their order, severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred, as indicated below:

An act (No. 36) "for the relief of William Senna Factor." Referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

An act (No. 166) "to incorporate the Georgetown Gas-Light Company." Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

An act (No. 184) "for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth C. Smith, of Missouri." Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The business next in order is the call of committees for reports, beginning with the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House.

The question was put, and the motion agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, (Mr. Wright, of Pennsylvania, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the first business in order was the reconsideration of Senate bill (No. 2) "to indemnify the State of Indiana for the failure of title to a township of land granted to said State on her admission into the Union in 1816."

The Clerk read the bill.

It provides, that whereas, by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, made April 25, 1853, the State of Indiana has lost one of the two townships of land granted to her for the use of a State University, and has become liable to refund to a private corporation the proceeds of the sale of said lands, the Governor of said State is hereby authorized to select out of the lands of the United States within said State, subject to private entry, nineteen thousand and forty acres of land in legal subdivisions: Provided, That the proceeds of said lands when sold shall be, and forever remain, a fund for the use of the Indiana University.

The question now being on ordering the bill to be laid aside to be reported to the House, it was put, and the Chairman announced that it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MILLSON, (rising before the decision was announced.) I should like to have some information about this bill from my friend from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM.]

Mr. DUNHAM. I should be happy to make any explanation the gentleman desires, but the question having been decided, it is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The decision has been withdrawn, to allow the gentleman from Virginia to make a statement.

Mr. DUNHAM. I should like to know what power the Chair has to withdraw it?

The CHAIRMAN. The decision had not been announced at the time the gentleman from Virginia rose and addressed the Chair.

Mr. MILLSON. I am exceedingly reluctant to make opposition to a bill which my friend from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] seems to take great interest in, and I should not have done so but for the very peculiar circumstances in which I am placed. I beg leave briefly to recount those circumstances, that the House may see the very unwilling position in which I have been placed in reference to this bill.

On the third day of the present session of Congress, this bill, having been passed by the Senate, was brought to the House of Representatives, and my friend from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] desired that it should be put immediately upon its passage, stating that it was a bill which had passed both Houses of the last Congress, and had only failed to receive the Executive signature because of an accident of some sort, which, I believe, he did not explain, but which prevented the attention of the President from being called to it. At that time I knew nothing whatever of the bill. All that I did, when the effort was made to pass it without reference to the Committee of the Whole, or any one of the standing committees of the House, was to ask that it should be referred, being impressed with the mischiefs which resulted from this practice at the last Congress, and not having the least knowledge of the nature of the bill—not desirous to make any sort of opposition to the bill on its merits, but believing—

[Here a message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed bills of the following titles;

S. No. 44. "An act for the benefit of the heir-at-law of Lieutenant C. A. Wickliffe."

H. R. No. 200. "An act to confirm to Hercules L. Dousman his title to farm lot, No. 32, adjoining the town of Prairie du Chien, in the State of Wisconsin."

H. R. No. 197. "An act supplemental to an act entitled 'An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California,' approved, March 3, 1851."

Mr. MILLSON, (resuming.) I was observing, Mr. Chairman, that believing if the House could then be induced in a case seemingly so strong as that then presented to its consideration to refer this bill to one of the standing committees, or the Committee of the Whole House, that we should establish a precedent from which we should not be apt to depart; I urged its reference, and I did so the more readily because I believed, from the circumstance of this bill having passed both Houses at the Thirty-Second Congress, and its early introduction here at this, that it would be the first bill upon the Private Calendar, would be soon reached, and again passed. I felt that I was not subjecting my friend from Indiana to the risk of losing the bill by submitting the motion which I then made to refer it to the Committee of the Whole House. The bill having been referred, I intended to do nothing more. I did not direct my attention to the subject afterward until the period I am about to name.

My accidental connection with the bill in pressing its reference to a Committee of the Whole House, induced some gentleman, whom I must be excused from naming—a gentleman, doubtless, conversant with the whole subject—to inform me that there were objections to the bill, which he suggested that I should look into. Really, I have so much matter to attend to appertaining to the interests of my own constituents, that I have but little leisure to examine bills affecting other gentlemen, and other States; and I should not then have deemed it to be my duty to have looked into this question, but my friend from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] came and conversed with me on the subject, for the purpose of satisfying me that the bill had merits, and ought to pass—perhaps, unfortunately for him, for I might not myself have made any investigation of the point, but for the very views and documents to which he called my attention.

And I will now state, that I have never made any examination of the question, except from the papers that my friend from Indiana himself called to my attention. Yet, from these very papers, being persuaded that the bill ought not to pass, or if it pass at all that it ought not to pass in the form in which it has been now presented to the House, I deem it my duty—a duty which I discharge most reluctantly and unwillingly—to state to the committee some of the reasons which have operated on my own mind.

Mr. Chairman, the facts as I understand them, are these: Sometime in the year 1804, Congress reserved for the use of a seminary of learning, in the State of Indiana, or in the region of country which is now the State of Indiana, a whole township of land. If I misstate the facts, I desire that any gentleman who takes an interest in the passage of the bill, may correct me as I proceed. There were three townships of land reserved in three land districts—the district of Vincennes, the district of Kaskaskia, and the district of Detroit. These lands were reserved for the use of a seminary of learning, without specifying for what seminary of learning. Some two years afterwards the Legislature of Indiana chartered the Vincennes University, and it was held by the supreme court of that State, or rather by the Supreme Court of the United States, that that institution, under the act of the Senatorial Legislature of Indiana, was entitled to the benefit of the township reserved by the acts of 1804.

After Indiana became a State—or perhaps in the bill which authorized her admission as a State—Congress reserved for the use of a seminary of learning, and vested in the Legislature for that use, another township of land in addition to the one formerly reserved. You will observe, sir, that the act of 1816 did not grant to the State of Indiana two townships of land in addition to the one heretofore reserved. The State of Indiana afterwards, through her Legislature, granted these two townships—the one which had vested in the Vincennes University, and the one reserved by the act of 1816—to the Indiana State University. The Vincennes University, however, claimed the land as belonging to it, and instituted a suit, which is now pending in the supreme court of the State of Indiana, for the recovery of the township which was first reserved by the act of 1804. The supreme court of the State dismissed the bill brought by the Vincennes College or University. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and, by a majority of the Supreme Court, the decree of the supreme court of the State of Indiana was reversed, and the case was remanded to the supreme court of the State of Indiana for further proceedings.

It is in this state of things that the State of Indiana, or some of her Representatives here, apply to Congress to indemnify her for the loss of the township of land recovered by the Vincennes University from the Indiana State University.

And now, sir, the committee will perceive that several grave objections to the passage of this bill present themselves. In the first place, the land has not been lost to the State University. This bill assumes that the Vincennes University has recovered the land from the Indiana State University, and asks Congress to indemnify the State for the land so recovered by the Vincennes University. But, in point of fact, Mr. Chairman, that suit is now pending and undetermined. The supreme court of the State of Indiana has never yet even acted upon the defenses set up in the bill by the State University. The plea of the statute of limitation was insisted upon by the State University, and has never yet been decided. They rely also upon their long adverse possession—upon the lapse of time. However, the supreme court of the State of Indiana dismissed the bill without the consideration of those points of objection at all, upon the ground that the land never vested in the Vincennes University, and that it therefore had no right to sue.

That decision of the supreme court of Indiana, dismissing the bill, has been reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States. But in reversing that particular decision they have not put an end to the litigation. They did not adjudge the lands to the Vincennes University, but simply remanded the cause to the supreme court of the State of Indiana for further proceedings; and there is much reason to believe that, when that cause comes to be decided by the supreme court of the State of Indiana, upon the pleas in the record, they will hold that the lapse of time—the statute of limitations—will constitute a complete bar to the recovery of the land claimed by the Vincennes University.

Mr. DUNHAM, (interrupting.) As the gentleman seems to assert that opinion with great confidence, I should be glad to have him state the ground of it. I think I shall be able to show to the committee in five words that there is no ground whatever for it.

Mr. MILLSON. The grounds of that opinion are simply these: It is hardly to be supposed that a plea would be filed in any case, by learned counsel, insisting upon a lapse of time, and the statute of limitation, as a bar, unless they expected, or at least hoped, to succeed in establishing the plea. The grounds are that this lapse of time has actually occurred—that there is a period of time after which suits shall not be prosecuted. But whether the plea shall be successful or not, still the answer to the gentleman is, that the case is not decided. The defense has not been overruled, and the case now abides the decision of the court upon this very question of the statute of limitation, among other questions which have been presented by the defendants as a bar.

Mr. MACE. I wish to ask the gentleman a single question. The Supreme Court has decided that the property never vested in the State University, but that it vested in the Vincennes University at the time of the grant. Then if the State University took possession of it, was she not a trespasser, and could she then successfully set up the plea of the statute of limitations?

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman will perceive that he calls upon me to do here what it is the peculiar province of the supreme court of the State of Indiana to do; and that is, to decide upon the sufficiency of the plea of the statute of limitations. If the gentleman insists that I, as a lawyer, should pronounce an opinion upon this subject, I should require the evidence, and I should like to know the state of the pleadings. What I do mean to say now is, that this defense has been set up by the Indiana State University, that the case is still undecided, and that before Congress undertakes to indemnify the State of Indiana for the loss of this township of land, they had better wait until she loses it. Before we undertake to remunerate and return to the Indiana State University lands taken from them by a failure of title, we had better wait until a failure of title occurs, or shall be adjudged to have occurred. The preamble to this bill recites:

"Whereas, by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, made January 15, 1853, the State of Indiana has lost," speaking in the past tense—

"one out of two townships of land granted to her for the use of the State University, by the act of April, 1816, and has become liable to refund to private corporations the proceeds of said township," &c.

There are two mistakes in that recital. In the first place, the State of Indiana has not lost one of two townships. She may, for aught I know, at some future time, lose one of these two townships by a decision of her own supreme court; but I cannot now say that she has lost this township. It is rather premature to call upon us to indemnify her for a loss which she may never sustain, and which, if she ever does sustain, may then, but not till then, furnish the occasion for this call upon us for relief. That is the first error in the recital. The next is, that she has lost one of two townships of land granted to her for the use of the State University by the act of April, 1816. The mistake there is, that this preamble recites that two townships of land were granted to her by the act of April, 1816, when there was only one granted. This township was granted to her in addition to the one heretofore reserved. The act of 1816 makes no grant of more than one township, and the gentleman from Indiana will remember that this very question was before the Supreme Court, and decided in accordance with what I now say; for although it was argued before the Supreme Court that this act of 1816 granted two townships, the majority of the court decided that the act of 1816 granted but one township, and not the one which had been reserved in 1804.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I expect, as a matter of course, that the committee will hold their minds in abeyance until I shall be able to argue this case at length. Yet I desire the gentleman from Virginia, upon such points as he touches, to give the proper explanations as he passes along. I presume that the error which he seems to criticise is an error merely in language. I do not intend to assert that the decision of the Supreme Court gave two townships of land to Indiana, but what I do assert is, and which I think I will be able to show, that Congress, by the act of 1816, intended to grant them.

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to be interrupted now, and will very cheerfully submit to any future interruption from any gentleman from the State of Indiana who may desire to explain; and I shall be well pleased if any of those gentlemen can give such an explanation to the committee, or such an explanation to myself, as will incline me to vote for the passage of this bill. For I assure the gentleman that there are few persons here whom I should more desire to gratify, and for whose sake I should be more disposed to forbear opposition to any bill for which my conscience would allow me to vote, than my honorable friend on my right, [Mr. DUNHAM,] and therefore it is that I renew my invitation to him and to other gentlemen from Indiana to set me right whenever I may be wrong.

But the gentleman says that I am indulging in a mere verbal criticism upon the language of the preamble. Sir, the gentleman must come to the conclusion that there is something more than a mere verbal criticism involved in this point, when he remembers that it was a point carefully raised, deliberately considered, and expressly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. If this had been a mere question of verbal criticism, would it have been likely to have occupied so much of the attention of the Supreme Court of the United States?

They have then decided that but one of these townships was granted by the act of 1816, and not two townships, as the gentleman from Indiana now says was the case, or was intended to have been the case. The other township was reserved by the act of 1804, and came into possession of the Vincennes University, in consequence of the charter of that institution, in 1806. I say, then, that before we can be called upon to indemnify the State of Indiana, it must be shown that she has lost the lands.

But, sir, what I have said will suggest to the committee this obvious inquiry. Suppose the State, or rather the State University of Indiana, has lost the lands, what possible obligation can there be upon the part of the Government of the United States to remunerate her for the loss? It was the intention of Congress to grant to Indiana two townships of land for the use of these seminaries of learning, and I maintain that this intention has been carried into complete effect. The Vincennes University, one seminary of learning, has had, and if it recovers in this suit, will continue to receive, the benefit of one township under the act of 1804, and the Indiana State University, another seminary of learning, is now enjoying the benefit of the grant made by the act of Congress of 1816.

Sir, when did Congress ever pledge itself to grant these two townships of land to the Indiana State University? Why, sir, that institution was not in existence in 1804, when the reservation was first made. The Vincennes College was not even in existence at the time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will endeavor to show him what the law was which attempted to vest this land in the State of Indiana. Indiana does not claim that the land was vested in the State University, but she does claim that the land should have been vested in the State—not in any corporation, but in the State—and she claims it under the language of the statute which provided for her admission into the Union.

In 1816, Congress passed an act providing for the admission of Indiana into the Union. One of the clauses of that act is as follows:

"That one entire township, which shall be designated by the President of the United States, in addition to the one heretofore reserved for that purpose, shall be reserved for the use of a seminary of learning, and vested in the Legislature of said State, to be appropriated solely to the use of such seminary by the Legislature."

What sort of a grant, I ask the gentleman, as a lawyer, does that import? Is it a grant to the State of Indiana of one township, or of one township in addition to the one heretofore reserved? Those are the only conveying words in the statute, in my judgment.

The Supreme Court of the United States did not decide the question upon the ground that the gentleman has assumed. The Supreme Court did not decide that the language of this act did not import a grant. The Supreme Court held that it was a grant. But the General Government had previously, in 1804, granted away this land; so that when Congress attempted to grant this township to Indiana in 1816 it could not convey it, for the reason that it had been conveyed before that to the Territory of Indiana, and had passed to a private institution. I think that no gentleman who reads this act can doubt that Indiana has a claim to two townships under the language here used: "That one entire township, in addition to the one heretofore reserved, shall be vested in the State of Indiana." It was not vested in the State of Indiana, because the Government at that time had no title to vest, and that is the ground of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. If the General Government had had a title to the land in 1816, this grant would have been sufficient; but because of a defect in the title of the Government, it did not vest in the State.

I will say, further, to the gentleman from Virginia that this is not a controversy between two seminaries of learning. It is a controversy between the State of Indiana, which claims both of these townships, to be used by her according to the sovereign will of the State, and a private and sectarian institution. Indiana desires that this land shall be used for the benefit of the State institution—an institution to which all the young men of the State can go. It is not a sectarian institution. It is one that was established by the State, and endowed, as we had supposed, by the moneys received from the sale of this very land. Another seminary of learning, which belongs to one of the religious sects of the State, holds it under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. DUNHAM. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state, in addition to what he has said, that when this township was taken possession of by the sectarian school, parts of Illinois, Michigan, and Ohio were interested in it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It was not a grant, although the Supreme Court of the United States held it in connection with the subsequent act of the Territorial Legislature, to amount to a grant. The language of the act of Congress did not make it a grant; but it reserved the township for the benefit of the seminary of learning. In 1816, Congress supposed that that land was still under its control, and that it could convey it to the State of Indiana. It was not undeceived in reference to the matter until the Supreme Court of the United States otherwise decided last year.

Mr. MILLSON. I submit that what the gentleman from Indiana has said is not in correction of anything which I have stated to the committee. So far from it, I have used the very words which the gentleman himself has employed. I used the very language of the act of 1816, reserving a township for the use of a seminary of learning in addition to the one heretofore reserved. Now, it seems the question is one simply of construction, whether the language of the act imported a grant of two townships or of one. All I have to say on that subject is, that what the gentleman has just said in support of this construction might have been very well said, and doubtless was very well said, to the Supreme Court of the United States when it had that very question before it. But the Supreme Court of the United States decided that it was a grant of only one township; that the act of 1804 reserved the other township; and that the act of 1816 did not, in itself, import a grant of two distinct townships to the State of Indiana. I still think, notwithstanding the gentleman from Indiana supposes I am mistaken in reference to the opinion of the Supreme Court, that I am correct in attributing to that decision the meaning which I have given it. I find full authority for the statement I made in the following marginal note in the report of this case:

"In 1804, Congress passed an act, making provision for the disposal of the public lands in the Indiana Territory, in which it reserved from sale a township in each one of three districts, to be located by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the use of a seminary of learning."

"The language of the act of Congress, by which Indiana was admitted into the Union, did not vest the above township in the Legislature of the State."

Here the question was made, and distinctly decided by the Supreme Court, that the act admitting Indiana into the Union did not vest in the Legislature of the State the township reserved by the act of 1804.

Mr. DUNHAM. I will ask the gentleman, as a lawyer, whether that decision does or could go further? By that act, Congress could not vest the land in the State of Indiana, because it had previously granted it elsewhere. The decision of the Supreme Court goes no further. It does not go to the question, as my colleague [Mr. HENDRICKS] has well said, that Congress did not intend to vest the two townships in the State of Indiana.

Mr. MILLSON. It is sufficient for me to show what the court decided. I am under no obligations to give the reasons for its decision. If the gentleman calls on me, as a lawyer, to say why it so decided, I think I may content myself by saying what the decision was, and leaving to the gentleman to infer the reasons which probably governed the court.

But as he asks me for these reasons, I will gratify him, by reading an extract from the opinion of the court, as pronounced by Judge McLean. He says:

"The words of the act seem to be so clear as to admit of but one construction. A township, in addition to the one formerly reserved, is appropriated, and vested in the Legislature. The first township is only referred to to show that the one then appropriated was in addition to it. The Gibson township had before been appropriated. A part of it had been sold, and a part held under leases. Whether we regard the words used, or their grammatical arrangement the intention of Congress seems to be clearly expressed."

Now, sir, I refer to this for the purpose of replying to the inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] as to the reason why the court so decided.

Mr. DUNHAM. I did not ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] for the reasons for the decision of the court. I simply said that the decision showed that this act could not have made the grant, because the grant had been previously made.

Mr. MILLSON. Precisely. That is what I am myself showing—that the grant of the first township had been previously made. Now, Mr. Chairman, in relation to this other matter, as to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] rose to correct me, namely: that Indiana was not a State at the time of the reservation of 1804, and that other portions of the country were then embraced within the Territory of Indiana. The gentleman will do me the justice to recollect that I stated that the land was reserved in three land districts, the districts of Kaskaskia, Vincennes, and Detroit. And if any of the Representatives of that section of the country participated with Indiana in the legislation by which this township was granted for the benefit of the Vincennes College, why, so much the better for the State. For it appears that though Delegates, representing portions of the territory now included in Illinois and Michigan, actually voted with the Delegates of Indiana, yet Indiana, or what is now Indiana, got the benefit of the act of 1804.

Sir, I have said that this reservation was made for the benefit of a seminary of learning. Two seminaries of learning have received all the benefit of those grants which was intended by Congress to be secured to the people of Indiana. Congress never intended that the Vincennes University, or the State University, or that any particular seminary of learning, should derive the benefits of this grant. It seems to me, then, that so long as the State of Indiana has secured the full benefit intended to be granted by this act of 1804, and by the act of 1816—so long as two seminaries of learning, no matter which, have the possession and engagement of these two townships of land—it is, sir, a matter of comparatively little importance to us that the State University has, or has not, received what the State Legislature may have intended to secure to it. What Congress intended to do has already been done. We have nothing to do with the controversies between the two Universities which have grown out of the legislation of Indiana herself.

I do not think it necessary, Mr. Chairman, to prolong my remarks. The amendment which I propose to offer to the bill—though I am bound, in candor, to say, that even if it should be adopted it will not remove my objections to the passage of the bill—the amendment, I say, which I propose to offer, and which I have not yet drawn up, will provide that nothing in this act contained shall be construed to vest anything in the State of Indiana, in the event that the suit now pending before the supreme court of that State shall be determined in favor of the Indiana State University.

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not propose to detain this committee long, but I feel it absolutely necessary to present this case fairly before them, and I think, when the history of this whole matter is fairly and properly brought before them, no doubt will be entertained of the justness of the proposition here presented.

Allow me to state, in the first place, that the very existence of one of the finest institutions of learning in the whole western country, in my opinion, is involved in the decision we this day make upon this bill—an institution of learning which has been built up upon the beneficent grant which Congress made to the State of Indiana in 1816; a grant which has been managed with so much liberality and faithfulness by that State, I am proud to say, as to diffuse its benefits and blessings most generally throughout not only her own extensive domain, but also throughout that whole western country over which her emigration rolls its ceaseless tide.

The institution endowed by this land is a State University, entirely separate and distinct from all sectarian influence, and based upon the broad principle of republicanism. It belongs to, and is under the exclusive control of the State. She has got together a corps of professors unsurpassed by that of any other institution of learning, and provision is made for the gratuitous education of the students from each county in the State, thereby extending the means of a liberal education to two young men from each county, who would not otherwise, perhaps, be able to obtain it. It affords facilities for education, not only in the usual studies pursued in colleges, but also in all those branches of knowledge, which enter into all the walks of life, and in all the industrial pursuits of the State. We have there a professor who instructs in those sciences particularly useful to agricultural pursuits. Provision is also made for the instruction of common school teachers, who are afterwards scattered all over the State, and disseminate among the masses of the people, the benefits which they have derived from that institution.

I have made these remarks, not that they bear directly upon the question at issue, but because I thought that this state of things should at least predispose you to a favorable consideration of this application; and if, with these impressions upon your minds, I can show that we have a reasonable ground for this additional grant, there will not be a single member upon this committee who will hesitate a moment to make it.

I will now proceed to give you the facts upon which we predicate this application. In 1804, there were organized, in what was then the Indiana Territory, (comprising a part of Ohio, all of Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois, to which the Indian title was extinguished,) three land districts, Kaskaskia, Detroit, and Vincennes. The Vincennes district embraced a portion of the present State of Illinois, as well as Indiana. In organizing these land districts, and providing for the sale of the lands therein, one entire township of land in each was reserved for the use of a seminary of learning. I have only to do with the one reserved in the Vincennes district. It was given to no university or institution; indeed, no such institution whatever was then in existence within that district. It was simply reserved from sale, as we insist, and as Congress, more than forty years afterwards, by its action admitted, subject to the future control and action of this Government, to be bestowed as to it might seem proper and right.

Afterwards, in 1806, the Territorial Legislature of Indiana, embracing a part of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, as before stated, incorporated the Vincennes University as a private institution, and, as my colleague has very properly remarked, a sectarian institution. That Legislature could not grant the land to that institution, because they had no power to do so. The land had not been granted to the Territory, nor no control of it given to it. This private corporation without any authority from Congress, except simply the fact that the township of land had been reserved within the Vincennes land district for the use of a seminary of learning, and because it happened to be the first seminary of learning organized within the Territory, took possession of this land as if it had been expressly granted to it. This is all the title that corporation had to the land, and I must say—and I speak with all due deference—the decision of the Supreme Court deciding that to be a sufficient title, is a very singular one—

Mr. ORR. Was it unanimous?

Mr. DUNHAM. No. There were seven judges upon the bench, three of whom dissented. At the head of those dissenting, was that man venerable for his age, and alike distinguished for his talents and his learning, whose mind illumines every subject he discusses—I mean Chief Justice Taney. Any lawyer who will read his dissenting opinion, as reported in Howard, can, it seems to me, have no doubt as to the merits of this case. It is clear, lucid, and logical, and it seems to me, that no man can read it and have a doubt as to what was the intention of Congress by the reservation in the act of 1804. But I go on with the history of this case. That is the only ground upon which the Vincennes University undertook to appropriate those lands. This corporation sold a portion of this reserved township, probably about two thousand three hundred acres, and put up a college building.

In 1816 Indiana was admitted as a State into the Union upon certain conditions. Certain things were to be done on one side, in return for which certain other things were to be left undone upon the other. In other words, there was a contract between the General Government and the State of Indiana, upon which she came into the Union. The part of that contract which devolved upon the State to perform, she religiously obeyed. You required, or prohibit her, by the terms upon which she was admitted into the Union, from laying taxes upon the lands within her borders which the United States then held, or which had then been sold by the Government, until after they had been sold five years. If the State, from the organization of her government, had been allowed to levy taxes upon those lands, as she otherwise would have taxed them, in the lands held by her own citizens, she would have realized therefrom, probably, at least, half a million of revenue. By this relinquishment alone she has dearly paid for all the grants she has had from this Government. Among other things to be done by the United States, the sixteenth section in every township was granted for the use of common schools in such township, and I believe that every township in the State has got it, except this very township in controversy; and I trust that a section will be granted to it before we adjourn.

Another of the conditions upon which that State came into the Union was, as I shall now attempt to show, that two entire townships of land were to be granted to her for the endowment of a State University. Observe the language used:

"That one entire township of land, which shall be designated by the President of the United States, in addition to one heretofore reserved (not granted) for that purpose, shall be reserved for the use of a seminary of learning, and vested in the Legislature of the State, to be appropriated solely to the use of such seminary by said Legislature."

You will find the statute in the third volume of the Laws, on the 290th page. I do think it very apparent that Congress supposed that the first township reserved had never before been granted or appropriated, and, by the act just recited, made a grant of both townships to the State for the use of a State university.

Now, sir, I will strengthen this position by another fact. No other State created out of the Northwest Territory has been admitted into the Union, to which two entire townships have not been granted to such State for the endowment of a State university. When the State of Ohio came into the Union, two townships of land were reserved for the benefit of a university of learning in that State. The same provision was made when Illinois came into the Union as a State; the same in reference to Iowa, and so with reference to every State which has been created out of that Northwest Territory. Now, I ask if this fact is not a veritable confirmation of the position I have assumed, that Congress intended to grant two townships of land to the State of Indiana for the benefit of this university.

I will also state another fact in confirmation of the same position. In passing over the history of this matter, I noticed that the Vincennes University sold a portion of the township reserved under the act of 1804, for the purpose of constructing a college building, &c. This sale was afterwards confirmed by Congress in 1849, I think. After a full consideration of the subject, Congress passed another act, granting to the State for the use of this State University, precisely the number of acres which had been sold by the Vincennes University out of that township without authority, but the title to which Congress had confirmed, showing that Congress then put the same construction upon the act of 1816 which I have put upon it, viz: that both townships were granted to the State for a State institution.

Now then, let me give another reason for the position I have assumed to be correct. The history of this matter shows that at the time of the passage of the act of 1816, the State of Indiana put the same construction upon the act which I have put upon it, and not only that, but the Vincennes University so understood it, and that corporation, in consequence, soon after became dissolved. They gave up the remaining lands in the township, unsold to the State, and under the direction of the State it was sold out for the purpose of endowing the State University, and that University has now for a period of about thirty years been enjoying the benefit of that endowment. Here then is the action of Congress; here is the contemporaneous action of the Legislature of Indiana, and moreover here is the action of this very Vincennes University itself, all showing that the act of 1816 intended, and was understood, to grant both townships to the State for the use of a State institution.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] says Congress did not grant this land to the State, because the Supreme Court of the United States has so decided. That may be; but because the Court decided that Congress, by that act, did not grant it, it does not follow that Congress did not intend to grant it, and did not attempt to do so. Here is the very gist of our case: Congress intended to grant, and undertook to grant it, but failed to do so, because she had before that granted it to another and distinct party. Congress did not, and could not grant it to the State, simply because it had itself no title. It should now make good the intention and undertaking, by giving us an equal amount out of what does belong to it.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana if the Vincennes University ever received any land from Congress, except that reserved by the act of 1804?

Mr. DUNHAM. Suppose I answer, as I should, that it did not, what follows?

Mr. MILLSON. Then I ask this question: If Congress has not heretofore recognized the right of the Vincennes University to the land granted by the act of 1804?

Mr. DUNHAM. If so, I do not know in what.

Mr. MILLSON. I ask further, if Congress did not, in 1807, pass a law confirming the titles of various persons to lands claimed under the Vincennes University?

Mr. DUNHAM. Precisely; and that proves just the reverse of the gentleman's position; because the very fact that Congress felt it necessary to confirm those titles which individuals had obtained from the Vincennes University, shows that Congress did not consider that they had got good titles from that corporation, that, having no title itself, it could make none to its vendees.

I repeat, again, so that everybody may understand, that the Vincennes University took possession of these lands, and sold about twenty-three hundred acres to private individuals.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Four thousand acres. Mr. DUNHAM. Well, no matter about the amount. I think it was two thousand three hundred acres. In 1807, Congress confirmed the titles of the individuals to whom those lands were sold, showing that Congress did not understand that any grant had been made to the Vincennes University, or that that University had any power to sell or convey them.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My colleague is mistaken about one fact. The Vincennes University sold four thousand acres of the land, leaving nineteen thousand acres that were not sold. Congress afterwards confirmed the titles of the men who bought those four thousand acres from the Vincennes University, thus indicating that the title given by the University was not a good title of itself. Afterwards, from 1822 up, the State of Indiana, by virtue of State legislation, sold the remainder of the township, placed the money derived from the sales in the State treasury, and used the interest of the money for the benefit of the State institution. The Vincennes University brought this suit to recover that money, and the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the Vincennes University can take that money from the State of Indiana and the State institution.

Mr. DUNHAM. I was mistaken simply as to the amount of land sold, and not as to the fact that Congress, by thus confirming the titles of the purchasers, evidently gave its opinion that this land did not belong to the Vincennes University.

Mr. MILLSON. Not necessarily.

Mr. DUNHAM. Well, I should like to know if the gentleman thinks that Congress would confirm a title which they thought good? Would the purchasers come here and ask a confirmation of a title that they had no doubt about? The citizens of Indiana, who have bought land from the General Government, never come here to ask Congress to confirm their titles, because they rely upon those titles, and feel that they are good and safe.

But, to proceed with the facts of the case: After the State of Indiana came into the Union, the corporation of the Vincennes University became disorganized; and from that time until it was revived, many years afterwards, for the purpose of bringing this suit, it had no actual existence whatever; to this day, as I understand, there is no school organized under that corporation. The reorganization of the corporation was for no other purpose in the world than to endeavor to filch from the State of Indiana the land which its University had been enjoying for so long a time for the benefit of those interested in that corporation.

Mr. CRAIGE. Where is the University?

Mr. DUNHAM. It is within the limits of Indiana.

Mr. CRAIGE. Has there been any act of Congress by which that State can be deprived of the land?

Mr. DUNHAM. If the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and the gentleman be right, there has been an act of Congress by which they have been deprived of it. The intention of Congress in making the grant to Indiana for the establishment of a State University is no more carried out than if that institution stood on the other side of the Wabash river, in the State of Illinois. It was organized for the land district embracing a portion of Illinois and a portion of Michigan, as well as Indiana.

A private corporation, over which Indiana has no control, and which, I again say, is only nominally in existence, and has not been since that State took possession of this land for the endowment of the State University. A few years since this Vincennes University revived its corporate powers. The purpose for which this was done was not known for some time later still, when it brought suits against the persons to whom the State had sold the land contained in this township to dispossess them. I want to call particular attention to this matter, for here is involved the question of the statute of limitations, which my friend talks so much about, and which is the only thing now left for the defense of this suit. Suits were brought against the persons to whom I have referred before the statute of limitations obtained. Therefore the individual purchasers, to whom the State of Indiana was bound to make good their titles, could not have set up that as a defense against the suit brought against them.

In 1846 or 1847, I do not remember which, but it does not matter, the State of Indiana, for the purpose of securing the citizens who had purchased these lands, proposed to the Vincennes University, that if it would dismiss the suit against the individuals, it should have authority to bring suit against the State, so that the title to the land might be tested. It was her duty to do so. Now, I submit to any lawyer upon this floor, of what value the statute of limitation is under such circumstances? The statute of limitation had not run when suit was brought against those individuals. The State of Indiana stepped in and took the position of those individuals, and had the onus of the suit transferred from them to herself. Is there any lawyer on this floor who will say that the State of Indiana stood in any better position, and can avail herself of the statute of limitations any more than the individuals whom she relieved? Most assuredly not; and so little was thought of that defense, that it was scarcely mooted in the courts below, and no allusion was made to it whatever in the supreme court of the State, or the Supreme Court of the United States.

A MEMBER. It never came to the point.

Mr. DUNHAM. It never came to the point in the Supreme Court of the United States. In the court below all the questions were litigated. If gentlemen will look at the plea itself, as put in by the counsel, and see the negligent manner in which it was drawn, they will judge at once that no particular reliance was placed upon it whatever.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] seems to think that the claim of the Vincennes University must be barred by the statute of limitations, or else such a plea would not have been pleaded. That is a novel reason truly. It would be rather a violent presumption, I should think, to presume that everything asserted in a plea must be true. My experience is, that things are often set up by the pleadings in a case that nobody dreams can be established by the proofs.

Then there is the other point, so successfully made by my colleague from the eighth district. It is this: If there were no grant of this land to the State of Indiana by the act of 1816, then the State of Indiana took possession of it without even the color of title, and the citizens deriving from her are in possession without any title whatever. If this law did not grant a shadow of title, then those persons who hold under it are mere trespassers; and will the gentleman undertake to say that a mere trespasser upon lands can successfully plead the statute of limitations against the legal owner? Is there a lawyer on this floor who would entertain a doubt upon it for one moment? But I think I can elucidate that matter so that everybody can appreciate the propriety of falling back upon that plea, however frivolous it may appear, and asking for the passage of this bill before the final decision of the case.

This University is a flourishing and prosperous institution. The youth of our citizens all over the State have there facilities for education. If these funds are withdrawn before the deficiency is made up from some other source, the institution must be suspended, and its usefulness, for the time being at least, destroyed, however much we might make up this deficiency afterwards. And from this point I come to look at the gentleman's amendment. The true policy of the State University, therefore, was to endeavor, by some plan, to keep the case from a final adverse decision until the State, through her Representatives, should come here and appeal to you for justice, and ask you to endow and maintain this institution as it was intended that it should have been endowed and maintained when the original grant was made; that the fund which it now enjoys might not be impaired; that its corps of professors might not be broken up, and that the institution might not be disorganized. With a view to this the plea of the statute of limitations has been relied upon. Does anybody see in this anything dishonest? Is there anybody who sees in it anything doubtful? Is there anybody who will not say that this was a correct and very proper line of policy to be pursued on the part of the friends of this University? This bill, if now passed as it is, will enable the institution to maintain its position and its usefulness.

A MEMBER. It will give the University a degree of credit.

Mr. DUNHAM. Yes, sir; it would give it public credit, or rather, it would sustain the credit it already has. Adopt the gentleman's amendment, and the whole object and benefit of the policy which has been pursued will be defeated. And a word as to that amendment.

Mr. MILLSON. I had not prepared the amendment when I stated to the committee the scope of it; but I have since drawn up the amendment, so that the gentleman [Mr. DUNHAM] might have an opportunity of speaking to it. The amendment, Mr. Chairman, is as follows:

Provided nevertheless, That this act shall not take effect until the suit now pending in the supreme court of Indiana, by the trustees of the Vincennes University against the State of Indiana, be finally determined; and unless the decision of the said suit shall be in favor of the plaintiffs, and shall deprive the said State, or those claiming under her, of the township which is the subject matter of the suit.

Mr. DUNHAM. Since I have had the honor of a seat in this body, now going on five years, I have seldom, if ever, asked anything for the local interests of my district. I come here now because I feel the justness of the claim which I have presented, and because I am impressed with the usefulness of the Institution, which I desire to perpetuate. I hope, therefore, I may ask for this your liberal consideration.

Sir, if the amendment of the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] is adopted, what will be the result? The very object, I repeat, sought to be accomplished by the policy I have referred to will be defeated. If you have any doubt as to how the question of the statute of limitation will be decided, then adopt the gentleman's amendment. But is there any doubt of it? The facts you have before you, and you can judge for yourselves. Can you see anything to hang even a doubt upon, suppose the amendment is adopted? The case cannot be submitted to the court until spring, and it will then be a year, or a year and a half, before a decision will be rendered, however plain the case, because the court is behind in its business; and the case cannot be reached in its turn, and it will not be taken up out of it.

We ask this land to be granted within our own State. We do not seek to go out of it. We are willing, although at this late day, with none but refuse lands left unsold within our borders; we are, I say, willing to take this deficiency within the State of Indiana; there being scarcely any available lands remaining, even of an inferior character. Before this case can be decided they will all be absorbed, and I would not give a rush for the grant you make us by this bill, with the amendment. You give us but the mockery of a grant—a relief which is no relief. By the time this grant could be made available, under such an amendment, there would be none left, and we would feel—the University would feel—and the State would feel, that they must give up the fight, and that this institution of learning, of which we are so justly proud—whose rays have illumined so large a district of country—must go to decay. It would wither under the very uncertainty of such procrastination.

Mr. ORR. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman. I do not perceive the force of the gentleman's reasoning, in reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON.] How long will it be before the suit can be terminated?

Mr. DUNHAM. From one to two years.

Mr. ORR. Why?

Mr. DUNHAM. Because, as I have before stated, after the case is submitted, which will not be until spring, on account of the immense business before the court, it must necessarily be a long time before it can be reached in its order for decision. By the time the decision can be had I would not give a rush for the grant under this bill with such an amendment. I state it as a fact, well known by every one of my colleagues, that there are now left unsold within our State no good lands; they are all taken up—the refuse only left. Railroads are penetrating—as you will see, by a reference to the map—every part of the State, and wherever these railroads go every acre of land, at all available, is at once absorbed.

Mr. ORR. Suppose, when this case comes to be tried by the supreme court of Indiana, that the decision should be adverse to the claim of the Vincennes University. How, then, is Congress to repair the injury it has done by granting to Indiana three townships for the State University, when it was her intention to grant only two?

Mr. DUNHAM. Can the gentleman, whom I know to be a good lawyer—can anybody—with the facts before them, doubt as to what the decision must be?

Mr. PECKHAM. If the amendment prevails, who is to carry on the suit on both sides?

Mr. DUNHAM. That is a very pertinent inquiry. Nobody will be interested in doing so. The University will not want to draw upon its funds to maintain a suit when she has nothing to gain; for if the decision is in its favor she only retains what she now has; she gains nothing. If it is against it, she will have the present grant. The State will have no interest in doing so, nothing to gain by it, but directly the reverse.

Mr. MILLSON. I was aware of that when I submitted the amendment I did, but I thought that I could repose confidence in the Indiana judiciary.

Mr. DUNHAM. I repose great confidence in the decisions of the judiciary of Virginia. Decisions have been made in Virginia, however, in favor of claims to be paid out of the general Treasury, which, upon close examination, might have been decided otherwise. Any man who knows anything of public business must at once concede that, in a suit where everybody is to gain by a decision in one way, and to lose by a decision upon the other, that there will not be a very hard fight. I trust, however, that, under any circumstances, Indiana will do her duty.

Mr. BISSELL. Although I am not at all satisfied that this case has real merits, such as ought to secure it a passage through this House, yet I can hardly forbear remarking that it is brought here rather prematurely. I think that after this pending lawsuit shall have been terminated in some way, or in some form, then will be the time for the injured party to come here for redress. The case being such as the gentleman from Indiana states it—with all candor, I have no doubt—the lawsuit should have been dismissed. I should have been pleased to vote for the bill; but with the lawsuit pending, the thing is an anomalous one, and I cannot do so without it is amended. The matter is pending here at the same time that it is pending in court, and we are called upon to decide upon the question when it is still uncertain whether, by the existing act, the State will not get the land.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment?

Mr. BISSELL. yielded the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The gentleman from Illinois says the suit ought to have been dismissed. Does the gentleman not know that the State of Indiana has no power to dismiss the suit?

Mr. BISSELL. I supposed the gentleman must have understood my meaning. I say the suit ought to have been determined or decided in some way.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will inform the committee how the case now stands. It has been decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, and the decision sent down to the supreme court of Indiana. In my judgment, the supreme court of Indiana has nothing to do but to enter and carry out the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States; but nothing can be done in the matter until the case is reached in its regular order upon the docket.

Mr. BISSELL. As I remarked before, I do not pretend to say how the case ought to have been got rid of, but I do say that it ought to have been disposed of in some form before the application was made here for the grant of another township of land.

Mr. DUNHAM. I look with great confidence to the judgment of the gentleman from Illinois in this matter, because I know he is perfectly aware of the rapid manner in which lands in his own State, as well as my own, have been disposed of; and because I know he is aware of the limited quantity which now remains unsold; and I submit it to his judgment to say whether, if we were to wait until this case could be decided in the supreme court of Indiana, the grant would be worth having? and particularly when, as is very well known, if this fund were to be withdrawn from the State University, it would at once become insolvent?

Mr. BISSELL. I admit that the case made out by the gentleman appeals very strongly to my feelings; and if the bill can be put in a shape to obviate the objection I have raised, I should very cheerfully vote for it, although I have very great doubts as to its merits; but I have every disposition to be very liberal in such cases. Therefore, if the House will adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] the bill shall have my support; but without some such provision, I think the gentleman ought not to ask us to vote for the bill.

We know—we all know the uncertainty there is in the issue of a lawsuit; and, although it may be very plain to the gentleman now as he sees the case, that the suit will be decided adversely to the State, yet it would not be a strange matter at all if it should turn out entirely different; for, as I have already said, there is nothing more uncertain than the issue of a lawsuit. I think, therefore, that it will be proper for the House to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, which will secure the rights of the Government in case the decision of the courts should be different from what the gentleman now expects. There are so many interests involved in this matter, of so general a nature to the people of Indiana, that, perhaps, after all, some arrangement can be made by which the case can be disposed of out of this Hall.

Mr. DUNHAM. It can only be settled by the other party withdrawing the suit.

Mr. BISSELL. Well, then, perhaps the other parties will withdraw the suit.

Mr. DUNHAM. There is certainly no prospect of it.

Mr. ORR. I have been very strongly inclined to vote for the bill which has been advocated with so much zeal and ability by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] and I am still inclined to vote for it, with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON,] I confess that I am not able to see how the effect of that amendment will be such as my honorable friend from New York, sitting near me, [Mr. PECKHAM,] seems to suppose; that, if the donation is made to depend upon the decision of the courts in the case now pending, the parties may not act in good faith. I am not disposed to think that the Indiana State University will attempt, by any collusion, to obtain more from Congress than it is legitimately entitled to. I take it for granted that they will, in good faith, see that the suit is determined according to law, and that they will leave no step not taken to see that it is decided favorably to the interest of the State.

Mr. PECKHAM. Suppose the amendment be adopted, and the bill passed, who is to pay the expenses of carrying on the lawsuit?

Mr. ORR. Counsel have already been employed by both these parties—by the Vincennes University, and by the State of Indiana. Those counsel have carried the case through the State courts of Indiana, and afterwards to the Supreme Court of the United States; and it has now gone back to the supreme court of the State of Indiana. I suppose that very little additional expense will be devolved upon either the State or the Vincennes Institute, and I should presume, at least, that they would practice sufficient good faith not to collude together for the purpose of defrauding Congress. There is a strong equity—

Mr. HENDRICKS (interposing.) I will suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina why Indiana would not collude for any such purpose. She has now to take refuse land—land that is not worth, perhaps, fifty or seventy-five cents per acre, instead of the best land there was in Indiana. The township which Congress had given, as Indiana supposed, was of the very first quality, and brought the highest price in the market.

Mr. ORR. Well, then, the State of Indiana would not consent to any collusion, because it is to her interest to retain the township already granted. Now, as to the objection made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] against the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, operating as a postponement of this case, all I can say is, that if the State of Indiana permits the docket of her court to be encumbered by cases so that justice cannot be reached within a period of two years after a case has been appealed upon, I do not know that it is in the power or duty of Congress to afford her any redress. In passing this bill, if we pass it all, we should take care to put such guards in it that Congress may not give more to Indiana than is intended.

I take it that there is a strong equity in favor of the passage of the bill. I do not know but what, in strict law, it ought to be passed. It was the intention of Congress in 1816, when the State of Indiana was admitted into the Union, to grant to that State two townships of land, for the purpose of endowing a State University. That is very clear, as shown by the reading of the act, and by similar legislation extended to all the other States having land on their admission. Immediately after the State was admitted into the Union, they proceeded to institute a State University, and applied these townships for its endowment.

The first township was reserved in 1804, and the second was granted to the State in 1816, and the act contemplated, as its phraseology indicates, the granting of the first township, which had been previously reserved merely from sale. The first was a reservation, not a grant or donation, and I think the Supreme Court of the United States ought so to have decided. Such decision would have been in conformity with the intention of Congress, as exemplified in all its acts upon this subject. Well, when the State organized its University, understanding that Congress had, by the act of 1816, granted the two townships, it took possession of both townships, and claimed the title to the same, although the trustees of the Vincennes Institute had, some years before, claimed the first township reserve in 1804, and had long before that proceeded to sell some three or four thousand acres of that township. Here, then, was a conflict as to the lands in the first township between the State University and the Vincennes Institute; but when the claim was made formally by the State, the trustees of the Vincennes University stood by, and did not contest it. They surrendered all right and title to the land to the authorities of the State of Maryland. Upon that action of the trustees of the Vincennes University, surrendering any claim, at least by implication, they might have had, the State proceeded to sell the land, and to invest the proceeds of the sale for the benefit of the State University. These events occurred sometime about 1820.

In 1845, or thereabout, sixteen or eighteen years after the State had thus taken possession of the land, some lawyer, no doubt, in rummaging over the dusty records of the Vincennes Institute, advised the trustees of that defunct institution that if they would sue the holders of the land—those then in possession of it, by virtue of the sale made by the State of Indiana, for the benefit of the State University—it could be recovered for the benefit of the Vincennes University. Hence actions were brought against those parties, and the State of Indiana, to protect her citizens to whom she had granted titles of the land, passed a law, saying to the trustees of the Vincennes University, If you will withdraw your actions against our citizens we will authorize you to bring action against the State, and this question of titles can be determined. If you have the legal title we will account to you for the proceeds of the sale we have heretofore made. This proposition was made by the State of Indiana, and accepted by the trustees of the Vincennes Institute. The action was brought, and it was decided in the supreme court of Indiana in favor of the State University. It was then carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there decided in favor of the Vincennes University. It was decided that the reservation of a township, in 1804, was a donation, and not a reservation; the effect of which decision was to declare that the act of 1818, which purported to grant two townships, only granted one, and that the former township disposed of by the Territorial Government had been vested long before the passage of the act of 1818—or, in other words, that Congress could not, as intended, grant the township reserved in 1804; and hence the act of 1818 was defeated, Congress having no authority to grant what had previously been referred. There was but a bare majority of the Court in favor of the decision. The dissenting opinion was written by Chief Justice Taney, and concurred in by Judge Catron, and, I think, by Judge Daniel. The Court was divided four to three. As a legal proposition, I think that the dissenting opinion was right. I may be wrong in that; and for that reason I believe that we should pass this bill, and carry out the intention of Congress, by granting to the State of Indiana two townships of land, within her limits, for a State University. We should do it in such a way, and with such guards, as to prevent our giving one township more than we intend to give. For that reason I think the gentleman's amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. MILLSON. With the gentleman's permission, I will correct him there. The gentleman says that we ought to carry out the obvious intention of Congress, and secure these two townships for the benefit of the Indiana State University. It was never the intention of Congress to secure any of this land to the State University.

Mr. ORR. It was granted to the State of Indiana for a State Seminary. I think that is the language.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The precise language was, "for a seminary of learning under her control."

Mr. ORR. The Vincennes Institute was never organized by the Legislature of Indiana at all. It was organized under the territorial government. The State Legislature of Indiana never sanctioned or approved of it in one way or the other; and if you do not make this donation, the effect will be that the sales which Indiana has made, and the funds she has already invested for the benefit of this University of hers, will have to be withdrawn, and the University left in a crippled and perhaps decaying condition. Now, the difficulty grew up, I have no doubt, in consequence of the careless and loose phraseology of the act of 1816. I think Congress may well carry out the purpose originally intended for the benefit of the State institution. It is true that the effect is to give Indiana three townships of land instead of two—not to the State, but two to the State and one to the citizens, who, by some legerdemain, have secured one of these townships by the decision of the court. I think the decision in the supreme court of Indiana, pursuing the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, will be adverse to the claim of the State of Indiana, and she will lose the land.

The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] ought to be adopted to prevent our giving too much; and if Indiana chooses to incur her dockets, as I said at the outset of my remarks, with cases two or three years in advance, let the responsibility rest on her, and not on Congress.

Mr. ENGLISH. As one member of the Indiana delegation, I should have no objection to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] provided that he will allow it to be modified in one respect; and I think when I make the suggestion, that it will meet with the concurrence of the committee as well as the gentleman himself. The bill provides that the land to be selected under this grant shall be taken from any unentered lands within the State of Indiana. The amendment proposes, before the selection shall be made, that a certain suit shall be decided, which is now pending in the supreme court of that State. The difficulty is this: Before the case can be reached on the calendar, and decided by the court, all the unentered land now remaining in the State will have been absorbed by private entry, and no land will be left. Therefore, if the gentleman will allow his amendment to be modified, so as to allow of entry upon the unentered land of the United States generally, I will agree to the amendment, for one, and would be glad to see it adopted. I would submit that amendment.

Mr. BISSELL. I am opposed to this amendment for various reasons, which I do not care now to present. I only rise for the purpose of making a friendly suggestion to the friends of this bill, which is, that they shall provide by an amendment that Indiana shall have the privilege of immediately selecting these lands, and that they shall be held in reservation for the same until the termination of this suit, when she shall be entitled to the land, if the suit should be decided in favor of the Vincennes University.

Mr. DUNHAM. My only objection to that amendment is this, that the land cannot be selected without a great deal of trouble. [The remainder of the gentleman's remarks were utterly inaudible to the Reporter.]

Several MEMBERS. "Question!" "Question!"

Mr. ORR. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] will introduce an amendment to the effect he proposes.

Mr. BISSELL. I have not reduced the amendment to writing. Indeed, I care very little about it. I am willing to vote for the bill if there be a provision embodied in it which shall obviate this danger. I make this suggestion, more with a view of being friendly to the bill, than for any other purpose. I have not reduced the amendment to writing, nor do I care to do so.

Mr. DUNHAM. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] will suggest a way to obviate the difficulty, I shall most cheerfully accept his amendment. But I see no way to obviate the difficulty. If you accept the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, the lands selected for the use of the university could not be brought into market and made available for some considerable length of time—say for five years; and, in the mean time, our State University must necessarily be broken up.

Mr. BISSELL. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman [Mr. DUNHAM] has just told us of the great rapidity with which the land is snapped up in that part of the country, and that if they had to wait two years for this township, there would be no land to get. He told us of the eagerness with which purchasers are rushing there to swallow up all the little fragments of land that are left. And now he tells us that he believes, in two years from this time the university came into possession of this land, they would find difficulty in making immediate sale.

Mr. DUNHAM. If this decision is not rendered in one year, I ask the gentleman what is to become of the university? It will be disorganized.

Mr. BISSELL. I am willing to take the gentleman's word for it. He tells us that the lands will all be entered up. So that even if permission be given to the university to take a township, there will not be any land in the State for the university to appropriate. If that be the case, how then is it possible that, in a few years from this time, the lands which may be selected now will find no purchasers?

Several MEMBERS. "Question!" "Question!"

The CHAIRMAN. The question before the committee is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. Read it.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

"Provided further, That said State shall make her selection of land out of any land of the United States subject to private entry."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Would that authorize the State of Indiana to locate those lands within the limits of another State?

The CHAIRMAN. It would have that effect.

Mr. JONES. Well, sir, I would certainly prefer that the amendment should so read as that the State of Indiana shall locate them within her own borders.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not subject to amendment. There is already an amendment pending to an amendment.

Mr. BISSELL. The gentleman will allow me to state an objection to that. We know that in these various railroad grants there are lands reserved, subject to private entry, to use the language of the bills, held at the price of two dollars and a half per acre.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The great objection is the allowing one State to hold lands within the borders of another. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. ENGLISH. I accept the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL,] and am willing to insert in the proper place a provision that the lands shall be selected from those subject to entry, at the rate of one dollar and a quarter per acre.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. It may be that the States where lands are held by the Government will have objections to another State becoming a landholder therein, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BISSELL. I have frequently spoken upon this subject, and I did not think I should rise again.

It is not in accordance with the policy adopted by Congress to permit one State, in which public lands lie, to go into another State and select donations made to it by Congress for the purposes of education; and I do not think the principle of allowing them to do so would be right. It is admitted that there is an abundance of lands in Indiana—lands which are so valuable that they are being entered upon every day with great rapidity; and still, when you propose to grant that State an entire township, they ask permission to go out into other land States to select it, wherever they can find better land than their own. That is a thing which has never been done, or, at least, a thing which has not been practiced. I should like to know upon what principle it ought to be done now? When you give lands to a State for educational purposes, and there are lands in that State, you certainly will restrict her to her own limits in making the selection.

Mr. EASTMAN. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman last up. That amendment, if I understand it, proposes to allow the State of Indiana to go beyond her own limits, and into other States, and take public lands there which are subject to private entry. I am in favor of the bill itself, and I believe all the members from the Western States are inclined to support it with their votes; but I tell the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM,] that however much I might desire to vote for the bill, if the amendment to which I refer is attached to it, I shall vote against it; and I hope and believe every gentleman from the Western States will do the same. We do not want the State of Indiana, or any other State, to become a great landholder within our State, neither will we consent to it by our votes, or directly or indirectly countenance it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his amendment proposed to this bill. I have one which I think will satisfy the House, but I will not offer it now.

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. EASTMAN] that I too prefer the bill in its present shape; and if all the amendments shall be voted down, I shall have no objections. But if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] insists upon the adoption of the amendment which he has proposed, I shall insist upon the one which I have offered as an amendment to his amendment. I prefer the bill as it is now. But as it is the request of several of my colleagues, I withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not know that I exactly understand this proposition, or the principle upon which this land is asked for. If I do, it seems to me that it is a question of giving to the State an additional township of land, and not whether we shall vote the right to her to locate land in lieu of the township which she has heretofore lost. If I understand the facts of the case, about the year 1804 two townships of land were set apart for the benefit of a University within the State of Indiana. There was one at that time, or shortly afterwards, in existence at Vincennes. That institution got possession, and enjoyed the benefit of one of these townships of land. At a subsequent period of time, another State institution was established at Bloomington, which got possession of and kept the other township. The Bloomington institution sued for the one, the enjoyment of which had been in the possession of the Vincennes institution.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman is mistaken in his facts. The Vincennes University sold only about four thousand acres of the first township of land reserved. When the State of Indiana was admitted into the Union, as I understand it, and as Congress understood it at the time, that township and another were granted to the State for the State University. The State of Indiana sold both townships, with the exception of the four thousand acres previously sold; and the Vincennes University has since brought a suit to recover from the State the funds which accrued from the sale of the first township of land reserved to the State. The State University was endowed and is now supported by the funds arising from the sale of both townships.

Mr. JONES. That does not materially alter the position of this case. The State of Indiana has received the benefit of two townships of land given to the State by the Congress of the United States. They have not both gone to endow one institution. One township has been given under the action of Indiana to the State institution. The other township has, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, gone to the Vincennes institution. Then the Bloomington institution has received the benefit and the proceeds of the sales of one township, and the Vincennes Institution has received the proceeds of the sales of the other. Both of these institutions are located in the State of Indiana. If this is the true state of facts, it does seem to me that this is a question whether we will again give to them an additional township of land. Who is the correct judge of what was done by the act of Congress, the people of Indiana who are interested in building up the State institution, or the supreme court, who may be supposed at least to be impartial, and who, we may conclude, have made a correct decision in this matter?

The gentleman from Indiana says in his argument, I believe, that that court was composed of a bare quorum when they decided the question. He says that there were but seven members of the court present. The court when full is composed of nine members, and five is a quorum. Four judges out of seven made the decision to which the gentleman objects. I think, as I before said, that this is simply a question whether we will give to the State of Indiana an additional township of land or not, and not a question whether we are bound to vote another as an act of justice under the former law.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have but a word to say. If this were a case between two land speculators, I should be inclined to vote for such an amendment as this, for the purpose of putting the measure upon the ground of strict right against them. But it must be apparent to every member of the committee that a mistake was made by Congress in making this grant, and that the State of Indiana has failed to realize what she should have done in order to place her upon an equality with the other States to which such grants have been made by Congress. Now, the only difficulty about the matter is, that if we should pass the bill without amendment, there may possibly be some means by which the Indiana State University may get the land which it was the intention of Congress to grant her in the first place. Well, sir, suppose it does; after all, it goes for the benefit of education; and it seems to me that if we were now to pass this bill without the amendment proposed, and after a while the other party should come here and claim as a matter of equity to be reinstated in the quantity of land which Congress originally granted to them, and, representing as they do from that State, two great systems of education, Congress had better grant it. These institutions certainly need the land, and I would rather grant a township more than they are justly entitled to than to deprive them of half a township which they are entitled to. We have got land enough, and it is a plain case, in my opinion, that the State of Indiana has a just and equitable right to what is claimed in this bill; and if so, she ought to have it untrammelled by any restriction which should prevent her from enjoying its full benefit.

Pass this bill, and the meaning of the act will then be so plain that there need be no apprehension that the State of Indiana will ever undertake to make money out of a construction of the law that Congress meant to grant three townships instead of two, which she would have to do in case those things should take place against which this amendment is designed to provide. It seems to me, therefore, that we may very safely pass the bill as it now stands. As I said at the outset, I look upon the matter very differently from what I should if it were with speculators that we were dealing.

Suppose the decision should be changed by the courts, and the other party should come here and claim an equal quantity of land with that granted to the State University, we should be compelled, in justice to these two systems of education, to treat them equally, and give to one as much as we have given to the other; but I think the land could not be better disposed of than for the benefit of education.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I am not disposed to participate in this discussion; but I will say that, while I concur in the amendment proposed to be offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] I fully appreciate the motives which actuate the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIMMONS] in the liberality with which he would donate the public lands for the benefit of education. Like him, I would go to any reasonable extent for the purpose of advancing institutions of that character; and, like him, I would carefully scrutinize the pretensions of speculators.

But, sir, representing in part one of the new States of this Union, I should be unwilling to adopt any amendment which would authorize the State of Indiana to make her selection in any part of the Union outside of her own borders. I fully concur in the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. EASTMAN] on that subject. I am willing to vote for the bill, if I can possibly do so, in such a shape as to meet the views of the Representatives of the State of Indiana; but I am in favor of throwing such guards around it as to prevent the State of Indiana from obtaining a larger amount of land for this purpose than it was the original intention of Congress to grant her.

The suit seems to be still pending in the supreme court of the State. True, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] says that there is nothing in the suit, and that they cannot possibly expect to recover; but the suit is, nevertheless, still pending, and I can see no harm that can possibly result to the State of Indiana by submitting to an amendment that will secure the object which the gentleman profess to desire to obtain.

I am in favor of the bill. I am in favor of voting to Indiana what is her right, and what the Government designed originally to give her; but I think that the friends of the bill should certainly not object to an amendment which will secure that to her eventually. They say that delay would place the State in such a condition that she could not possibly recover this loss, because the lands are being entered up by individuals so fast that the grant would not be worth a farthing by the time the suit is decided, if she was confined to her own borders in making the selection. The amendment which will be introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] will obviate that difficulty. It provides that the Governor of the State of Indiana shall be authorized to appoint an agent to select these lands at once, and to report them to the General Land Office, to be reserved from sale, subject to confirmation or rejection, as this suit may terminate. It seems to me that the friends of the bill cannot possibly object to that proposition.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not rise to make a speech, but I really desire to know whether I understand this question, for there has been such a perplexity of arguments and statements that I confess myself to be somewhat in the dark in regard to it.

As I understand it, it is customary for Congress to grant to each new State that may be admitted into the Union two townships of land, for educational purposes—that is to say, for university purposes. Is that the fact? I appeal to members from the new States to know if it is so.

Mr. EASTMAN. Yes; it is.

Mr. SMITH. Well, I understand that the State of Indiana has had her two townships.

Mr. DUNHAM. No; no.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; she has had her two townships. The gentleman says "no;" I understand, however, that such is the fact, but that there is a difference between her own people as to who has a right to the land. The State has got it, but the question is whether the Vincennes University was entitled to it or not. The State has already received the quantity of land habitually given to new States for this purpose, and the effect of this bill, as I understand it, would be to give her another township of land. If that be so, it is plain to my mind that we ought to vote down the bill.

Mr. ORR. If the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] should be rejected, I propose to offer an amendment which I think will meet the views of every gentleman. It provides that the State of Indiana may cause the lands to be selected at once; that the lands so selected shall be reported to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and shall be by him withdrawn from sale until the decision of the cause now pending in the supreme court of the State of Indiana, in which the Vincennes University is the plaintiff and the State of Indiana the defendant; and that said selection shall be confirmed, and patents issued therefor, if the suit shall be decided adversely to the State of Indiana, but if otherwise, then the selection shall be null and void.

Mr. DISNEY. I purpose, Mr. Chairman, saying a word or two in relation to this bill. I have looked somewhat into it. In the remarks which I am about to make, I leave out of view the auxiliary and subsidiary question, which has been debated here this morning.

The merits of the bill rest upon this statement of facts: At the time of the admission of the State of Indiana into the Union, in the year 1816, as is usual on such occasion, a compact was entered into between that State and the United States. In that compact various stipulations and conditions were inserted. Among them, on the part of Indiana, was a stipulation to forbear taxation in such regards, and to such extent. On the other side, on the part of the United States, certain donations in consideration of this forbearance were made, to wit: of all the salt-spring lands and various other matters, not necessary to the understanding of this case, and therefore not necessary for me to enumerate. Suffice it for me to state, in general terms, that there were a number of donations and grants in that act. Among others was a grant of a township of land to the State of Indiana, for the purpose of aiding in the establishment and support of a seminary of learning, under the direction and control of that State. And in making this grant the act of Congress had reference to and recognizes a previous grant of a township of land for the same purpose.

I think it perfectly apparent, on the face of the act admitting that State, that it was the understanding of both the parties—to wit: the State of Indiana and the Congress of the United States—that two townships of land were given to the State of Indiana, subject to the control of her Legislature, in order to sustain and support a seminary of learning—given to the State of Indiana in virtue and in consideration of the stipulations set forth in that act, of certain things to be done, or forbore to be done, on the part of that State. And besides, sir, the act in so recognizing the previous grant, and in making a special, specific grant of an additional township, but followed the course of proceeding which had been adopted in regard to the State of Ohio previously to this time, and which has been followed ever since in relation to the northwestern States of the Union.

Well, sir, so stands the case; both parties understanding that a grant of two townships of land had been made to the State of Indiana for this purpose. Subsequent facts have proved that the first granted township would not, as was supposed by both parties, inure to the State of Indiana, and could not inure to her for any purpose whatever; and it has been held that the United States had not conveyed to the State, by the original grant, the township which had been proposed, and which both parties supposed was conveyed previous to the admission of the State. Here, then, was an error of fact, contrary to the understanding of both parties. It now turns out that the State of Indiana, instead of getting two townships for the support of her seminary of learning under the control of her Legislature, as all of the other northwestern States have, only gets one.

Now, it is alleged, on the other hand, although the State has not got in her State capacity two townships of land for such a purpose, yet she has got one for that purpose, and her citizens, in point of fact, got the other township of land with which they promoted similar, or kindred purposes. Now what force is there in the objection? Here was a solemn compact entered into between Indiana, at the time of her admission into the Union, and the United States.

In this agreement, every body of understanding can perceive—and the fact is sufficiently set forth in the act itself, so as to permit of no doubt—that Indiana was to have conveyed to her—as had been conveyed before to the State of Ohio, and as was subsequently conveyed to every one of the north-western States—two separate and distinct townships of land, to be subject to the Legislature of the State, and to be applied to a specific purpose.

Now, sir, is this contract to be evaded by the fact that the General Government had appropriated the same land to other parties for other purposes, even though those other parties are citizens of Indiana? I apprehend not; for besides it will be discovered, by the most casual observer, that the purposes to which this land was to be appropriated by this Vincennes University, are in some respect different—entirely different from the purposes to which it has been applied under the direction of the State Legislature—as in this, for instance: The State University has regulations and provisions by which gratuitous education is given to youth, which the Vincennes University has not. And I am also reminded that the State University is not sectarian in its character, while the other University differs from it in both these respects. It has no gratuitous education provided for youth, and it is sectarian in its character.

But even if these differences did not exist, still the possession of this township on the part of a private association could not be a good plea on the part of the United States against the claim of the State of Indiana, set up legally, legitimately, and fairly under the terms of the contract, and under the act of Congress by which that State became one of the members of this Confederacy.

There stands the contract; and not only is this right to the land in question expressed on the face of the contract, but the grant itself is in consonance with the same kind of contract entered into by the General Government with the other north-western States of the Union. And, Mr. Chairman, upon the general principles of equity—putting aside the special purposes to which this grant was to be applied—the General Government would be bound to extend to the State of Indiana the same provision, and to the same extent, which it has done to the other States of the Union in like cases.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to proceed to consider another aspect of this case. The appropriation of this first grant of a township of land, was not made by the citizens of the State of Indiana. It was done by the citizens of the Territory of Indiana; and all right on the part of the State of Indiana, or control on the part of the United States, had passed away before the State of Indiana had an existence.

The grant had been made by the General Government. The State of Indiana took no interest by virtue of the act. It was made for the special purposes of education. And this donation, which was intended on one part to be given, and supposed on the other part to be received—in relation to this township of land—had no existence. The parties misunderstood the fact, and there was no township of land there to be appropriated. And hence, sir, one of the conditions stipulated and set forth in that act, on the admission of the State of Indiana into the Union, failing to be performed, Indiana has now a legal right to come before Congress and ask us to keep our contract.

Mr. HIESTER. Will the gentleman from Ohio give way to me for a moment, that I may make a motion for the committee to rise?

Mr. DISNEY. I will be through in one moment, and the gentleman can then make the motion he purposes. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that generally I do not like this sort of contingent legislation—legislation which is to depend on the happening of some future event—to depend on the action of other individuals than those constituting the Legislature of the Union. Now, sir, it has been held by our judicial courts that a legislative act, depending for its force and operation on the action of parties other than those composing the Legislature itself, is not a legislative act, and is not a law enacted by the competent authority; and I suggest a doubt whether an act of the sort which this would be, if the suggested amendments are adopted, would be a valid and constitutional act; that is to say, if you make the grant and the selection of this tract of land dependent upon the act of other parties, whether it is within the constitutional competency of this Congress to pass it. I think not.

Mr. COBB. My object in rising is to move that the committee rise, for the purpose of introducing a resolution to close debate, in order that we may some time get to an end of this matter. We have consumed the whole day in discussing it.

Mr. LETCHER, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. COBB. No, sir; I know what it is. But if the House will take a vote upon the subject now, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] may be read.

The amendment was accordingly again read.

Mr. BISSELL. I have an amendment to offer to that amendment, which I think will be acceptable all around. It is:

Provided further, That the State of Indiana may cause the land to be selected at once, and that the Secretary of the Interior, on being notified by the Governor of Indiana, at any time, that the selection of the land herein provided to be donated has been made by the proper authorities of that State, shall thereupon withdraw and reserve such land from sale, until the termination of said suit.

Mr. ORR. That is entirely acceptable to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] moved the amendment. Does he accept the modification?

Mr. BISSELL. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will accept it.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to say only a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. LETCHER. We have heard enough of this bill to satisfy us that the House knows nothing about it; and it will be well for us to read the debates upon this subject, as they will be published in the newspapers. There is a great difference of opinion now, and by a week's delay, and a week's examination of this debate, we can get at the facts of the case, and then take up the matter and dispose of it in a sensible and prudent way. I do not think that can be done now. Besides, the House is thin, there being only few more than a quorum of the members present, and, upon a vote upon such a proposition as this, there ought to be a full House.

I move that the committee rise.

Mr. MILLSON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. LETCHER. I will withdraw it in favor of my colleague.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to say, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that I cannot accept of his amendment, though perfectly willing to do so as far as I am concerned. My reasons are simply these: It will be recollected that I stated some time ago, that although the amendment I proposed would render the bill more acceptable to me than it is in its present shape, yet I should feel constrained to vote against the bill, even if my own amendment were adopted; for I stated that the institution of the State of Indiana had received all the benefit Congress intended to grant to her, and, this being a simple question between two collegiate institutions, I could not consent to vote for the bill, even if my own amendment were adopted, although I thought it was perfectly obvious that the amendment should be adopted. It was for that reason that I declined to accept the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. I now move that the committee rise.

The question was then taken upon Mr. LETCHER's motion, and a division being had, there were—ayes 45; noes not counted.

Mr. CHANDLER demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Alabama, and VAIL were appointed.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 67.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the amendment as amended; and being taken, was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill, as amended, will be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it be necessary to make the motion, I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. ASHE. I move that the committee do now rise. I do it because it is evident that there is no quorum in the committee, and I do not wish to have final action upon a bill of so much importance as this, with less than, or barely a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote lately taken showed that a quorum was present.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I rise to a question of order. I submit that no business has intervened since the committee refused to rise. I ask that the vote may be taken upon my motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that sufficient business has intervened to make the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina in order.

Mr. WALSH. What is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. It is that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WALSH. Is it that the committee rise and report the bill to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. It is upon the simple motion that the committee rise.

Mr. WALSH. This matter has been debated at such immense length, that nobody understands it, [a laugh,] and I do not want the committee to take final action upon it to-day.

The question was taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 54, noes 67.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Has the bill been laid aside?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. JONES. I move, then, that the committee do now rise and report the bill, with the amendments, to the House.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. WRIGHT) reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had the Private Calendar generally under consideration, and particularly the joint resolution of the Senate (No. 2) "to indemnify the State of Indiana for the failure of title to a township of land granted to said State on her admission into the Union in 1816," and had directed him to report the same to the House, with an amendment, and with a recommendation that, as amended, it do pass.

Mr. KEITT. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. FULLER. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for tellers. Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then put; and, on a division, there were—ayes 99, noes 27.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNHAM moved the previous question on the bill.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. McMULLIN moved that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and, on a division, there were—ayes 68, noes 57.

So the motion was agreed to, and the House thereupon (at twenty-five minutes before four o'clock) adjourned till Monday, at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 13, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

Mr. BRIGHT. Will the Secretary please read a note which I have received from the President of the Senate?

The Secretary read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 13, 1854.

DEAR SIR: Will you do me the favor to preside in the Senate to-day? DAVID R. ATCHISON.

Hon. J. D. BRIGHT, United States Senate.

Mr. BRIGHT. If there be no objection, I will comply with the request of the President of the Senate, and take the chair.

There was no objection.

The Journal of Eriday was read and approved.

THE MISSOURI COMPROMISE.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. President, I have been requested to present a memorial of fourteen hundred citizens of Worcester, Massachusetts, against the passage of the bill for organizing the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska. This memorial is signed by the present Governor of the State of Massachusetts, by Mr. John Davis, well known to most of the members of this body, for a long time filling the same place, and afterwards a much respected Senator of the United States. It also bears the signature of Mr. Lincoln, who was for many years Governor of Massachusetts; and is signed by citizens of every party and every section of party in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. It represents, I believe, the unanimous opinion of the people of that part of the country, and is signed by more than fourteen hundred individuals.

I also present the memorial of the representatives of the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends in New England, respectfully protesting against the extension of the area of slavery in the United States.

As the subject of these memorials is now before the Senate, I move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

DUTIES ON RAILROAD IRON.

Mr. BELL. I present the memorial of sundry citizens of the State of Tennessee, stockholders in the Tennessee and Alabama railroad. The memorialists set forth that this road is now in course of construction, but that the completion of it is likely to be delayed and obstructed by the very high price of rail bars. They set forth very cogent reasons why the duty on imported railroad iron should be altogether repealed, or the collection of the duty postponed until at least two years after the road shall have been completed and in operation. They allege that otherwise not only projects on which large amounts of capital have already been expended will remain incomplete, but also many new projects retarded, unless this privilege be granted. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST TEXAS.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to present the petition of a number of citizens of Louisiana interested in claims against Texas. They represent that, owing to conflicting opinions in Congress in relation to the obligation of the United States to assume the payment of these debts, and the importance of the subjects now submitted to Congress for deliberation, they fear that the delay of an application to Congress will be so great as almost to defeat their interest in the claims, and they therefore earnestly pray Congress to pass a law authorizing them to institute a suit in equity before the Supreme Court of the United States, against the United States, with the view of testing the liability of the Government for the payment of the claims. In order to have that question taken into consideration, I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPE FEAR RIVER.

Mr. BADGER, in accordance with previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill making further appropriation for the improvement of Cape Fear river, North Carolina; which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BADGER. I will not ask the reference of the bill nor its consideration at this time. I wish, however, to lay upon the table and have printed some papers from a report on the subject, showing conclusively not only the propriety but the necessity, the indispensable necessity, of the appropriation being made without delay, or the consequence will be the entire closing up of the mouth of the river. I will, therefore, allow the bill to remain without a second reading until the papers which I send to the table can be printed. When they are printed, I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill and pass it without delay.

The papers were ordered to be printed.

EXTRA PAY TO OFFICERS IN MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the officers of the Army who served in the late war with Mexico, and who, whilst so serving, received their commutation of subsistence in money, an extra compensation of twenty cents per ration for each ration so received by the said officers during the time herein specified.

BRAZILIAN CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. WADE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his judgment the same may be done without detriment to the public welfare, to communicate to the Senate copies of the dispatch from the late Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Brazil to the Secretary of State, dated November 24, 1851, together with all accompanying papers or documents which were sent therewith, and also a copy of the letter of the Secretary of State to the said Minister in reply thereto, and of the communication from the Navy Department, which was inclosed in the said letter of the Secretary of State.

INSANE HOSPITAL IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. NORRIS submitted the following resolution, and asked for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the Senate what deficiency, if any, there is in the appropriation to complete the hospital for the insane of the District of Columbia, and of the Army and Navy, the cause of such deficiency, and whether, in his opinion, any additional appropriation will be required to complete the work, and if so, how much.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I move to amend the resolution by adding "and also whether the sites selected are the most proper and convenient."

Mr. NORRIS. I will accept that.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BRODHEAD subsequently said: I move to reconsider the vote adopting the resolution, for the purpose of offering an additional amendment. I have consulted the mover of the resolution, and he has no objection to it.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I move to amend the resolution by adding the following:

And what sums have been respectively paid for those sites, and whether such sums were or were not reasonable, compared with the value or price of land in the vicinity of those sites.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. FITZPATRICK presented a petition of citizens of Alabama, and other southern States, praying that restrictions in regard to the transportation of turpentine and the various other products of the pine tree on board of steamboats, may be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of the Governor of the State of Alabama, the Judges of the Supreme Court, members of the Legislature, and other officers of the State, praying that the compensation of the Clerk of the United States district court for the middle district of Alabama, may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of any law which will permit slavery in the Territory of Nebraska, or otherwise infringe the provisions of the Missouri compromise in regard to slavery; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FISH presented the petition of Peter A. Myers, praying an increase of his pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMLIN presented resolutions passed at a meeting of citizens of Bath, Maine, in favor of a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a petition of Jeremiah Simons, one of the Dartmoor prisoners during the last war with Great Britain, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a petition of Abner Lowell and others, praying the erection of a light-house on Wood Island, on the coast of Maine; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of Joseph Pennley, one of the Dartmoor prisoners during the last war with Great Britain, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWARD presented an additional document in support of the claim of Sarah Crandall, widow of James Coon, to a pension; which, with the petition and papers already presented, on the files of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a petition of citizens of Steuben county, New York, praying that the pension now allowed Isaac Ackerman may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a petition of non-commissioned officers of the Navy, praying an increase of their pay; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a petition of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the ratification of any treaty by which it is proposed to establish an international copyright between the United States and Great Britain; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of Niagara county, New York, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to establish the Territory of Nebraska in its present form, or any other bill by which the Missouri compromise will be violated; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, two petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the enactment of any law by which slavery will be permitted in the Territory of Nebraska, or the Missouri compromise violated; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CLAYTON presented two petitions of citizens of Delaware, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska in its present form; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FOOT presented a petition of citizens of Windham, Vermont, remonstrating against the enactment of any law by which the Missouri compromise will be repealed or abrogated; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GEYER presented a memorial of the citizens of Livingston, Grundy, and Mercer counties, Missouri, asking a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad through said counties; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FISH presented the memorial of Goodhue & Co., and others, merchants of New York, praying the enactment of a law to prevent the forfeiture of ships without fault of the owners in certain cases; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, additional papers and testimony in support of the petition of Meigs D. Benjamin, of New York, praying the return of an excess of duty heretofore paid by him on the importation of certain goods; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Massachusetts, a petition of citizens of North Danvers, Massachusetts, and a petition of citizens of Windham, Vermont, remonstrating against the repeal of the provision of the Missouri compromise in regard to slavery; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHASE presented two petitions of citizens of Ohio, remonstrating against any disposition of the public lands except for the use of actual settlers; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Cincinnati, praying an appropriation to aid a stock company in the construction of a canal around the falls of the Ohio river on the Indiana side; which was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Also, two petitions of residents of Ohio, and a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of the bill, in its present form, to organize the Territory of Nebraska; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, proceedings of a meeting of citizens at Cleveland, Ohio, against a violation of the Missouri compromise; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented ten petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska in its present form; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, two memorials of citizens of Philadelphia, praying the erection of a building for the use of the post office in that city, and the United States courts for that district; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HUNTER presented a petition of the inspectors of the customs for the district of Norfolk and Portsmouth, Virginia, praying an increase of their compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EVANS presented a petition of the clerks and others employed in the offices of the collector of the customs and naval officer for the district of Charleston, South Carolina, praying an increase of their compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the following petitions; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

Petition of citizens of Iowa, praying that a grant of land be made to aid in the construction of the Philadelphia, Fort Wayne, and Platte Valley Air-Line Railroad.

Petition of citizens of Iowa, praying that a grant of land be made to aid in the construction of the Fort Madison, West Point, Keosauqua, and Bloomfield Railroad.

Two petitions of citizens of Iowa, praying that a grant of land be made to the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Fort Wayne to Council Bluffs.

Also, a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying the establishment of a mail route from Fort Des Moines to Eldora, the county seat of Harding county, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a supplemental petition of James Pool, praying remuneration for services rendered, under contract, to the Seneca nation of Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PEARCE presented the memorial of Rebecca P. Stansbury and others, children of Thomas Peters, deceased, praying to be allowed an amount of money equal to the pensions their father and mother would have been entitled to for the services of the former during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That the petition of James Edwards, administrator of the estate of Edward M. Wanton, and the petition of the legal representatives of the estate of Nehemiah Brush, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and, together with an additional document, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the petition of James Wormsley be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Isaac S. Bowman, praying to be allowed half pay, to which his father was entitled, submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred three petitions of citizens of Blair county, Pennsylvania, and the proceedings of a meeting of soldiers of the war of 1812, held in Philadelphia, in favor of a modification of the bounty land law, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of paymasters' clerks who served in Mexico, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Harriet O. Read, executrix of brevet Colonel A. C. W. Fanning, praying compensation for extra services performed by him, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the petitions of Michael Hennessey, Ann L. Moor, and Jacob T. Smith, praying pensions, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the petition of Sarah Somers Corson, and the petition of Thomas Conner, praying pensions, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate in relation to the subject, reported a bill to constitute Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, a port of delivery; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Ira Day, praying compensation for carrying certain mails, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Devlin, praying compensation for services performed in the Fifth Auditor's Department, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills from the House of Representatives, reported them back without amendment:

Bill for the relief of Lyman N. Cooke.

Bill for the relief of Emelie Hooe, widow of Captain Hooe.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. RUSK gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the officers of the late Texas Navy.

Mr. PEARCE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill providing for the entering into an examination of certain accounts between the State of Maryland and the United States.

PHILADELPHIA COURTS AND POST OFFICE.

Mr. BRODHEAD moved that the bill referred February 8 to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to provide a place for the post office in the city of Philadelphia, and for the courts of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, be printed; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill to perpetuate preemption to actual settlers on the public lands; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FITZPATRICK, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill making a grant of land to the State of Alabama, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the line of Georgia, on the Chattahoochee river, to the city of Mobile; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FITZPATRICK, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution for extending an existing contract for carrying the mail in Alabama; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting to the State of Alabama public lands, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of the Alabama and Tennessee Railroad, from Selma on the Alabama river, to the Tennessee river, at or near Gunter's Landing, and also the Memphis and Charleston Railroad from Memphis, on the Mississippi river, to some point connecting with the Nashville, Chattanooga and Charleston Railroad; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLAY asked, and obtained, the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill for the relief of Thomas Snodgrass; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred, together with the petition and papers on the files of the Senate, to the Committee on Claims.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, from the House of Representatives, were severally read a first and second time by their titles, and referred—the two first named to the Committee on Pensions, and the last to the Committee on Claims:

"A bill for the relief of Harriet Leavenworth, widow of the late Brevet Brigadier General Leavenworth;"

"A bill for the relief of William B. Edwards;" and

"A bill for the relief of Anthony G. Willis, deceased."

NEBRASKA TERRITORY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. WELLER addressed the Senate for nearly an hour in support of the bill. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, it was my intention to address the Senate to-day, but owing to indisposition I do not feel that I should be able to proceed as I had desired and contemplated, and therefore I will move that this subject be laid over until to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the Senator to say that he is too unwell to go on now?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, in order that we may proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will not ask for an Executive session, for we have a great many bills on the Calendar which we can go on and dispose of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on the motion to postpone until to-morrow.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would ask if there is not some other Senator prepared to go on? It does not follow, by any means, that because the Senator from Texas is not able to proceed there are not others ready to go on. I know of several Senators who, it is presumed, are to speak; and I hope some of them may go on and make their remarks now, though I do not wish to interfere at all with the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am satisfied, though owing to a hoarseness under which I now labor, and of which I can be relieved by to-morrow, I cannot now proceed, that I shall be enabled to go on then without any detriment to the bill or to the business of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Some of my friends say it would be an indulgence to them to allow the Senate to sit in open session for half an hour, because they have four or five land bills to dispose of. I suppose they can get through with them in that time.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. GWIN. I rise to give notice to the Senate that I shall, to-morrow, or at some early day thereafter, ask leave to introduce the deficiency bill which the House of Representatives have defeated. Unless the Senate take up and pass such a bill, it may be that the wheels of the Government will be stopped. I give notice, therefore, of my intention to introduce that bill.

GRANTS OF LANDS FOR RAILROADS.

Mr. SLIDELL. I move that the Senate now proceed to consider bill No. 8, being a bill granting to the State of Louisiana the right of way, and making a grant of the public lands, for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Shreveport to the Mississippi river, in said State.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope we shall take up the Calendar in its order, beginning at the beginning, and going regularly on.

Mr. SLIDELL. It seems to me that there should really be no opposition to these bills now. Friday is set apart for the consideration of private bills, and these bills cannot be touched on that day. I think the Senator might be satisfied with the fight which he has already made on this question, and submit to the passage of the bills. It will only be an unnecessary consumption of time to continue the discussion of them.

Mr. DAWSON. I have no doubt that these bills will go through, but still I dislike to see premature in these matters. I know they will go through by the force of their own weight, but I dislike to see them running over everything else.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am not familiar with the rules of order, but I submit to the Chair that my motion is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order, and the question is upon it.

Mr. WALKER. I wish to know from the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands whether this course is in accordance with the understanding?

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. This bill is reported in the usual form, and with the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. WALKER. I am not inquiring as to the form of the bill, but as to the order in which it shall be taken up. If I understand, one bill has already been passed for Louisiana.

Mr. SLIDELL. This is in exact accordance with the understanding the other day; this is the next railroad bill on the Calendar.

Mr. WALKER. There is a bill granting lands to Wisconsin for a railroad, which is ahead of this on the Calendar. Besides this is a second one for the same State.

Mr. SLIDELL's motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with an amendment, in the nature of a substitute.

The Secretary was proceeding to read the substitute.

Mr. WALKER. The form of these bills is so well known that I presume it cannot be necessary to read this. There are a dozen more of the same sort upon the tables of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the reading of the amendment will be dispensed with.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday next. The bill introduced by the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. FOOT,] in relation to the disposition of the public lands for the benefit of the indigent insane, was postponed until that day. The two questions run into each other. I am myself, on principle, opposed to the whole of these bills, and I desire to be heard on them when they come up; but if you take them up one at a time, in this mode, immediately after some other subject has attracted the attention of the Senate, it is impossible to give them the consideration which I think they ought to have. There are many objections to them in detail, which I think ought to be made, independent of the objection in principle; and if this course be persisted in—if these bills be taken up in this way—all that I can do is to require that each bill be read through. I move, however, to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday next.

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator from Delaware spoke so low that it was impossible for me, in the confusion around me at that moment, to understand him. I see no reason for postponing this bill to-day, upon any public consideration; but if the honorable Senator desires to address himself to the subject of the bill, on Monday next, which I did not hear, I shall of course, with great pleasure, yield to his request.

Mr. BAYARD. I will endeavor to speak loud enough for the honorable Senator from New York to hear me; and I will explain to him the reason why I move the postponement. I am opposed to the principles embodied in all these bills. They are brought in separately for different States. The bill introduced by the honorable Senator from Vermont embodies a different principle as to the disposition of the public lands. I am opposed to that also, but I am not able to distinguish between the principle that disavows his bill from these bills which are daily passed. I wish to be heard on the question.

Mr. SEWARD. Very well.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to postpone this bill to the day to which the bill of the honorable Senator from Vermont has been postponed. If we get through with the other question which is engrossing the attention of the Senate when these bills come up, I desire to be heard upon them.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the Senator from Delaware withdraw his motion for one minute? I will renew it, if he desires it. It will be remembered by the Senate, that some weeks ago I gave notice that I would, at some proper time, ask leave to introduce a bill to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States. It has been my purpose, from that time until the present, to fulfill that promise. I have postponed it, however, on account of the more engrossing subjects before the Senate. On consultation with a number of gentlemen, I find that they are anxious that the question should be tested upon some one of these bills. It is not my wish to embarrass any bill which is before the Senate. I have invariably voted for every proposition that has been before the Senate to give lands for purposes of internal improvement, and I shall continue so to vote unless some better system can be adopted. I think the system can be benefited materially. As the Senator from Delaware proposes to make this question the special order of the day for next Monday, I think it would be a saving of time if we could bring the whole question up. It is in that view, with the permission of the Senator from Delaware, that I propose to offer my intended bill as an amendment to the bill which is under consideration, in order that the whole question may come up and be decided at once. We had better decide the matter at once, or it will give rise to another debate upon the same branch of the same question on another bill. I submit, therefore, to Senators, whether it would not be best to propose my amendment to this bill, in order that the whole question may come up.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Mr. President, I appeal to my friend from Tennessee, as a fair legislator, not to bring forward that proposition now. I am perfectly willing that he should do so at any other time when he sees fit, and we will give him a hearing, and fix a day for its consideration; but I am sure that he wishes to deal fairly among the sister States of this Union. As a Senator, I am certain that he does not wish to pass a bill for one or two States, and withhold from others for days and weeks a like bill, because of an amendment which he may move involving other and outside questions than those which are involved in the bills under consideration, and upon which there is no question. Now, I will make a proposition in reference to this matter. It is the proposition of the committee. I hold that the State which I in part represent, for instance, will be most unkindly treated by the Congress of the United States, and the parent Government, if they withhold from it a grant similar to that which has been made to its sister State upon the east, and adjoining to it, and to its sister State upon the south, and adjoining to it. The Committee on Public Lands at this session, taking the Illinois bill for their guide—a State from which there has been no request since—have sought in their action to report bills making grants within that amount, upon the presumption that the Senate of the United States, and the other branch of Congress, would act upon principles of equality and justice in this matter.

I appreciate the motives which actuate my friend from Tennessee in the movement which he has made. I have conversed with him in relation to it. It is, however, a separate and independent proposition, not connected with these bills, and I am certain that, as a legislator, he desires no bargain to be made in reference to any measure which is to be passed here, but he is desirous to let all bills pass or be rejected on their own merits or inherent strength. That I believe to be the case; and I say that amendments moved to these bills to make additional grants look very much like a bargain; and I hope everything of that sort will be avoided.

Those who are opposed to these grants, and to this mode of disposing of public lands, can vote against the bills. Those who have other propositions can bring them forward and have a vote of the body upon them. All that I ask now is that fair play shall be done to all. I represent one of the States which has felt aggrieved in relation to this matter; and I, as a representative, have felt dishonored as a member of this body because of the manner in which my State has been treated. My colleague and myself have sought to do all that we could do in our representative capacity to prevent any such thing. When our bill was up two years ago, Judge Underwood offered an amendment which provoked a debate of four or five months; but we kept the matter before the body, because of the indefatigable zeal and energy of my colleague, who pressed our bill upon the Senate day after day; and the bill finally passed the Senate, but did not obtain a hearing in the House.

I trust that, as we have not embodied these bills together, desirous that they should pass or be rejected, each on its own merits, the Senate will proceed to do justice to the public land States, acting separately on their bills. I hope my friend from Tennessee will not press his amendment. I promise, however, when he brings that forward as a separate measure, to give him a hearing—a fair and a full hearing.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I wish to add a single remark to what the Senator from Iowa has said with regard to this question. It must be apparent to the Senate that if the representatives of those States who have been asking for grants of lands for railroads, fail to get their bills through at an early period in the session, and other Senators have bills passed for the benefit of their States, it will affect them injuriously at home. There is another important question connected with this matter, so far as my own State is concerned. A bill has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, granting alternate sections for railroad purposes on four short routes in that State. The Legislature is now in session. If there is not some indication of congressional action which can be transmitted by the next mail, the benefits of the act may pass over for a whole year, for the want of that State legislation which is indispensably necessary to give any efficiency to the grant that may be made. I hope, therefore, that, as some of these bills have already been passed, the Senator from Tennessee will allow the remainder to go through without any discussion or obstruction from those who entertain opinions adverse to such grants, and give us an opportunity of being placed on the same footing with those States for whose benefit bills have already been passed by the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I trust I shall be unwilling, under any circumstances, to do injustice to any State in this Union; but though it may be true that the Congress of the United States have passed certain bills at anterior sessions for the purpose of granting lands for railroads to individual States, it does not follow that, if I think those bills are wrong in principle, I am committing injustice to other States because I do not recognize a wrong principle when a subsequent bill is introduced. The question of the disposition of the public lands is certainly a vexed question. There is not a settled policy in regard to it. These bills have been resisted at all times. My hope is that some adjustment can be made that will prevent any difficulty in reference to the question. My own opinions tend towards an amendment which was offered some two sessions ago by the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] but, as these bills now stand, they seem to me to involve a principle of gross injustice to the other States of the Union. I admit that, according to my views, Congress have no constitutional power to dispose of the public lands among the States at large. Nor am I able to distinguish between the right to give them to the land States any more than to give them to the States at large, if they be a gift. As to the doctrine connected that the United States being great landholders, I wish to show, and I think I can show, that the principle connected with that has been departed from in the bills which are now framed upon the model bill of the Senate; and I wish to be heard upon that question. If, after that, the Senate choose to pass such bills, they will meet with no further opposition from me than a silent vote. I shall not struggle beyond the point of bringing the question before the Senate, with the hope that we may be able to adopt some plan which, while it satisfies the demands of the representatives from the landholding States, will also satisfy the public sentiment of the whole Union in the non-landholding States as well as in the landholding States. Being opposed in principle to each and every one of these bills, I cannot see how it is just, because previous isolated bills have passed granting lands to other States on principles which I do not recognize, to require at my hands that I shall assent to the passage of this bill without opposition, when I have never had an opportunity of being heard in regard to it.

Mr. SLIDELL. I trust the motion to postpone the further consideration of this bill until Monday will not be adopted by the Senate. The honorable Senator from Delaware has had abundant opportunity to examine, not only the principles, but the details of this bill. It has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and has been on our tables now, I think, for more than a month past. It has been the subject of discussion during three different sessions at least. The whole principle of the bill was fully discussed upon the question of the passage of one of a similar character some five or six days since. I am sure the honorable Senator from Delaware, who has now been present, I think, during three sessions, at least, in which bills have been introduced and passed, involving the same principles, and nearly the same details, is quite as competent to argue the case now as he will be at any subsequent period. I am sure if I thought the Senator from Delaware was not prepared at this moment to discuss this bill with a full knowledge of its principles and its details, I should consider it as a matter of necessary and proper courtesy to consent to his motion to postpone; but knowing the ability and zeal with which he examines all questions of this kind, I am sure he will not be able to do more justice to his argument five or six days hence than now. Therefore, if the motion be insisted on, I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish only to say that I suppose I am a better judge as to whether I am prepared to argue the question now or not, than the honorable Senator from Louisiana. I certainly have not certain facts, certain comparisons which I wish to make of the bill before us with the antecedent bills which have been passed when I was not a member of the body. Those which were passed during the last Congress while I was a member of the Senate, were not, according to my recollection, subjects of discussion; certainly not of extended discussion. As to the full discussion of which the honorable gentleman speaks as having taken place at this session, I have not heard it, certainly; though I have heard the question partially discussed.

If I am not wrong, the bill was not reported from the Committee on Public Lands until the 30th day of January, which is a period now of two weeks. Since then, we have had a great many other exciting subjects before the Senate, and many collateral questions which one is obliged to examine. I never anticipated, and I presume that no Senator on this floor anticipated, that this question would come up to-day. I had supposed that while the discussion on the Nebraska bill was pending, other questions of importance would not be taken up. One thing is very certain, that on a question of privilege which would otherwise be entitled to precedence, the debate has been stopped, though it was the order of the day for Thursday last, and it has passed even unnoticed in the Senate under the pressure of the Nebraska bill. Besides, we had the enunciation on the part of two Senators on the last day of our session, that they both intended to speak to-day, and hence I presumed that the whole day, after one o'clock, would have been consumed in the discussion of the Nebraska bill. I did not come here to-day for the purpose of discussing this bill, because I did not expect that it would be taken up; and hence I have made my motion to postpone.

It is a matter of indifference to me whether the Senate choose to grant my request or not, for I can and will take occasion hereafter, on some other of these bills, to express my sentiments. And certainly I will not speak now if the Senate refuses to postpone the bill till Monday.

Mr. CLAYTON. I believe the Senate never before refused, on an application of this kind, the courtesy of postponing the consideration of a subject for a few days, to give a Senator an opportunity of being heard. This is a great subject. It is one about which there is a very great difference of opinion. I hardly know of a more important subject for discussion at this session; and in consideration of the fact that we are pressed by the Nebraska bill, and by the bill providing indemnity for French spoliation, and many other measures which occupy our thoughts, I trust the Senate will not depart from the courtesy with which it has heretofore indulged gentlemen upon such bills. I hope, therefore, that by unanimous consent the measure may lie over until Monday, and then we can come prepared to understand it and hear it discussed.

Mr. JOHNSON. The motion is to postpone the further consideration of this bill until next Monday. To-day is Monday, and hence the motion is to postpone it for a whole week. Sir, I am satisfied that it will not take a gentleman of the intelligence of the Senator from Delaware, with that general knowledge which he already possesses on these subjects, a whole week to investigate the few points which are involved in these bills. And as it bears hardly upon us, I think it would be but just to those of us who feel that we suffer by the delay, to name an earlier day.

Whilst I am willing, on my part, to concede to the Senator all necessary time, I am not willing to give him a whole week. I think two days will be sufficient.

Another thing I would suggest to the good, common sense of the gentleman, and it is this: By postponing this bill you will involve a contest upon almost every other bill of this sort. What do you achieve by laying this bill over? Simply this: the Senator whose bill is now before the Senate is compelled to wait for a week before it can be taken up. It will be postponed, but the other bills will not be postponed, and we shall be at perfect liberty to bring up any other bill of the same class on any intervening day. I do not rely, however, on this argument; but I think the Senator himself must feel that it is hardly just to ask us now to postpone this bill for a week. We have but few opportunities to bring our bills before the body when there is an important special order pending. Then, with all the time which he has had, considering the repeated number of sessions at which these matters have heretofore been discussed, the general information which already exists, and the easy accessibility of further information on this subject, it is unjust, I think, that he should ask for a whole week. It does not seem to me to be right; and I respectfully submit to him whether he cannot name a shorter day. If I may be allowed, I will move to amend his proposition so as to make the postponement be until Wednesday next instead of until Monday.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I should vote, although deeply interested in the question of the disposition of the public lands, for the postponement proposed by the Senator from Delaware, with great pleasure, but for one thing: I feel that if this motion succeeds it necessarily carries with it all of the other land bills; for, I take it for granted, that the Senate would not postpone the bill in which the Senator from Louisiana takes so deep an interest, and then allow others to have their bills taken up and passed before disposing of his bill. If the motion succeeds, it necessarily carries with it all the other bills. With that view of the case I should vote for the motion, although it operates hardly on myself, if I had any assurance that when Monday comes the Senate will take up the bills and act upon them. But if we postpone a bill for a week, at the instance of the Senator from Delaware, how shall we refuse to postpone it for another week for some other Senator, and another week for some other, until these bills, by appeals to our courtesy, shall be postponed from time to time to the end of the session, or so near the end that it will be impossible to procure the action of the House of Representatives upon them?

Sir, I am willing, as a young Senator, to yield everything in the way of courtesy which I can yield in justice to my State; but when appeals to my better feelings, and to my courtesy, are made, which involve a surrender of the rights of my constituents and of my State, I feel that more is asked than I can give. If, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, the Senator from Delaware thinks he will be prepared to go on in two days, and with the hope that when that time shall have expired, other Senators will be prepared to pursue the discussion, so far as it is to be considered at all, I am willing to vote for a postponement for that period. Beyond that I do not feel disposed to go.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I hope there will not be any serious objection to granting to the Senator from Delaware that which he asks. Personally, I have no wish to delay the passage of any of these bills; no wish to discuss them; no desire to occupy time upon them; but I am very certain that at no time since I have been a member of this body, would such a request, supported by such reasons, be followed by anything else, on the part of the Senate, than an acquiescence in the proposal of the gentleman who asks the favor. With regard to the suggestion of my friend from Mississippi, that we shall be called upon to postpone another week for another gentleman, permit me to say that, if we were to adopt that idea as the rule by which we should determine upon an application to extend a courtesy to any gentleman of the Senate, we should have to begin and refuse giving courtesy at all, because, undoubtedly, that courtesy may be abused; but I can assure him of one thing: as far as I am concerned, if I shall discover any disposition on the part of any Senator to pursue such a course as he has suggested, he will never command my vote for aiding him in it. But the case is this: the Senator from Delaware says he wishes to discuss the whole principle of these appropriations. He is not prepared to do it now, but will be on Monday. It is suggested to postpone to Wednesday or Thursday; but I think my friends will perceive in a moment that that postponement will accomplish no purpose, because we have not the slightest reason to believe that by Thursday the Nebraska bill will be out of the way. I think, therefore, that what is asked ought to be conceded to the honorable Senator, and that, in reality, my friend from Mississippi will be mistaken in supposing that there will be any disposition in the Senate—and I hope there will be none in any Senator—to make, by a succession of applications of this kind, an unnecessary delay in the passage of the bill.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, it has seemed to me, for several days past, that, instead of being in the Senate of the United States, we had fallen into a county court, and that, when a Senator, standing upon his own sense of his responsibilities to his constituents and to the country, appealed to the Senate for the customary courtesy, his statements were examined and scrutinized with the care which is taken to scrutinize the affidavits of a party seeking to delay the trial of a cause. Now, sir, I think it is due to the honorable Senator from Delaware that he should not be placed in a false position on this subject. Surprise is expressed that he is not prepared at this time, and that he may not be prepared on Thursday next, to discuss the general principle involved in the policy of granting lands for railroads to the States. Sir, I should, on the other hand, be very much surprised if he was, under all the circumstances, prepared now; and I shall esteem it very creditable to him when I see that he is prepared to discuss this great question on Monday next—the day he himself assigns. No Senator who heard the argument—distinguished for its acumen, distinguished for its ability, distinguished for its research, and distinguished for its candor—with which that Senator furnished this body upon the question of the contested-election case from Vermont, can be surprised that he is not prepared to follow that, within three or four days, by a similar argument upon the question on which he desires to address the Senate. Besides that, I doubt not that the honorable Senator has been pressed, as we have all been pressed, by the great question which now occupies the attention of the Senate, to the exclusion of everything else; and has felt the necessity of being prepared to express his opinion upon it to-day, because a vote might be required of him to-day.

I have made these remarks because I thought there was reason to fear injustice would be done to the honorable Senator by supposing that he ought to be prepared to discuss this subject at this moment. I have always voted for every one of these bills, though I have no personal interest in them.

Mr. SLIDELL. If the honorable Senator from New York will excuse me, I will state, that, after consultation with the friends of these various bills, we assent to the suggestion that the consideration of this bill be postponed to Monday next, with, however, the distinct understanding, in which I hope the Senate will generally acquiesce, that when it does come up on Monday, the bill will be disposed of.

Mr. SEWARD. I will barely add that I have, of course, nothing to say on that subject. I am, with the honorable Senator, in favor of these bills; but I give notice to honorable Senators who desire the passage of these bills, that, if they expect my vote at the price of a courtesy due to a Senator from one of the old thirteen States, they will never get it, even for their bills.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. As one of those Senators, I repudiate the lecture which has been read to me by the honorable Senator from New York. It is in as bad taste as is his eulogium in reference to a pending matter, on which the Senate of the United States are called to vote, touching a high constitutional question. I submit to none from him. I take none from him. I throw it back upon him.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to know if it is the general understanding that the bills will be acted upon on the day assigned? I do not understand the remarks of the Senator from New York. Does he consent to, or does he mean by what he has said, to protest against any such understanding that the Senate will then by general consent take the matter up?

Mr. SEWARD. I will inform the honorable Senator, so far as I am concerned, that I am with him for taking up the bill and passing it at any time desired.

Mr. JOHNSON. I merely wanted to know if it is the understanding that we shall then dispose of the bill, because if it is, I will go for the motion to postpone; but, if otherwise, I will not go for it.

Mr. DAWSON. I beg to say that I enter into no contract that we shall take up the bill and pass it. I cannot consent to that.

Mr. JOHNSON. Take it up and vote upon it.

Mr. DAWSON. If we have time, I shall certainly make no opposition to take it up and go into the discussion of it; but I beg for myself not to be bound to vote for the bill when it comes up.

Mr. BROWN. Nobody expects that.

Mr. JOHNSON. All that we ask is, that when these bills come up they shall be considered without any unnecessary delay.

Mr. DAWSON. All that I mean to be understood from my acquiescence is, that it shall be considered polite towards these bills to take them up on the day named.

The motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until Monday next was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN. I now move that all the other bills upon the Calendar, which have been reported on favorably by the Committee on Public Lands, and which propose to make grants of the public lands to the several States for railroad purposes, be postponed to the same day.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that all these bills are framed in exactly the same way, with no variation, except as to the termini, and, of course, the quantity of land to be taken, according to the length of the road.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all.

Mr. GWIN. My object is that we may take up all these bills and pass them at once; not pass one to-day, and one six weeks hence, which I think unjust.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman takes it for granted that all these bills will be passed. [Laughter.] I have no doubt of it.

Mr. BADGER. By common consent it can be understood that these bills will come up one after the other.

Mr. GWIN's motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent in the consideration thereof, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 13, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, a Representative elect from the State of Pennsylvania, in the place of Henry A. Muhlenberg, deceased, appeared and qualified by taking the usual oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in obedience to a resolution of the House, passed on the 30th ultimo, transmitting a statement, showing, as near as may be, the number of acres of the public lands which have been donated by the Government of the United States, and for what purposes, specifying the quantity for each purpose, and in what States and Territories; which was ordered to lie upon the table and be printed.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the consideration of a privileged motion.

REMONSTRANCE AGAINST NEBRASKA BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present the remonstrance of one hundred citizens of Savannah, Illinois, against the passage of any bill organizing Nebraska Territory so that slavery can be introduced there.

Mr. HAMILTON. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WASHBURN. Is it in order to move to suspend the rules to enable me to present the remonstrance?

The SPEAKER. It is not, because there is already a privileged motion pending over from Friday. It is a motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to lay upon the table a bill reported from a Committee of the Whole House, and after a demand for the previous question had been seconded. Is it the pleasure of the House to proceed to the consideration of that bill?

Mr. WHEELER. What is it?

The SPEAKER. It is Senate bill (No. 2) "to indemnify the State of Indiana for the failure of title to a township of land granted to said State on her admission into the Union in 1816."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe that my colleague, [Mr. DUNHAM,] who has that bill especially in charge, is willing that it shall lie over until the next private bill day.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the bill will go over until Friday next.

No objection was made.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Is it in order now to make a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I submitted a motion to suspend the rules just now, and the Chair decided that it was not in order.

The SPEAKER. Nor was it in order until the bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was disposed of. The gentleman from Illinois did not address the Chair after that bill was disposed of, until the gentleman from Kentucky had been recognized. This is the day set apart for the call of the States for resolutions, beginning with the State of New York.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I am about to make a motion to suspend the rules, with a view to take up the motion that was laid upon the table the other day, to reconsider the vote by which the deficiency bill was rejected.

It seems to be due from the Committee of Ways and Means, perhaps, to make an effort, in some form, to resuscitate that or some other bill; and in order that the House may exactly know what is proposed to be accomplished, if it will allow me, I will make a statement, not extending over two minutes, stating the steps designed to be taken.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the gentleman shall be indulged in the statement he proposes?

[Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I propose to move to suspend the rules to take up the motion to reconsider, which was laid upon the table. If the rules be suspended the motion will be taken up, and the question will be reconsidered. If reconsidered, then it will be necessary to move to suspend the rules, with a view to reconsider the vote by which the bill was engrossed for a third reading.

If the vote be reconsidered the question will then be, "Shall the bill rejected the other day be engrossed for a third reading?" At that point of time, I propose, if I can get the floor, to move the bill which I hold in my hand as a substitute for the deficiency bill, which was rejected the other day; and it is fair to notify the House that I shall move the previous question, which would bring the House to a vote between the bill which I hold in my hand and the bill which was rejected the other day.

I will only add, that the bill in my hand is the deficiency bill as it came from the Committee of Ways and Means, together with the amendments put upon it by the recommendations of the committees of this House. If this course be pursued it will give the House an opportunity to take either of the bills, or neither, whichever it may prefer.

Mr. McMULLIN obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky proposes to move to suspend the rules of the House, for the purpose of taking from the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the deficiency bill was defeated.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I will only add, that the effect will be to put both bills within the power of the House; and it can take either of them, or neither of them, whichever it may prefer. I now move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] was recognized by the Chair, and is now upon the floor.

Mr. McMULLIN. I should like to be able to gratify the gentleman in his suggestion; but differing with him, out and out, as to the parliamentary question involved, I cannot vote for the proposition. I would most respectfully suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky, and the House, whether inasmuch as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is not in his place, this question should be mooted at this time?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I will state to the gentleman that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is absent on necessary business, and that this motion is made by his consent.

Mr. WHEELER. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, obtained the floor.

Mr. McMULLIN. I have not yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Georgia. He may have sought the floor for the submission of a privileged question.

Mr. STEPHENS. I suggest that the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw what he has stated in respect to a substitute for the bill, because, perhaps, a majority of the House will not take that substitute. I would propose that he barely adopt such course as will again bring that bill before the House. If the gentleman persist in stating that he will offer the substitute, and call the previous question upon it, so as to bring the House to a direct vote between the bills, both, perhaps, will again be lost.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has the floor. If discussion or explanation be allowed it is the gentleman's right to be heard.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I only wish to make a single remark, in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. McMULLIN. I will yield to the gentleman, if it be the pleasure of the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. If the steps I have suggested be taken, when the question comes up on the substitute I propose, if a majority of the House is in favor of that substitute, it will be put in; if a majority is opposed to the substitute it will be voted down, and the question will then recur on the deficiency bill, which was defeated the other day. So the House will have choice between the two bills.

Mr. FLORENCE. It is only fair, then, that the substitute be read to the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. It will be read.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question, that I may understand this proposition, and I trust that he will be kind enough to give it answer. I would inquire whether the bill he proposes to submit as a substitute embraces the appropriation made by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I will reply to the gentleman, that it does not embrace all of those items.

It simply embraces the items reported from the Committee of Ways and Means originally, together with those items which were added to it on the suggestion of other committees, and recommended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for adoption by the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] allow me to make a suggestion?

Several MEMBERS. I object to this discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must interpose. The matter cannot be discussed unless by the unanimous consent of the House. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] has made a motion to suspend the rules of the House, for the purpose indicated by him, which is to submit a motion to take from the table the vote by which the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table. No debate, and no explanation, is in order, unless it be conceded by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. WALSH. I object to anything further on the subject.

The SPEAKER. If explanation or discussion be allowed at all, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] has the floor for that purpose.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] to allow me to make a suggestion.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia will state his question of order.

Mr. LETCHER. I desire to know, Mr. Speaker, whether this debate is in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I insist on our adhering to the rules of the House.

A MEMBER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] to suspend the rules.

Mr. HAMILTON. I desire to ask a question for information: Whether it is not competent for the Committee of Ways and Means to have a suspension of the rules to refer the original bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the House to take that course by a suspension of the rules.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would like to understand what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] himself—

The SPEAKER (interrupting). The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] was addressing the Chair.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me but a moment to make an inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The Chair must enforce the rule.

Mr. OLDS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair repeats that no discussion or explanation is in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I object to anything further in the matter.

The SPEAKER. All debate and explanation is out of order.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to know if the Chair has entertained, under the rules of the House, the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did entertain it; it is competent for the House to do almost anything, when it chooses to set aside the rules of the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I hope the House will adhere to the rules.

Mr. McMULLIN. I object to the gentleman from Kentucky, as being clearly out of order, and his course being in violation of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is to suspend all law.

Mr. WHEELER. Has not this matter been laid upon the table once?

Mr. ORR. I rise to ask a question for information. I desire to know if it is competent for the Committee of Ways and Means to report another—a new—deficiency bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt about it. It will be for the Committee of Ways and Means itself to determine what its powers are.

Mr. ORR. Then I hope the committee will adopt that course.

Mr. PECKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether in the case any other than the ordinary course should be taken? Why should not the Committee of Ways and Means retire and report, in the ordinary way, another deficiency bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be bound to arrest anything like discussion, because it is entirely out of order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to ask the Chair a single question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair repeats that discussion and explanation is out of order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I object to the gentleman propounding any question, except a point of order be raised.

Several MEMBERS. "Question!" "Question!"

Mr. FLORENCE. I do raise a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will state his point of order.

Mr. FLORENCE. The point of order which I raise is this: that the gentleman from Kentucky, having indicated his purpose to present a bill, it is in order to have that bill read at the Clerk's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that it is not in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Very well; that is all which I desired to know.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I find that the steps to be taken, and the objections made, are too numerous to enable me to carry the proposition I have made; and if it be in order to withdraw such motion I will do so, and move to suspend the rules so as to enable me to introduce the bill which I hold in my hand, and move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ORR. That will do.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I have already indicated the nature of the bill I propose to introduce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky submits a motion—

Mr. CAMPBELL (interrupting). I desire to make an inquiry. It is, whether the Committee of Ways and Means could not, when they are called upon in the regular order of committees, introduce this bill, without the necessity of a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. Most certainly.

Mr. ORR. They might, when that committee is called, but the committee may not be called again for a week or more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] submits a motion that the rules be suspended, so as to enable him to introduce a new deficiency bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. No, sir; the Chair mistakes. It is not a new bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, but one introduced by me, upon my own responsibility. It is the bill originally reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, with such amendments as were recommended by the standing committees, and adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether the parliamentary law is not express and emphatic, that a matter being disposed of it is not in order, at the same session, to bring in the same, in substance, before the House, no matter how it varies in detail? Is not that a fundamental parliamentary law?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will respond. Suppose that—

Mr. DISNEY. The Chair will excuse me. One word further. I desire to say, that in my judgment—of the correctness of which I have no sort of doubt—that the decision of the Chair, and the original motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, were strictly parliamentary, and that they indicated the only mode in which this House can arrive at the consideration of this bill at this time. But the pending motion is unparliamentary and dangerous as a precedent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the rule referred to by the gentleman from Ohio may be suspended by the positive order of the House.

That is the subject upon which we are now engaged. The House can suspend not only that rule, but every other rule standing in the way of the introduction of that bill. Of this the Chair has no doubt.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to inquire of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, whether the bill which he proposes to introduce has ever been submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to this discussion. We have already wasted time enough upon the matter, and I object to any conversation which is not in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I contend that it is in order to inquire whether the bill has been reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, or submitted by them.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. With the permission of the Speaker, I will state what the bill is which is proposed to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is the bill as it originally came from the Committee of Ways and Means, together with the amendments recommended by the standing committees of this House. These are all the contents of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PRESTON (interrupting). I ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether the amendments are those which the Committee of the Whole ordered?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The amendments put into the bill by the Committee of the Whole are not in this bill, with the exception of those which were recommended by the standing committees of the House. If this bill is introduced and referred to the Committee of the Whole, gentlemen can move their amendments again.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has this bill been submitted and acted upon by the Committee of Ways and Means, and recommended by them?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. It has not been formally acted upon by that committee, but a majority of them have requested that it should be submitted to the House.

Mr. WHEELER demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman from Kentucky says that this bill has received the approbation or sanction of a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means. I beg leave to say to the House, that that committee has not been called together, and that I have never seen or heard of this bill before. It has not received my sanction.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I wish to make a personal statement. I did not offer this bill as coming from the Committee of Ways and Means; but, after conversation with a majority of that committee, I determined, on my own responsibility, to take this course, believing that it will meet their approval. In fact, I do it at the request of a majority of the members of the committee. It is not the act of the committee, but my own individual act. My only object is to put it in the power of the House, if dissatisfied with the bill rejected the other day, to pass such a one as a reference to the wants and interests of the country may require.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have never been consulted in the matter, but I desire that the bill may be recommended to the Committee of Ways and Means, or referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I know nothing about the bill.

The question was then taken upon Mr. BRECKINRIDGE's motion, and there were—yeas 107, nays 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barksdale, Belcher, Bennett, Benton, Bliss, Bocoec, Breckinridge, Bridges, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Coquitt, Craige, Curtis, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dent, Dowdell, Drum, Dunbar, Eastuan, Eddy, Edmundson, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Everhart, Fenton, Flagler, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Green, Greenwood, Grow, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hughes, Johnson, Roland Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kidwell, Kittredge, Kurtz, Lane, Latham, Macdonald, McMullin, McNair, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Middleswarth, Smith Miller, Milson, Morrison, Murray, Nichols, Noble, Olds, Orr, Packer, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Puryear, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Ruffin, Seymour, Shaw, Singleton, Skelton, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hestor L. Stevens, Stratton, Straub, Thurston, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walker, Warren, Wells, John Wentworth, Daniel B. Wright, and Zollicoffer—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Ball, Benson, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chase, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Cullom, Dick, Dickinson, Disney, Edgerton, Edmands, Farley, Florence, Grey, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Haven, Hiestler, Hill, Hilyer, Hunt, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Kerr, Knox, Letcher, Lindsey, McCulloch, McQueen, Matteson, Maurice, John G. Miller, Morgan, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Peck, Peckham, Pennington, John Perkins, Pratt, Preston, Pringle, Reese, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Rogers, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Sapp, Simmons, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Alexander H. Stephens, Andrew Stuart, John L. Taylor, Tracy, Tweed, Upham, Walbridge, Walsh, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wheeler, and Hendrick B. Wright—72.

Two thirds not voting in the affirmative, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The House having indicated its sense in this respect, I wish now to make the motion which I originally made. I will make another effort for the purpose of getting the bill, in some form, before the House. I move to suspend the rules, so as to take from the table the motion by which the deficiency bill was rejected.

Mr. HAMILTON. Upon that proposition I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. What was the effect of the last vote?

The SPEAKER. The rules were not suspended. Mr. WENTWORTH. I would ask the Chair if the motion now pending is the original motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to make the inquiry of the Chair, as I desire to vote understandingly, what the question really is before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is a motion to suspend the rules, so as to take from the table the motion by which the deficiency bill was rejected.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If this motion prevail, and the rules are suspended, will not the question then be, "Shall the vote by which the deficiency bill was rejected be reconsidered?"

The SPEAKER. As put by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] such is not the understanding of the Chair. The gentleman from Kentucky will again state his motion.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. My motion is to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking from the table the motion laying upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the deficiency bill was rejected.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will explain in a few words my understanding of the question. A motion was made to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and carried. If the House now reconsider the question, the question then coming up will be, "Shall the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table?" The yeas and nays will be called upon that. If the House vote that down, and the motion to reconsider is not laid upon the table, the question then will recur "Shall the bill be reconsidered?" That is the exact course which I indicated the other day, by which the House could again get up the bill.

The question was then taken upon Mr. BRECKINRIDGE's motion; and there were—yeas 102, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barksdale, Benson, Bissell, Bliss, Brocock, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bugz, Chastain, Clark, Cox, Craige, Crocker, Curtis, Thomas Davis, Dean, De Witt, Dickinson, Disney, Dunbar, Eddy, Edmundson, Edmondson, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Ewing, Farley, Fenton, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Haven, Henn, Hibbard, Hiester, Hill, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kerr, Kidwell, Latham, Lindley, Linsley, Macdonald, McNair, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Milson, Nichols, Noble, Mordecai Oliver, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Preston, Puryear, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Robbins, Rogers, Simmons, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William K. Smith, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Straub, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tweed, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walker, Israel Washburn, Wells, Daniel B. Wright, and Zollicoffer—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Ashe, Ball, Belcher, Bennett, Benton, Bridges, Campbell, Carpenter, Chandler, Chase, Chrisman, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Corwin, Cullum, Cumming, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dent, Dowdell, Drum, Edgerton, Florence, Grev, Hamilton, Andrew J. Harlan, Hendricks, Billyer, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kitredge, Knox, Kurtz, Lane, Letcher, McCulloch, McMullin, McQueen, Matteson, Maurice, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Packer, Peck, Peckham, Pennington, John Perkins, Pratt, Pringle, Reese, Thomas Ritchey, Ruffin, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Sapp, Seward, Seymour, Shannon, Shaw, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Andrew Stuart, Trout, Walbridge, Walsh, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, John Wentworth, Wheeler, and Hendrick B. Wright—77.

So (two thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have a resolution which I desire to offer, and to which, if the House will hear it read, I presume there will be no objection.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move to suspend the rules, to enable me to offer the resolution; and now I ask that it may be read for information.

The resolution was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to transmit to this House a statement showing the original cost of each custom-house, including expenditure for sites as well as for construction and improvements, and that he also state the entire expenditure for the last three years for salaries and other items of each of said custom-houses; and that he also state the amount of revenue collected at each place during the like period, so arranging the statement as to enable Congress to see at what points the expenditures exceed the returns.

Mr. McMULLIN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. It is in order to move to suspend the rules. That motion has been made by the gentleman from North Carolina, and is, therefore, for the time being, the regular order of business.

Mr. McMULLIN. We are already in possession of the information which the gentleman seeks.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The information is not in the possession of the House in the form for which the resolution provides.

The question was put, and fifty-seven rose in the affirmative.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask for tellers upon the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Olds and Vail appointed.

The question was taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes not counted.

So (two thirds of a quorum not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. WENTWORTH of Illinois. I have a resolution which I desire to introduce.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce the resolution. I ask that it may be read for information, and to its reading I ask the earnest attention of the House, for I assure them it is a matter of great importance.

The resolution was read for information, by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed, whenever they omit or change the estimates sent to them by any Department of the Government, to report the reason for such omission and change in writing.

Mr. WENTWORTH. If this resolution be adopted, the House will be enabled to act understandingly. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not yet before the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I ask that the resolution may be read again. We want to understand distinctly upon what we are called upon to vote.

The resolution was again read by the Clerk.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this be adopted, we out West shall understand when—

The SPEAKER. No discussion can be permitted until the rules are suspended, and the resolution regularly before the House.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I demand the yeas and nays, and call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered—only three members rising.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Then I give up all hope of information. [Laughter.]

The question was then put; and (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. McMULLIN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Resolutions are in order from the State of New York.

Mr. MACE. I desire to offer a resolution, and if it is objected to I shall move to suspend the rules.

Mr. SAGE. I object to it.

Mr. MACE. Then I move to suspend the rules.

A MEMBER. Read the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to investigate all mistakes or frauds in the disbursement of money appropriated to the Collins steamers for mail service, and other steamers for like services, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. WHEELER. I object to that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules.

The question was then put, and (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

The question was then put on the resolution, and it was adopted.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Resolutions are in order from the State of New York.

Mr. FLAGLER submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to transmit to this House, as soon as practicable, a copy of the survey of the harbor at the mouth of the Twelve Mile Creek, on Lake Ontario, made pursuant to an order of the Department in 1852.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the consent of the House to introduce to-day the report from the joint committee relative to the wreck of the steamer San Francisco, that it may be disposed of at once.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to suspend the rules.

The question was put, and (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. MAURICE, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

"A bill relative to ocean steamships."

[Here a message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of Mr. SIDNEY WEBSTER, his Private Secretary.]

Mr. MURRAY. I should be glad, Mr. Speaker, to have the message, which has just been received from the President of the United States, read to the House.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. OLIVER, of New York, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions:

"A bill to provide pensions for revolutionary service."

Also, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

"A bill to provide pensions to certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the war with Great Britain, declared by the United States 18th of June, 1812."

Mr. WHEELER. I now move to take up the resolution which I submitted two weeks since.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House for what reasons the appropriation of $50,000, made by the last Congress for the improvement of the navigation of the Hudson river has been withheld; and, also, why some definite action has not been taken in reference to said improvement.

Mr. HAMILTON. I object.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to suspend the rules, for the purpose I have indicated.

The question was taken, and the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. CUMMING offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making the port of Brooklyn, in the State of New York, a port of delivery, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. I offer the following resolution, so that the Committee of Ways and Means may again have the subject of the deficiencies of appropriations in their possession:

Resolved, That so much of the President's message, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, as relates to deficiencies in former appropriations be re-referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to debate that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution accordingly lays over.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the third and fourth sections of the act of Congress, entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," approved 2d March, 1833, so as to give the Supreme Court of the United States jurisdiction of all cases, whether arising under the revenue laws, or any other law of the United States; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

The question was put, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. STRAUB. I desire to present a memorial of citizens of the Society of Friends, in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, against the introduction of slavery into the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Mr. Speaker, can this memorial come in under the rule? If not, I object to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Chair supposes, is aware of his right to present it at the Clerk's desk, and have it referred.

Mr. STRAUB. I am aware I can take that course, and will do so. I now beg to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be requested to inquire into the expediency of reporting a resolution directing the printing of thirty thousand additional copies of the Mechanical and Agricultural Patent Office Report of 1853, for the use of new members of the House.

Mr. WHEELER. I propose to debate that resolution.

Mr. HAVEN. It goes to the Committee on Printing without a vote, and so it goes without debate.

The SPEAKER. The resolution just reported will, under the express rule of the House, go to the Committee on Printing without a vote of the House, and will not, in the opinion of the Chair, go over as other resolutions, proposed to be debated, do.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GROW. I propose the following resolution, which is under the influence of the same rule:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the Report of the Postmaster General be printed, for the use of the Post Office Department.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule referred to, that resolution goes to the Committee on Printing. It was so ordered.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania. I move the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of Judges of the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

The question was put, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into and report, at as early a day as possible, on the expediency of causing to be constructed or purchased, in the city of Philadelphia, a building for the accommodation of the courts for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, for the accommodation of the marshal and other officers of the court, and for the safe keeping of the archives, and also for the use of the post office in Philadelphia.

Mr. HESTER, by unanimous consent, presented the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of changing the present mode of anticipating the payment of the public debt of the United States, by withdrawal of the definite offers of the Secretary of the Treasury, and substituting therefor invitations to the holders of said debt to submit proposals for the surrender thereof, at rates to be specified according to some uniform system in such proposals, the lowest and most favorable of which may be accepted by the Secretary of the Treasury, at such times and rates, and in such amounts, as shall be deemed expedient; and that the said committee report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. FLORENCE. I propose to present to the House a memorial similar to that just presented by my colleague, [Mr. STRAUB.]

Mr. WALSH. I object; such memorials can be sent to the Clerk's desk, under the rule.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to say, that inasmuch as I occupy a position opposed to the memorialists —

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the House to extend to me the same courtesy which was accorded to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CUTTING,] and to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. RIDDLE] the other day.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to suspend the rules, so as to enable me to explain the reasons why I present the memorial which I hold in my hand.

Mr. WALSH. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the memorial contains any written names, and whether it is competent for this House to take cognizance of any but written names?

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not consider it proper at this time to answer the question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WALSH.]

The SPEAKER. This discussion can only be indulged by the unanimous consent of the House.

Several Voices. "I object."

The question recurring upon the motion to suspend the rules, it was put, and decided in the affirmative, upon a division—ayes 94, noes not counted.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am very much indebted to the courtesy of the House for this privilege. I intended to say, that I held in my hand a memorial of the religious society of Friends, of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, petitioning Congress against the passage of a law legalizing the introduction of slavery into Nebraska.

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a question of order. I understood that the rules were suspended for the purpose of allowing the gentleman to introduce the memorial, and not to make a speech.

The SPEAKER. The rules were suspended for the purpose of allowing the gentleman to make an explanation, and not for the purpose of enabling him to present the memorial which he held in his hand.

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman from New York is out of order, as he very often is.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I differ entirely with these petitioners. I represent in this House a large number of the people who have so petitioned. I agree with them in scarcely a single declaration made in this petition; perhaps in none which bears any relation to the bill which has been introduced for the organization of the Territory of Nebraska. I do not admit, with these memorialists, that the passage of the bill submitted from the Committee on Territories by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] contemplates the introduction of slavery into Nebraska. These petitioners say that it does. I do not so understand the object of the bill. I understand it to be perfectly in accordance with the action of Congress in enacting the series of measures known as the compromise acts of 1850, which brought peace to the country, and to the councils of the nation. This enactment I have, by my vote in this House, approved, and it, in my judgment, meets the approbation of a majority of my constituents. Inasmuch, then, as the petitioners are respectable and intelligent citizens of Pennsylvania, and members of a religious society of philanthropic and benevolent individuals, with many of whom I am intimately acquainted—a portion of them being among the most estimable of my constituents—I only desired to state to the House that they had so petitioned, and, in presenting it, to say I did not agree with them; and that I intend, unless it is very materially altered, to vote for the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON;] for I conceive it proper and just, and is, most effectually, in my mind, best calculated to put a stop to the periodical agitation of the question of slavery in Congress, and in the Union. I am very much obliged for the courtesy of the House; and I desire, Mr. Speaker, to reiterate the deep sense of the obligation I am under for the kindness which has been so generously, and with so much unanimity, extended to me.

Mr. MILLSON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of removing the marine hospital near Norfolk, to Craney Island, or some other point on Elizabeth river."

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish to this House, at as early a day as practicable, a copy of the circulars addressed by him to persons engaged in manufacturing and commercial pursuits, soliciting their views upon the best mode of adjusting the tariff, so as to bring it within the revenue standard, together with the replies received from all such persons.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GOODE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be prepared for the use of this House tabular statements exhibiting:

First. The area of each State and Territory, expressed in square miles and in acres.

Second. The extent of public domain now remaining in each State and Territory, expressed in acres.

Third. The extent of public domain alienated by the Government of the United States in each State and Territory, distinguishing between that sold for a valuable consideration and that given, granted, ceded, or conveyed, for the purposes of education, public buildings, internal improvements, and miscellaneous objects.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDSON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That upon a call of the yeas and nays, every member be permitted to vote who is without the bar of the House before the final result of the vote is declared by the Speaker.

I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WALSH. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to suspend the rules, so that the resolution may be adopted at this time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow me, I think I can make a suggestion, which will obviate the necessity for the adoption of the resolution he proposes to introduce. That branch of the duty assigned to the Committee on Rules, and to which reference is had in this resolution, has been attended to by them. A majority of the committee have agreed to report in favor of allowing any person who is within the bar before the call of the roll is finished to vote.

Mr. JONES. It will be a long time before that report is acted upon. The case embraced in this resolution is so clearly and manifestly right in itself that I think we ought to act upon it now. The object of the resolution is merely that any member shall have the right to vote before the result is announced.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. EDMUNDSON,] that he modify his resolution so as to provide that any member may vote before the call of the roll is finished. As it reads now, it is before the final result of the vote is declared by the Speaker.

Mr. EDMUNDSON. I accept the modification suggested by the gentleman from Ohio.

The resolution, as modified, was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That upon a call of the yeas and nays every member be permitted to vote who is without the bar of the House before the call of the roll is finished.

The question then being on the suspension of the rules, it was taken and decided in the negative.

Mr. EDMUNDSON demanded tellers, which were ordered; and Messrs. DEAN and BOCKOCK appointed.

The question was again put; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 89, noes not counted.

Mr. JONES, of New York. As this resolution, if adopted, will lead to very loose legislation upon the part of the House, I demand the yeas and nays upon the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and the result was—yeas 105, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Jas C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, Thos. H. Bayly, Ball, Banks, Barksdale, Belcher, Benton, Bockock, Boyce, Bridges, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chandler, Chase, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Clingan, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Cumming, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dent, De Witt, Dick, Dickinson, Dowdell, Eastman, Edwards, Edmundson, English, Etheridge, Everhart, Ewing, Flagler, Florence, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Greenwood, Grow, Andrew J. Harlan, Hastings, Hendricks, Hester, Hill, Hughes, Hunt, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Knox, Latham, Letcher, Lindsley, McMullin, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Mayall, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Packer, Pennington, John Perkins, Pratt, Preston, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Rogers, Russell, Sapp, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Straub, Andrew Stuart, Thurston, Tweed, Upham, Vail, Wade, Walbridge, Wheeler, Witte, and Hendrick B. Wright—105.

NAYS—Messrs. Appleton, Bissell, Breckinridge, Chamberlain, Cobb, Colquitt, Craige, Cullom, Drum, Dunham, Eddy, Edgerton, Ellison, Farley, Grey, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Haven, Hibbard, Hillyer, Daniel T. Jones, Roland Jones, Kurtz, Lane, Macdonald, McNair, McQueen, Matteson, Maurice, Smith Miller, Millson, Morgan, Murray, Nichols, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Peck, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Puryear, Reese, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Sage, Seymour, Shaw, Simmons, Singleton, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Tracy, Trout, Vansant, Walker, Walsh, Warren, John Wentworth, and Zollcofer—61.

So (two thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Pending the call of the roll—

Mr. BENSON asked to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman within the bar when his name was called?

Mr. BENSON. I was not, having been called out by a friend not privileged one minute before; and that is the reason why I wish to vote "aye," because my name stands so early on the roll.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can only vote by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. BOCKOCK introduced a joint resolution, providing the manner in which naval supplies may be furnished in certain cases therein mentioned; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I wish to state to the House, that if the resolution just read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, be approved by that committee, when it shall be reported to the House by them, I will ask to put it upon its passage, for particular reasons, which I shall then give to the House. I make this statement for the purpose of requesting members to examine it, so that they may be prepared to act upon it when it shall come up for consideration.

Mr. FULLER. I have a resolution which I desire to offer.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The introduction of the resolution having been objected to, resolutions are in order from the State of Virginia.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. At the request of my friend from Maine, [Mr. FULLER,] I offer the resolution which he just now asked consent to offer.

The resolution was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of printing ten thousand extra copies of so much of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and accompanying papers as relates to the present tariff laws.

Mr. WHEELER. I propose to debate that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will go to the Committee on Printing, under the rules of the House, as a matter of necessity.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now offer the resolution for which I asked the unanimous consent of the House some minutes ago.

The following resolution was then read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to transmit to this House a statement showing the original cost of each custom-house, including expenditure for sites as well as for construction and improvements, and that he also state the entire expenditure for the last three years for salaries and other items of each of said custom houses; and that he also state the amount of revenue collected at each place during the like period, so arranging the statement as to enable Congress to see at what points the expenditures exceed the returns.

Mr. ASHE offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to the following effect: That the commissioners of the town of Wilmington, North Carolina, be authorized to levy and collect a tonnage duty, not exceeding four cents per ton, upon all vessels not less than sixty tons, for the purpose of clearing out the obstructions in the mouth of Cape Fear; and that to effect that purpose, the said commissioners be authorized to pledge the receipts from said tonnage duty to pay the interest or principal, or any loan they may effect for that purpose: Provided, That the Legislature of North Carolina, at its next session, order and authorize such a tonnage duty.

Mr. CRAIG submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, if no incompatible with the public interest, be requested to inform this House whether any negotiations have been opened by the Government of the United States with the Government of Peru, for the removal of the restrictions imposed by the latter Government upon the exportation of guano from that country; and if so, what is the present state of said negotiations.

Mr. COBB. I offer the following resolution; and upon it I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report back House bill No. 25, with a recommendation that it do pass, which proposes to extend the time of the payment of the duties on railroad iron, by paying six per cent. interest per annum.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania. I propose to debate that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has demanded the previous question.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then I move that the resolution do lie upon the table.

Mr. COBB. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays; and I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ROBBINS. I call for tellers on my motion.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. DISNEY. Will the Chair cause the resolution to be read?

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. DISNEY. Such a resolution was never heard of before in a legislative body.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. You can instruct the committee to report the bill back, but you cannot instruct them as to what recommendation they shall make.

Mr. COBB. Does the gentleman mean to say that you cannot instruct a committee to report favorably on a bill?

Mr. DISNEY. I never heard of such a thing in my life.

Mr. COBB. It has been done in several cases—the bounty land bill, for instance.

Mr. DISNEY. Oh, no!

Mr. HAVEN obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Is this matter debatable.

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HAVEN. I rose simply for the purpose of inquiring if it was debatable, because if it is I desire to say a few words.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable. The question is on the motion to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question was then put; and, on a division, there were eighty-six in the affirmative. A further count was not insisted on.

So the resolution lies upon the table.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill, which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed:

"A bill for the relief of the representatives of Pierre Clermont."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest, in reference to the bill which has just been referred, that it has not been usual to order the printing of a bill until it has been reported back from the committee.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire only to pursue the customary course.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the order to print the bill will be rescinded.

There was no objection, and the order to print was rescinded.

Mr. HUNT, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

"A bill granting to the State of Louisiana the right of way, and a donation of the public land, for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Algiers on the Mississippi river to the Sabine river."

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims:

"A bill granting the right of preemption to settlers upon the public land known as the 'Maison Rouge grant.'"

Mr. DUNHAM. In my judgment the bill should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BALL offered the following resolution; which was read, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to this House the names of the different persons who, since the 4th of March, anno Domini 1853, have drawn from the Treasury of the United States any compensation, either as outfit or salary, for services as ministers, plenipotentiaries, chargés d'affaires, or secretaries of legation at foreign ports, specifying particularly the amount paid to each respectively, the date of payment thereof, and the duration of their residence at the courts to which they were commissioned."

Mr. OLDS. I move the following resolution.

Resolved, That fifteen hundred extra copies of the Postmaster General's Annual Report be printed, for the use of the Post Office Department.

Mr. OLDS. I move its reference to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The resolution goes to that committee, under the rule, without motion.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move the following resolution, and ask the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of changing the site of the military asylum, near the city of Washington, from its present location, to the estate of Mount Vernon, or a part thereof, if the same can be purchased at a reasonable price; and that the said committee also inquire and report to this House the original cost of the present site of said asylum, the quantity of land contained therein, and the amount expended in improvements up to this date; and that they report to this House, by bill or otherwise.

The question was put, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SAPP, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"A bill declaratory of the second section of the act of Congress, approved February 3, 1853, entitled 'An act to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans.'"

Mr. GREY, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

"A bill granting to the State of Kentucky public lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in that State."

Mr. PRESTON. I beg to offer the following resolution, and I ask the indulgence of the House for one second to make a statement. Under recent decisions of the courts forgeries of land warrants have not been deemed to have been provided for; and persons who have committed such forgeries have escaped punishment. I hold in my hand some land warrants, the assignments to which have been forged, and I am advised, by the appropriate Department, that the United States laws at present afford no remedy by which new warrants can be issued to persons who have been deprived of their rights under these warrants. It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that the United States should be in the same position as a bank on which forgeries are committed, and which is still responsible. I therefore ask to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary the resolution which I now introduce, together with papers which I hold in my hand, containing evidence of the fact in the cases of Lewis Felden and Frederick Walzinger, with a view that the committee may report a bill to supply the deficiency in the law.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing by law for the proper punishment of persons who may forge assignments of land warrants, or other instruments of writing affecting the rights of persons entitled to bounty lands under various laws of the United States in relation thereto; and also to provide for the issue of new warrants where the warrants have been wrongfully issued to persons not entitled to lands, or where lands have been located or patented to persons not entitled thereto, and without the negligence or wrongful act of the persons justly entitled to such bounty lands.

The question was put, and the resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky also moves that certain papers be referred to that committee. Shall it be so ordered?

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee of seven members be appointed by the Speaker to inquire and report to this House whether the appointment of military officers to superintend the manufacture of firearms at the national armories, the construction of light houses, works of river and harbor improvement, the building of custom-houses and post offices, the construction of water works for the cities of Washington and Georgetown, the extension of the United States Capitol, and the survey and management of works of internal improvement by the States, is compatible with the public interest, and consistent with the nature and character of our civil government; that said committee also inquire and report to this House how many of those military officers, in civil employment, are intrusted with the disbursement of the public funds without bond and security, and to what extent they have been allowed to make contracts and purchase materials for the public use without the usual advertisement, and how their accounts are settled at the public Treasury; that said committee further inquire whether the present embarrassment of the Engineer Department, for want of officers, complained of in the annual report of the colonel of the corps, is not occasioned by the withdrawal of said officers from their proper duties, and their employment in civil services; and whether it is expedient, under the circumstances, to grant an increase of said corps; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. STANTON. I move the previous question.

Mr. BISSELL. I move to refer that resolution to a committee.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is called for by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BISSELL. I ask the gentleman to withdraw it, in order to enable me to move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs. One branch of the subject embraced in it is already before that committee, and it is properly there.

Mr. STANTON. I would gladly accommodate the gentleman, but the committee to which he refers is the last one to which it should be sent.

Mr. BOYCE. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. ORR. I ask that the resolution may be reported again.

The resolution was again read by the Clerk.

The question recurring upon the motion to lay the resolution upon the table, it was put, and decided in the negative—ayes 42, noes not counted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. As this resolution contemplates a change of the rules as to the appointment of a select committee, I would inquire of the Chair whether it does not require a two-thirds vote to carry it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BISSELL. I wish to give notice, if this motion is not carried, that I shall move the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question then being upon sustaining the demand for the previous question, it was taken, and there were—ayes 77, noes 50.

So there was a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I demand the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the resolution; and there were—ayes 91, noes not counted.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the estimates from the various Departments of the Government as relates to deficiencies for the current fiscal year be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Upon the adoption of the resolution, I ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I offer the following resolution, directing an inquiry on the part of the Committee on Public Lands:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire and report, by bill or otherwise:

First, As to the propriety of repealing all laws requiring or authorizing the offering at public sale to the highest bidder the public lands of the United States after being surveyed, and before they are subject to private entry.

Second, As to the propriety and expediency of providing by law, that the public lands of the United States shall be sold to actual settlers in limited quantities, at prices fixed, with a view to reimburse the Government for their cost by private entry, and in no other way.

Third, As to the expediency and propriety of ceding to the States, respectively, in which they are located, the public lands of the United States, which have been subject to private entry for a period of fifteen years, upon condition that such States shall dispose of the lands so ceded to any persons except actual settlers, in quantities not exceeding one half section to each settler, for a price not exceeding ten cents per acre.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the resolution may be read again.

Mr. JONES. I will state again that it is simply a resolution of inquiry. It provides for no definite action.

The resolution was again read by the Clerk.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Is it in order to move an amendment to the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. LANE. I would like to have a quarter section inserted instead of a half section.

Mr. JONES. The committee can make that inquiry without special instructions.

Mr. LANE. Very well; I will not move to amend at this time.

Mr. BISSELL. I would inquire of the Chair if the resolution is debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not. It must go over if debated.

Mr. BISSELL. I desire to say a word in reference to it. But I do not wish to have it go over, and I will therefore refrain.

Mr. JONES. I demand tellers upon the adoption of the resolution.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and VAIL were appointed.

The question was then put; and the tellers reported—60 in the affirmative.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COBB. I move the previous question, for fear some gentleman should propose to debate the resolution. Is the demand in order at this stage?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WALSH. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order to call the previous question on a resolution which must go over if it is discussed at all?

The SPEAKER. Not after discussion has commenced. If discussion arises, the rule is that the resolution must go over, but if the previous question is demanded and sustained, discussion cannot arise, and the practice is to bring the House to a vote under the operation of the previous question.

The question was then put, and the demand for the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WALSH. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution lies over.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting bounty lands to the officers and soldiers called out by his Excellency Newton Cannon, then Governor of the State of Tennessee, in the year 1836, for service in the Florida war, and who were in the service of the United States, for a period less than one month, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BISSELL. What committee is it proposed to refer that resolution to?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BISSELL. I move to amend the resolution, by striking out "Committee on Private Land Claims," and inserting "Committee on Military Affairs" in lieu thereof. I think that a resolution of this sort, embracing a large class of cases, ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BISSELL. The Committee on Military Affairs has heretofore had jurisdiction of all such cases. Where one man comes forward claiming to have a right to land, his claim naturally goes to the Committee on Private Land Claims, but it is proposed by this resolution to embrace a very large class of cases—

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair to lay the resolution over, if discussion arises.

Mr. BISSELL. Well, I propose to discuss it.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I will agree to the gentleman's amendment, rather than that the resolution should lie over.

The SPEAKER. Is it the unanimous consent of the House that the resolution shall be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The resolution accordingly lies over.

Mr. MILLER, of Indiana, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced "A bill for the relief of Nathan Ewing, assignee of the interests of H. Richards;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill compelling the captains or owners of all American vessels, sailing from American ports, to ship a certain number of boys, between the ages of twelve and sixteen years, to instruct them in seamanship, the number to be proportioned according to the tonnage of the vessel.

Mr. LANE also submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, requested to cause to be furnished to this House, at its earliest convenience, copies of all recommendations, and other papers on file, referring in any manner to the appointment of the marshal of the United States, by the present Administration, for the district of Indiana.

Mr. PHELPS proposed to debate the resolution, and it was laid over.

Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act of September 23, 1850, granting bounty land to all minor heirs of deceased soldiers, as to extend the provisions of said act to all the heirs of said deceased soldiers who were minors at the date of the passage of said act, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STRAUB. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order. The resolution has been adopted, sending it to a different committee. The gentleman can only effect his object by moving to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the duties on salt and sugar.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana, proposed to debate the resolution, and it was laid over.

Mr. KNOX submitted the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That a special committee be appointed, with authority to act in the premises, to devise some plan for the better ventilation of this Hall.

Mr. LINDLEY, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

"A bill, entitled 'An act to amend an act providing for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States,' approved March 3, 1849."

Mr. STEVENS, of Michigan, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

"A bill to enable the United States to make use of the solar compass in the public surveys;"

"A bill to establish a land office in the lower peninsula of Michigan;"

"A bill granting land to the Territory of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of certain railroads therein;"

"A bill making a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pontiac to Lake Superior;" and

"A bill making a grant of land to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of the Port Huron and Lake Michigan railroad, from Port Huron to, or near the mouth of, Grand river, and a branch of the said railroad from Lapeer to the Straits of Mackinaw."

Mr. SMYTH, of Texas. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the propriety of greatly reducing, or wholly repealing, the duty on railroad iron.

Mr. HAMILTON. I propose to debate the resolution, and I move to lay it upon the table.

A MEMBER. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAVEN. Is it in order to make any remarks in reference to the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not; and the motion is to lay the resolution upon the table. If not objected to, it will be again reported.

No objection being made, the resolution was again read.

Mr. STRAUB. I rise to a question of order. Upon former occasions similar resolutions were introduced and voted down, and I wish to know whether it is in order to again introduce resolutions similar to those which have been voted down?

The SPEAKER. Similar resolutions are in order, in the opinion of the Chair. The question is upon the motion to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question was then taken; and decided in the affirmative—ayes 80, nays 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ball, Banks, Belcher, Benson, Bridges, Bugg, Chandler, Corwin, Crocker, Cumming, Curtis

Thomas Davis, Dean, Dickinson, Disney, Drum, Dunham, Eastman, Edmonds, Everhart, Farley, Fenton, Florence, Fuller, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Hastings, Haven, Hubbard, Hiester, Hillyer, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Letcher, McCulloch, Macdonald, McNair, Macy, Matteson, Maurice, Mencham, Middlesworth, Smith Miller, Morgan, Morrison, Murray, Packer, Peck, Peckham, Pennington, Pratt, Pringle, David Ritchie, Robbins, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Simmons, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Stratton, Straub, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Tweed, Vail, Vansant, Walbridge, Walker, Walsh, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Zollcoffer—80.

YAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Bissell, Bocoock, Breckinridge, Campbell, Chase Chastain, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Craig, Cullom, John G. Davis, De Witt, Dowdell, Dunbar, Eddy, Edgerton, Edmundson, Ellison, Etheridge, Giddings, Goode, Green, Greenwood, Hendricks, Henn, Hunt, Johnson, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Knox, Lane, Latham, Lindsley, McMullin, McQueen, Millson, Nichols, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Orr, John Perkins, Phillips, Puryear, Ready, Reese, Thomas Ritchey, Rogers, Ruffin, Sapp, Shaw, George W. Smyth, Snodgrass, Frederick P. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Andrew Stuart, Upham, Wade, Elihu B. Washburne, and Wheeler—63.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote last taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BALL offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be, and hereby is, instructed to inquire whether any legislation is necessary to enable the United States to receive back money advanced for services therefor to be performed, when the individual to whom the advance is made fails to perform the services; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WELLS. I would inquire of the Chair, before that motion is put, whether all the States have been called through for resolutions?

The SPEAKER. They have not.

The question was then taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at three o'clock and twenty minutes) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 14, 1854.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to the resolution of the 31st of January, calling for a statement of the amounts of money which have been allowed and paid under the acts of 26th of June 1834, and 29th of May, 1836, to the owners of several vessels sunk for the defense of the harbor of Baltimore; which, on the motion of Mr. PEARCE, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed for the use of the Senate.

SENATE DEBATES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from Mr. Robert Armstrong, proprietor of the Washington Union, surrendering his contract to report and publish the debates of the Senate.

On the motion of Mr. HAMLIN, the communication was referred to the Committee on Printing.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. JOHNSON. The communication from Robert Armstrong, asking to be relieved from his contract, has been referred to the Committee on Printing. My attention has been drawn to the subject, and I have no doubt, that unless we take some action in regard to the printing of our reports, there may be some embarrassment to those who do them. I therefore present the resolution which I hold in my hand, and ask that it may be considered by unanimous consent, and referred to the same committee:

Resolved, That John C. Rives, the printer of the debates for the two Houses, furnish to the Senate the same number of copies of the debates and proceedings as are now furnished to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BRIGHT.) It requires unanimous consent to consider the resolution at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; and I ask for that unanimous consent, so that the resolution may be referred to the Committee on Printing. At the proper time I shall give the reasons for it.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, praying a further appropriation for the completion of the piers at Reedy Island; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a petition of citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of any bill which will permit the introduction of slavery now, or at any future period, into the Territory of Nebraska; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of the legal representatives of Captain James Purvis, captain in the Virginia continental line, praying commutation pay and bounty lands; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. BAYARD. I have three petitions, addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives, of which I will state the substance. The petitioners respectfully request that in the organization of Nebraska, or any other Territory by law, the principle of non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, may be adhered to; so that it may neither be legislated into, nor excluded from, any Territory, but left to the disposition of the people of the Territory, subject only to the provisions and intent of the Constitution. These three memorials are all in the same language; and as the subject-matter is now pending before the Senate, I move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of Onondaga county, New York, remonstrating against the passage of the bill, in its present form, to organize the Territory of Nebraska; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the ratification of any treaty by which it is proposed to establish an international copyright between the United States and Great Britain; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ADAMS presented a memorial of the Legislature of Mississippi, praying that a grant of land be made to aid in the construction of the Mobile and New Orleans railroad, and all other railroads now in progress in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Fitchburg and its vicinity, Massachusetts, praying a reduction in the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CHASE presented a petition of the Mayor and council, and other citizens of Sandusky, Ohio, praying that the prohibition of slavery north of 36° 30', contained in the Missouri compromise, may not be repealed; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EVERETT presented the memorial of Eliza G. Townsend, praying a pension on account of the services of her late husband, Major David S. Townsend; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRATT presented a petition of officers of the Army stationed at Fort Myers, Florida, praying that the commutation price of the Army ration may be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EVANS presented the petition of Thomas D. Jervy, deputy collector of the port of Charleston, praying an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BAYARD presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, praying a further appropriation for the completion of the harbor at Port Penn, on the Delaware; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. SLIDELL, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of Harriet D. P. Baker, widow, and the children of John M. Baker, late Consul at Rio de Janeiro, praying compensation for diplomatic services alleged to have been performed by her husband, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of E. Ritchie Dorr, late

United States Consul at Buenos Ayres, praying compensation for diplomatic services alleged to have been performed by him, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to provide for the execution, by the courts of the United States, of commissions to take testimony issuing from the courts of justice of friendly nations, reported it back with sundry amendments.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. SLIDELL, it was Ordered, That the petition of Charles G. Ridgely be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CAPE FEAR RIVER.

On the motion of Mr. BADGER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill making further appropriation for the improvement of the Cape Fear river, North Carolina.

It was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is proposed by this bill to appropriate the sum of $140,000 for the year ending 30th June, 1855, to be expended under the superintendence of the Secretary of War, for the continuation of the improvement of the Cape Fear river, North Carolina, at or near its communication with the ocean. It is also proposed to appropriate the further sum of $60,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to refund to the citizens of Wilmington, North Carolina, the amounts contributed by them to that improvement, and expended thereon by the agent of the United States in charge of the work.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I wish to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina, if the bill has been reported from the Committee on Commerce, and is in accordance with an estimate from the Department?

Mr. BADGER. I will state to my friend that the bill has not been reported, for it was not referred to the committee. It was a subject perfectly understood by the Senate, and my friend at the head of the committee thought there was no necessity for a reference.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Then I rise to express my entire approbation of the course of the honorable Senator from North Carolina in reference to this matter. It is a course which I intend to pursue in regard to a subject of very great interest to the State from which I come. It is proper and right in itself that each of these bills should stand on its own merits, without being connected with any other. I shall vote for the bill with great pleasure.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill "to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens, for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801;" the question being on ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President, when this bill was postponed last week I had the floor, and designed saying a few additional words upon it, and but few. I will now, with the indulgence of the Senate, proceed to say them; premising, however, that they shall be short. I had nearly concluded my remarks; and I am now admonished, by the appearance of the desk of the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Houston,] that he is prepared for his greatest and most decisive battle; having before him a greater battery and stronger fortifications than he ever used on any former occasion.

Mr. President, I wish to say in reference to this bill, and to the claimants for whose relief it is intended, that prior to the remarks which I made last week upon it, I had never seen an original claimant for indemnity for these spoiliations, or one who was such by succession, and I had never seen an agent, or attorney, or factor, for one of these claimants in my life. I could not, therefore, be supposed to be influenced by any outside consideration, or any other feeling than that which springs from the merits of the question itself. Having said this much, I propose to conclude my remarks by asking and answering a few questions.

First, I wish to ask, are all Governments, as such, bound by their duty to their citizens and subjects to protect them in all lawful pursuits at home and abroad? Is it one of the duties of a Government (for I am always more in the habit of speaking of duties than of rights) to protect its citizens or its subjects in all lawful pursuits, at home or abroad? I apprehend that there can be no difficulty in answering this question in the affirmative. No one who has studied the duties of Governments—who has made that matter a part of his thoughts and reflections—will hesitate for a moment to answer in the affirmative. I will not doubt that every Senator here has made that subject a part of his consideration and of his study. I conclude, therefore, that it is the duty of a Government so to protect its citizens or its subjects.

The next question I ask is, were spoliation committed by France prior to 1800 on citizens of the United States in the lawful pursuit of their business or their commerce? No Senator who has read the history of the times will hesitate to answer that question in the affirmative. It is settled, beyond doubt, that large and extensive spoliation were committed by the authority of France, a Government on the other side of the Atlantic, on our citizens when pursuing their lawful avocations.

What follows then? It follows that, if this was done, it was the duty of this Government to ask, demand, have and receive indemnity; and if, by no other means it could be got, to bring that suit known to the laws of nations as the ultima ratio. It was the duty of this Government first to ask, to demand, to enforce, receive from France, and then pay over to our citizens, a full indemnity for the injuries which they sustained in the pursuit of their lawful business and commerce.

I ask, did our Government do this? True, I will be answered, they did make application after application. Time after time they applied to the French Government for indemnity for wrongs done our citizens in the pursuit of their commerce and trade; but what was the result? Did our Government demand? did they enforce the claim? did they sue for it? did they receive the indemnity? did they pay it over? Some of these questions must be answered in the affirmative, and some in the negative. The Government did ask—did demand indemnity. The United States never did sue for it; but they received it, and put it into their own coffers. They received it as an equivalent for what they owed France for the non-performance of our obligations to her. We have released her from the obligation, and we are bound to discharge it ourselves.

A citizen of the United States, or of any Government, cannot speak to a foreign Government. The only means by which he can speak, or make known his grievances to a foreign Government, is through the agents of his own Government. It is always the business and always the duty of a Government thus to speak for its citizens and enforce their rights and just claims. In this case the citizen's right was abandoned by the action of the Government, expressly cut off, expressly waived, annihilated, and placed upon the shoulders of the Government at home.

Sir, I know that the debates and documents upon this subject have shown that the Administration, when our merchantmen were rather drawing in their adventures, and hesitating to go to sea for fear of further and more ruinous captures, advised them by public proclamation to go on with their commerce, to push it to any extent, to all portions of the earth where they had a right to go, and that the Government would indemnify them. I care not, however, about any such declaration on the part of our Government. It was only reaffirming what is the eternal duty of the Government to do, and the immutable right of the citizen or subject to have done. No Government, just coming into existence, need reaffirm and acknowledge upon paper all its rights and obligations to its citizens. They are well known, and well understood. Whatever may be the form of Government, whether imperious or liberal, whether the voice of the people controls, or whether an individual controls it, the obligation of the Government to its citizens or subjects is alike the same. It is of no use to say to me that the Constitution of the United States has provided that private property, as in this instance, shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. That is only a reassertion of it, it is only reducing to paper in the Constitution what is the immutable law of right or wrong, what all Governments which recognize civilization as their rule, and the laws of nations as entitled to consideration, are bound to do.

The whole of it results in simply this, without going into the whole history of the transaction: that the Government of the United States has not protected its citizens in their lawful pursuits; that it has appropriated the proceeds, which it should have collected and paid over to our citizens, to its own use, and put it in its own coffers. In other words, the Government of the United States has used these claims as a set-off, as it is termed in law, against the obligation which it owed to France. Then in what condition are you placed, unless you disgorge an equal amount and pay it to your citizens?

I can see but one way of doing justice. I envy not the man who has a bias or prejudice against these claims growing out of the long delay which has ensued since they were first presented. I wish to lead him to a different conclusion. I admit—and it is my only regret connected with this matter—that I blush for the injustice of my country, when I recollect that for more than half a century my fellow-citizens have begged here, year after year, at the door of the National Legislature, demanding justice, demanding that you shall disgorge from the Treasury their money, which you have wrongfully, wantonly, and wickedly placed there.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WELLER. As the yeas and nays have been ordered on this question, I shall be driven to the necessity of making a single remark in explanation of my vote. I have been accustomed to vote against this bill. I believe I uniformly voted against it when I was a member of the House of Representatives. I never took the trouble, I must confess, to investigate it. There was a very large amount of money involved in it, and there was so strong an outside influence at that day brought to bear in its favor, that my prejudices were very naturally excited against it. During the present session of Congress, being confined temporarily to my room by indisposition, I took occasion to investigate the whole subject, and read with great attention the very learned speech made by the distinguished Senator from Delaware on this subject some years ago, and I arrived at the conclusion that this was a just and equitable demand against the Government.

Entertaining the opinions which I do, no matter what the amount may be, I dare not vote against the bill, and therefore I shall be compelled to stand upon the record as having voted upon both sides of the question; and all who know me know the fact that I am in the habit, from my positive character, of remaining in the wrong until most of my friends have discovered the fact before I did.

The question, "Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?" was taken by yeas and nays, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Dawson, Evans, Fish, Foot, Hamlin, Houston, James, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Morton, Pearce, Pettit, Pratt, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Sumner, Toombs, Wade, Weller, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bright, Brown, Cass, Chase, Clay, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Fitzpatrick, Jones of Iowa, Mason, Norris, Rusk, Slidell, Walker, and Williams—16.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

GRANT OF LANDS TO ILLINOIS.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to authorize the State of Illinois to select the residue of the lands to which she is entitled under the act of the 2d of March, 1827, granting land to aid that State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Illinois river with those of Lake Michigan. The object of the bill is to make up a small deficiency which has occurred in a former grant of land. It is reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It proposes to authorize the Governor of the State to select the balance of the lands to which it is entitled under the provisions of the act mentioned, out of any unsold public lands in the State not claimed by preemption.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Public Lands, was to insert after the word "State" the words "subject to private entry at $1 25 per acre;" so that the clause will read, that the selection shall be made "out of any of the unsold public lands in said State subject to private entry at $1 25 per acre."

Mr. SHIELDS. I will merely state that the object of the bill is to make up a deficiency. The act mentioned in it gave a certain number of acres to the State. A small portion—a very small portion of those acres—the Government sold, and the object is merely to make up for that deficiency. The bill has passed the Senate frequently; but has been lost in the House for want of time.

The amendment was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

THE NEBRASKA TERRITORY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. HOUSTON addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill. He opposed it because it violated the rights of the Indians, who are in possession of that territory, and the good faith of this Government, on which the Indians relied when they treated to remove to it.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Texas is considerably exhausted by his speech to-day, and has not concluded. I hope, therefore, that by unanimous consent the subject will be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am perfectly willing to go on, if there is the least anxiety that I should do so; but, in the condition of my voice, I prefer to desist.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator will allow me the floor, I will move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand the Senator to say that he is willing to go on. If so, I think it would be better to have him do so, as other persons expected to get the floor to-day to continue the debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will not act as we have frequently done with the Indians. I have said I was willing to go on and get through, and I will do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. WALKER in the chair.) There is a motion pending to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. STUART. I made that motion, believing it to be but justice to the Senator from Texas. If, however, he is willing to go on, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I will proceed now—

Mr. STUART. At the suggestion of Senators around me, and certainly for the comfort of the Senator from Texas, I renew the motion to postpone; and I hope there will be no objection to it. Several Senators. Certainly not.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHIELDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

The question being taken, there were, on a division—ayes 18, noes 12; no quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a quorum present, in the opinion of the Chair, if Senators will vote.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WELLER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion. This is certainly an unusual hour at which to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bayard, Brodhead, Chase, Dawson, Everett, Fish, Foot, Jones of Tennessee, Morton, Rusk, Seward, Smith, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Wade, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bell, Butler, Cass, Clay, Clayton, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Houston, Hunter, James, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Pettit, Sebastian, Shields, Sibley, Stuart, Walker, Weller, and Williams—24.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 24, noes not counted.

The Senate accordingly proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 14, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, accompanied by the second part of Lieutenant Herndon's report of the exploration of the valley of the Amazon and its tributaries, made by him in connection with Lieutenant Lardner Gibbon, under instructions from the Navy Department; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a memorial to Congress from Charles Homer, contractor for the construction of the San Francisco marine hospital; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, laid before the House a communication from the Department of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated the 6th instant, recommending that treaties be made with the Indian tribes in Oregon and Washington Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF CROW SHOALS AT CAPE MAY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the War Department, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 30th ultimo, viz: "That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House any information which may be on file in his office, in reference to a survey of Crow Shoals, at Cape May;" stating that the only information on the files of the Department on this subject will be found printed as Senate Document No. 155, second session Twenty-Fifth Congress, and as Executive Document No. 433, and Report of Committees (H. R.) No. 1,050 of the same session of Congress; which was referred to the Committee of Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

BLUE BOOK.

On motion by Mr. MURRAY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Printing be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution which was referred to them, in reference to the propriety of printing five hundred extra copies of the Blue Book of the present year, for the use of the members of this House; and that the same be laid upon the table.

On motion by Mr. MURRAY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Printing be discharged from the further consideration of a resolution directing them to inquire into the expediency of reporting a directing the printing of thirty thousand additional copies of the Mechanical and Agricultural Patent Office reports for 1852-'53, for the use of the members of the House; and that the same be laid upon the table.

On motion by Mr. MURRAY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Printing be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Joseph L. Smith, representing that the prosperity of the country will be greatly promoted by the distribution, under authority of law, of the President's annual message, with the accompanying documents, reports, and such other documents as Congress may deem appropriate, to each common school in the United States, for the use of the people of their respective school districts; and that the same be laid upon the table.

On motion by Mr. MURRAY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Printing be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of inquiry in regard to the printing of the Census report; and also from the further consideration of the memorial of J. C. G. Kennedy, in relation to printing the statistics of manufactures.

And it was referred to the Select Committee on Printing.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I offer the following resolution, from the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed, for the use of the House of Representatives, thirty thousand copies of the mechanical part of the Patent Office report, and ten thousand copies for the use of the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would like to make one suggestion in that connection. I am very willing that there should be a liberal appropriation for the Patent Office report. If you print forty thousand copies of the mechanical part, it will give nearly two hundred copies to each member, which is more than we need of that document. I think it would be far better to print a small edition of this part, and a larger edition of the agricultural part. The whole community are anxious to get the agricultural part. I find, when I get two hundred copies of the mechanical part, that, in my district, there are not probably over twenty or twenty-five persons who care anything about receiving it; and the mechanics who do get it find that the abstracts contained in the document are so imperfect that they derive but little practical use from them.

On the other hand, if I had one or two thousand copies of the agricultural part I could dispose of them to very great advantage, as there are so many individuals anxious to get them. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from Kentucky will reduce the number of the mechanical part to fifteen thousand copies, which will give every member sixty or eighty copies, and make a larger increase of the edition of the agricultural part. I make this suggestion to the gentleman over the way, and I hope that he will either move, or allow me to move, to reduce the number of the mechanical part to be printed, with a view of increasing the edition of the other part.

Mr. STANTON. The ideas of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] accord fully with my own, and the resolution of the committee is intended to carry them out. This resolution proposes to publish twenty thousand copies less than were published last year. The work is not so important or valuable as the agricultural part, and the committee thought it better to diminish the number of the one and increase the other. Sixty thousand copies of this part were published last year, and the resolution proposes to reduce it to forty thousand now, that we may add the difference, twenty thousand, to the agricultural part. Thirty thousand copies are intended for distribution by members, and ten thousand for the use of the Commissioner of Patents. This will not give us more than we can readily send to our constituents.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The edition of one hundred thousand copies of the agricultural part last year gave us four hundred copies each, thirty thousand ought to give us one third of that number. It will give us one hundred, which I think unnecessarily large.

Mr. STANTON. We did get four hundred copies of the agricultural part, and this thirty thousand copies will allow to each member one hundred and twenty.

Mr. MURRAY. I was about to say, that at the last session of Congress we ordered sixty thousand copies of the mechanical part of the Patent Office report to be printed; fifty thousand for the use of members, and ten thousand for the use of the Patent Office. This number gave two hundred copies of this part of the report to each member. We propose now to reduce the number of the mechanical part, and increase that of the agricultural. The agricultural report has not yet been made. The committee propose to print, for the use of members, thirty thousand copies of the mechanical report, which will give one hundred and twenty to each member, and ten thousand copies for the use of the Patent Office. That is the conclusion to which we have come.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing what number of this document has been heretofore ordered by former Congresses?

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. We printed sixty thousand last year.

Mr. BAYLY. I hope the usual number will be printed. We have all of us got mechanics enough in our districts to distribute them among.

Mr. CLINGMAN. They do not want them.

Mr. BAYLY. I think they do want them.

Mr. STRAUB. I ask that the resolution may be read again. I do not precisely understand it.

The resolution was again read by the Clerk.

Mr. STRAUB. Do I understand that this is the report for the present year?

Mr. STANTON. It is the report which was submitted a few days ago.

Mr. STRAUB. Well, it is a report which has not yet been printed; is it not?

Mr. STANTON. It has not yet been printed.

Mr. STRAUB. If it be in order, I will move to amend by striking out the number inserted in the resolution, and to insert sixty thousand.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope that motion will not prevail. I have tried, during the last three Congresses, to get northern members, who are supposed to represent a larger number of mechanics than we at the South, to exchange agricultural reports for my mechanical reports; but I have never been able to get one of them to exchange with me. I have sent my mechanical reports to the mechanics of my district, and have received complaints from them for so doing. They say they would rather have the other part. I have no doubt that if the number of mechanical reports were much reduced, and the number of agricultural increased to a corresponding extent, we should much better meet the wants of even the mechanics of the country.

I do hope, therefore, that if we are to spend money in printing and circulating these Patent Office reports, that the number of the mechanical will be diminished, and that of the agricultural increased. I myself think the number reported by the committee is too large, but it should certainly not be increased.

Mr. HUNT. I would suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that he move to increase the number of the agricultural report to the same extent that he diminishes the mechanical.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That is what I desire.

Mr. BLISS. I do not know what the wants and requirements of the people may be in that section of the country in which the gentleman from North Carolina resides, but I do know well that, in that portion of the country from which I come, there is no document furnished by the Government in so great a demand as the mechanical report of the Commissioner of Patents. It has been utterly impossible to supply the demand, or any considerable portion of the demand, for that document. A large portion of the people, and a very valuable portion of them too, in the West are engaged in mechanical pursuits, and they look to this document for the information they desire.

The States have nearly all of them agricultural institutions, which furnish probably to the people nearly all the information which they can get from the agricultural branch of this report; but it is not so with the mechanics. Hence, for good and sufficient reasons, there is a greater demand for this document than for the other branch of this report; and for the benefit of the people which I represent, as well as for others, I hope that a liberal supply of this valuable document will be printed for distribution among them.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Believing that the House understand this question perfectly, without any further explanations, I move the previous question.

Mr. LANE. Will the effect of the previous question, if seconded, be to bring the House to a vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER. That will be its effect.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Chair desires to know of the gentleman the form in which the amendment was intended to be moved. The resolution as reported from the committee provides that thirty thousand copies shall be printed for distribution by the members of the House, and ten thousand for the use of the Patent Office. The Chair desires to know which number it is that the gentleman proposes to strike out?

Mr. HAVEN. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to move to strike out and insert so that the aggregate number shall be sixty thousand, of which fifty thousand shall be for distribution by the members, and ten thousand for the use of the Patent Office.

Mr. STRAUB. That is precisely my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can then accomplish his object by moving to strike out thirty thousand, and to insert fifty thousand.

Mr. STRAUB. I will then put my motion in that form.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House of the passage by that body of "An act for the further improvement of the Cape Fear river, North Carolina."]

Mr. WALSH. I will simply suggest, that the demand spoken of here could be very easily supplied if every shopkeeper in Washington did not wrap up a pair of socks—

[Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WALSH. Then I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to have the proposition read before we are required to vote upon it.

The Clerk read the resolution again.

The question was then put on Mr. STRAUB's amendment; and, on a division, there were yeas—87, noes 64.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the resolution, as amended.

Mr. HAMILTON. On that I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then put; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This is the day set apart for the consideration of the homestead bill as the special order. I therefore move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up that special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. OLDS in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the business before the committee was the consideration of House bill, (No. 37,) reported from the Committee on Agriculture by Mr. DAWSON, "to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified."

The bill was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. DAWSON, of Pennsylvania, addressed the House at length in favor of the bill. His speech will be found in the Appendix.

Having concluded—

Mr. MACE obtained the floor.

Mr. GROW. I ask that the gentleman from Indiana will yield to me for a moment, to submit a substitute for the bill under consideration, in order that it may be printed.

The CHAIRMAN. No order can be made by the committee for the printing of the substitute.

Mr. GROW. I simply wish to present it now. It will be printed in to-morrow's Globe.

Mr. MACE yielding the floor, the substitute was offered.

Mr. MACE again obtained the floor, and addressed the committee during an hour, principally in regard to the provisions of the bill organizing the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas. He went into a history of all the compromises touching the slavery question, comprehending also the Missouri compromise, which he maintained was disregarded in the provisions of the bill which he discussed. He asserted, that he had urged his people to sustain the more recent compromises on the slavery question pending the late Presidential election, believing that it was to be a final settlement of the question.

He acted in good faith, as did his constituency. They believed that the last compromise was to be a finality to all agitation; but they were now doomed to disappointment. The agitation, he regretted, was renewed, and was still to progress. He maintained that if General Pierce had intimated, preceding the Presidential election, or made a declaration to that effect, that he was in favor of a repeal of the Missouri compromise act, he would not now have the distinguished honor of being President of the United States.

He, for one, would never vote for a repeal of the Missouri compromise; and if his constituency desired him so to vote, he should feel it to be his duty to resign, that their views might be represented by another.

Pending the delivery of Mr. MACE's remarks he was interrupted by Mr. RICHARDSON, who said: I only wish to set the gentleman from Indiana right in relation to his statement that Missouri was admitted into the Union upon the passage of what is known as the compromise measures. Missouri was only authorized to adopt a constitution by the act to which the gentleman refers. He says that this Missouri compromise admitted Missouri into the Union, and settled all this question. The very Congress that passed the Missouri compromise objected to the admission of Missouri as a State into the Union, until other terms were complied with than those relative to slavery. The gentleman from Indiana misapprehends the history of that matter entirely.

Mr. MACE. I hope it will not be expected that this interruption will constitute a part of my speech. If I have misapprehended the history of this matter, it does not affect the facts of which I have spoken.

Mr. SKELTON next addressed the committee on the subject of the Nebraska bill. He regretted that gentlemen from the free States had felt it to be their duty to incorporate within the provisions of that bill a clause in violation of the Missouri compromise.

The introduction of this new topic of agitation he viewed to be unnecessary and uncalled for, so far as it was proper to give territorial government to this new country. He entered fully into a history of all the compromises on the slavery question, maintaining that they were contracts which could not be honorably abrogated.

Mr. S. having concluded—

Mr. MEACHAM obtained the floor; but yielded to

Mr. DEAN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill (No. 37) "to encourage agriculture, commerce, and manufactures," and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Whereupon, the House adjourned until to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 15, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, accompanied by the second part of Lieut. Herndon's report of the exploration of the valley of the Amazon and its tributaries, made by him in connection with Lieut. Lardner Gibbon, under instructions from the Navy Department.

Mr. FISH. I move that the communication lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I find on examining the Journals of the Senate of last year, that there was an order of the Senate providing that the second part of this document, which is now before the Senate, should be printed. I believe, therefore, there is no necessity for any additional order. I will read what was the vote of the Senate last year:

"That there be printed for the use of the Senate ten thousand extra copies of the first part of the exploration of the valley of the Amazon and its tributaries, made by Lieutenant William L. Herndon, in connection with Lieutenant Lardner Gibbon, under instructions from the War Department; and also the same number of the remaining portion of the report hereafter to be furnished."

That remaining portion is now before the Senate; there is, therefore, no vote of the Senate necessary for its printing.

TONNAGE DUTIES ON SPANISH VESSELS.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill to repeal certain acts concerning duties on Spanish vessels, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and with a recommendation against its passage.

Mr. BENJAMIN. In relation to that report, I beg leave to state that there is a minority of the committee who entertain a decided conviction of the propriety of passing the bill, and therefore dissent from the report.

JOHN O. MEARS.

Mr. GWIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred House bill for the relief of John O. Mears, to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. As the principle of the bill has often been established by the Senate, I hope the bill will be considered now.

The Senate accordingly, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to authorize the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to settle and adjust his accounts as acting purser of the United States brig Dolphin, under the appointment of the commander of the squadron then on the coast of Africa; and to allow him the pay of purser while discharging the duties of that appointment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. RUSK, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the surviving officers of the late Texas navy; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. EVERETT asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill to recompense the discoverer of practical anesthesia; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. EVERETT presented the memorial of the Trustees of the Massachusetts Humane Society, praying for an appropriation in aid of the operations of the society for the rescue and relief of shipwrecked mariners; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FISH. I am desired to present a remonstrance of the representatives of the religious Society of Friends, in the city of New York, and places adjacent, remonstrating against the enactment of any law by Congress, or any laws, which will extend the area of slavery or perpetuate the existence of that institution. They represent a very numerous and highly respectable body of citizens, and the memorial is worthy of consideration. I move that, as the subject is before the Senate, the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, presented a memorial of citizens of Iowa, praying the establishment of a mail route from Marengo to Toledo, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SLIDELL presented the memorial of J. H. Rinehart and others, remonstrating against any change in the act of Congress of 27th January, 1851, relating to settlers in the Maison Rouge grant; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. SEBASTIAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Susan Cuddy and Richard Fields be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion by Mr. DAWSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Coombs Greenwell be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. DAWSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Joseph M. Hernandez be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. WALKER, it was Ordered, That the memorials of physicians and of various medical associations and institutions of Massachusetts, on the subject of anæsthesia, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill granting certain additional powers to the corporation of the city of Washington; which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Orway H. Berryman, praying to be allowed an amount equal to the balance found against him on the settlement of his accounts as acting purser while in command of the United States schooner Ontkayhe, and which amount he had been obliged to pay over to the United States, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Philip F. Voorhees, praying to be allowed his expenses incurred in carrying public ministers of the United States to Siam, and other places in the East Indies, and elsewhere, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Captain Philip F. Voorhees, United States Navy; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FISH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of John C. Fr. Salomon, praying an appropriation to enable him to test the utility of carbonic acid gas as a motive power, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of the Utica Steam Woolen Company, reported it back without amendment, with a recommendation that it pass.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the administrator of Major Elijah J. Weed, praying that the accounting officers be authorized to settle his accounts on equitable principles, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; which was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. STUART submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to the Senate, at as early a day as one can reasonably be prepared, a bill making appropriations for the improvement of harbors and rivers.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the Senate whether the valuation of certain improvements, amounting to $2,999, valued by agents of the United States, in 1834, in the name of David Carter, a Cherokee, who enrolled and emigrated west under the eighth article of the treaty of 1828, was included in the claim of said Carter, amounting to $4,542, adjudged to him for spoliation in the nature of rent of land and mills, under the fifteenth article of the treaty of 1835-36, by Messrs. Lumpkin & Kennedy, commissioners for adjusting claims under said treaty, from which the claimant had been dispossessed for three years; also, state by what authority said valuation of $2,999 was cut down to $1,251.50, and any further information on file respecting the claim which may affect its validity.

This resolution asks for information to enable the committee to decide upon a claim which has been referred to them; and the information cannot be obtained by any other process than by a resolution of the Senate. The resolution calls for extracts from the files of the Department, which, by a regulation of that Department, are not accessible except upon a resolution of this body or of the other House. I therefore ask the Senate to consider the resolution at this time.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. TOOMBS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary to protect the ministerial officers of the courts of the United States in the discharge of their respective duties, and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

The bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French, prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, was read a third time.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. CLAYTON. I was accidentally absent yesterday when the yeas and nays were taken on the engrossment of the bill. I desire to record my name in its favor, and therefore I ask for the yeas and nays upon its passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bayard, Benjamin, Clayton, Dawson, Dixon, Evans, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Hamilton, Houston, James, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Morton, Pearce, Pettit, Pratt, Sebastian, Seward, Smith, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, and Weller—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Brodhead, Cass, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Fitzpatrick, Hunter, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Slidell, Walker, and Williams—15.

So the bill was passed.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT.

On motion by Mr. MALLORY, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill to establish a land district in the State of Florida, to be called the district of Tampa. It proposes to create all that part of the land district of Nunansville and St. Augustine, in Florida, lying south of the line dividing townships nineteen and twenty, south, into a new land district, to be called the district of Tampa; and that the act shall take effect at the expiration of six months from its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

SAN PEDRO A PORT OF ENTRY.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill constituting San Pedro, in the State of California, a port of entry and delivery.

It proposes to constitute the counties of Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, and San Bernardino, California, a collection district, to be called the district of San Pedro, for which district San Pedro is to be the port of entry. The collector of the district is to receive $3,000 per annum, with an additional maximum compensation of $2,000, if his emoluments and fees amount to that sum. It also proposes to enact that Santa Barbara shall remain a port of delivery, in the same manner as it now constitutes a port of delivery in the district of San Diego.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to amend the third section, after the word "delivery" where it first occurs, by inserting the word "therein," so that it will read, "that Santa Barbara, in said district, shall remain a port of delivery therein," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. This subject was very carefully examined by the Committee on Commerce, and the bill has the approbation of the Appraiser General of the revenue, who made a personal examination of the matter, and has no doubt that this is a place where a port of entry should be established.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in; the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN OHIO.

On motion by Mr. CHASE, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill to grant to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated public land remaining in that State.

It proposes to grant to the State of Ohio all the unsold and unappropriated lands which may remain therein on the 31st of March, 1854, to be disposed of as the Legislature shall direct; with a proviso that the grant shall not in any manner affect any right of preëmption or other right vested in any individual; and that the lands, the proceeds of which are reserved for the use of certain Indian tribes, shall not be included within the grant. It also proposes to direct the Commissioner of the General Land Office to proceed to close the current land business in Ohio, and to transfer to the Governor of the State, before the 31st of August next, all the archives relating to public lands in that State, except those of the Chillicothe district, relating to lands lying in the State of Indiana, within that district, which shall be attached to and subject to sale in the Jeffersonville district in Indiana. The lands granted are to remain charged with all liabilities and equities to which they are now subject.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the Senator from Ohio be good enough to state how many acres of land are supposed to be undisposed of in that State, and are now to be granted to Ohio?

Mr. WELLER. Only two hundred thousand.

Mr. CHASE. That is all; two hundred thousand acres.

Mr. DAWSON. Only two hundred thousand! The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

CEMETERY IN DUBUQUE.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I ask the Senate now to take up the bill "to relinquish certain lands to the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa," which has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands. It is merely to authorize the city of Dubuque to exchange a lot of ground given to that city as a cemetery, for another lot, outside the limits of the city, and of a larger extent. There can be no objection to it at all.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. No amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate without amendment, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third, and passed.

PALATKA AND BAYPORT, FLORIDA.

On the motion of Mr. MALLORY, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill to constitute Palatka and Bayport, in the State of Florida, ports of delivery respectively, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce without amendment. It proposes to create the places named ports of delivery, and to subject them to the same regulations and restrictions as other ports of delivery in the United States; and to direct the appointment of a surveyor of customs to reside at each, who shall, in addition to his own duties, perform the duties and receive the salary of the surveyors prescribed by the act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1831, "allowing the duties on foreign merchandise imported into Pittsburg, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, Nashville, and Natchez, to be secured and paid at those places. It also proposes to annex Palatka to the collection district of St. John's, and Bayport to the collection district of St. Marks, and to extend all the privileges and facilities to them which are afforded to the places named in the act of March 2d, 1831."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

The pending question is on the amendment moved by Mr. DOUGLAS to the 14th section of the substitute reported by the Committee on Territories, to strike out the words

"—which [the Missouri compromise act] was superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, and is hereby declared inoperative," and to insert,

—which being inconsistent with the principles of non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories, as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, is hereby declared inoperative and void, it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HOUSTON continued and concluded the speech which he commenced yesterday. [See Appendix for speech.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the fourteenth section.

Mr. CHASE. I would inquire whether the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is capable of division? If so, I wish to have it divided, so that the question may first be taken upon the preamble, as it may be called, to the main proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would inquire of the Senator from Ohio how he would propose to divide the amendment?

Mr. CHASE. I wish to have the question first taken on the reason assigned for the repeal, or for the declaration that the act of 1820 is inoperative and void, so that the declaration will stand as a substantive and distinct proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment is not susceptible of that division.

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays upon the amendment, and they were taken, and resulted—yeas 35, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Cass, Clayton, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Gwin, Hunter, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Morton, Norris, Pearce, Pettit, Pratt, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Weller, and Williams—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Everett, Fish, Foot, Houston, Seward, Sumner, and Wade—10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now upon the substitute reported by the committee for the original bill.

Mr. CHASE. I desire to submit an amendment, to insert immediately after the words which have just been inserted, the following:

Under which the people of the Territory, through their appropriate representatives, may, if they see fit, prohibit the existence of slavery therein.

I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHASE. I will state, in very few words, the design of this amendment. The amendment just adopted declares that it is the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. The amendment had already declared the Missouri prohibition inconsistent with the principle of non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures. It will be seen that the amendment just adopted does two things. It puts a construction on the acts of 1850, and then it construes the act of which it is a part. It declares the principle of the acts of 1850 inconsistent with the Missouri prohibition; and it declares for the act, of which it forms a part, that its design is to leave the subject of slavery to be disposed of by the people of the Territories, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution of the United States.

Now I desire to have the sense of the Senate upon the question, whether or not, under the limitations of the Constitution of the United States, the people of the Territories can prohibit the existence of slavery there?

There can be no reasonable objection to the expression of the judgment of the Senate on this question. The very amendment just adopted is, for the most part, only an expression of the judgment of the Senate on a question of interpretation. The only real words of legislation in it are these:

"Is hereby declared inoperative and void;" all the rest is opinion, judgment, intent.

Now I want a little clearer understanding of one important point. I want the judgment of the Senate upon the question whether, under the limitations of the Constitution, the people of the Territories can protect themselves against slavery?

After I have obtained a vote on this question, I shall want to know—and if no other Senator shall do it, I will move amendments calculated to ascertain—whether it be intended to give the principle of non-intervention, asserted by the bill, full scope? If it is to be adopted, I want to see it fully and thoroughly carried out.

I object to the amendment which has just been adopted, that it will have opposite interpretations in different sections of the country. In one section it will be construed as leaving the whole subject of slavery completely at the disposition of the people of the Territories; and in another section as so binding up the people, by its reference to the limitations of the Constitution, that they can in no case, and by no means, however disposed to do so, protect themselves against the introduction of slavery. I shall detain the Senate, for the present, no longer. My desire only is, that the Senate and the country may understand clearly the scope and purpose of the amendment I now submit, and to have a vote, by ayes and noes, upon it.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, the principle which the Senator from Ohio has announced as the principle of his amendment is, that the question shall be left entirely and exclusively to the people of the Territories whether they will prohibit slavery or not. Now, for the purpose of testing the sincerity of the Senator, and for the purpose of deducing the principle in his amendment correctly, I propose to amend it by inserting after the word "prohibit" the words "or introduce;" so that if my amendment be adopted, and the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as so amended, be introduced as part of the bill, the principle which he says he desires to have tested here will be inserted in the bill—that the people of the Territories shall have power either to introduce or prohibit slavery, as they may think proper. I suppose the question will be first taken on the amendment which I offer to the amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. Is an amendment to an amendment to an amendment in order?

Mr. CHASE. The amendment which I offered is an amendment to an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Maryland is not now in order.

Mr. PRATT. Perhaps the Senator from Ohio will accept it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Ohio. His object in offering this amendment must be obvious to the Senate. He either intends to perfect the bill and make it acceptable, or he intends to embarrass it. One of these two things is inevitable. Now, I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio whether, if we adopt his amendment, he will vote for the bill? I hope he will answer the question. He refuses to answer, and it is therefore obvious that his purpose is to embarrass the bill. I hope no friend of the bill will suffer himself to be entangled in this way.

Mr. CHASE. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to answer the question put to me from the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones.] I say to him distinctly, that I will not vote for this bill, unless relieved of every clause looking towards the abrogation of the Missouri prohibition.

But, sir, is anything less doubtful than that it is the right and duty of a Senator, who sees that a bill containing important provisions, so obnoxious as to make it impossible for him to vote for it, is yet likely to pass the Senate—is it not, I say, the right and duty of a Senator, under such circumstances, to endeavor as far as practicable to make the bill in other respects such as he desires it to be? A measure of legislation may fail to commend itself to my judgment, and yet may be rendered vastly less obnoxious by amendment than in its original shape. I have moved this amendment, therefore, in good faith. I wish to see the bill perfected, as near as may be, in accordance with the principle upon which it is said to be framed.

I remarked, when last up, that I should probably have other amendments to offer, and I may as well indicate briefly the nature of those amendments.

The advocates of the bill say that it is framed upon the principle of non-intervention. But what kind of non-intervention? You refer the question of slavery to the people of the Territories, to be acted upon through their Legislatures; do you not? Certainly you say so. But then the Legislature of the Territory is to act upon that question, subject to the restrictions and limitations of the Constitution of the United States.

Now, sir, there are great differences of opinion here as to what the limitations and restrictions of the Constitution are. Some Senators think that the Constitution of the United States has no operation at all in the Territories, unless extended to them by express enactment. Other Senators are of opinion that the Constitution extends over the Territories from the moment of acquisition. Other Senators maintain that the Constitution, properly interpreted, would have prevented the existence of slavery in the Territories altogether, and would render it impossible for a Territorial Legislature to introduce slavery by a valid enactment. Other Senators contend that, under the Constitution, no Territorial Legislature can exclude slavery.

Now, sir, I desire to have the sense of the Senate upon the question, whether the Territorial Legislatures to which you propose to refer this great question—vital to the future destiny of the people who are to emigrate into those Territories—can, "subject to the Constitution," protect themselves, if they see fit to do so, from slavery? The Senator from Maryland [Mr. PRATT] has proposed an amendment to my amendment. I cannot accept it. But it will be entirely within the power of the Senate, after adopting my amendment, to agree to his, if they see fit to do so.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the honorable Senator will permit me, I will suggest to him, if he wishes to test that proposition, to put the converse, as suggested by the honorable Senator from Maryland, and then it will be a fair proposition. Let the Senator from Ohio accept the amendment of the Senator from Maryland, for the purpose of testing the question.

Mr. CHASE. I was about to state why I could not accept the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. I have no objection that the votes should be taken upon it; and it is probable that it would receive the sanction of a majority here. But with my views of the Constitution, I cannot vote for it. I do not believe that a Territorial Legislature, though it may have the power to protect the people against slavery, is constitutionally competent to introduce it. A majority here probably think otherwise. A vote upon my amendment will not prevent a vote from being taken upon the proposition of the Senator from Maryland. I cannot vote for his amendment. He will not vote for mine. There may be a majority for each, and yet a proposition uniting both might be rejected. I submit, therefore, to the good sense of the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] whether it is not fairest to take a separate vote upon each proposition? If there be a majority who believe that the people of a Territory can, under the Constitution, protect themselves from slavery, let them say so. And if another and a different majority, who think that the people of a Territory can, if they see fit, introduce slavery, let them say so. There is nothing in the adoption of the one amendment which would preclude the adoption of the other. But let us have a vote upon the distinct and substantive proposition, unembarrassed by connection with any other; then let the proposition of the Senator from Maryland be submitted and voted upon unembarrassed by any connection with mine. This is fair. In my judgment it is the only fair mode of ascertaining the sense of the Senate. The sole object of my amendment is to let the people of the country see whether those who assert the principle of non-intervention are willing that the people of the Territories may, if they see fit, exclude slavery.

Mr. President, I have referred to the limitations under which the Territorial Legislatures are to act under the provisions of this bill. They may legislate, among other subjects, upon that of slavery. But how? Freely? Without restraint? Is non-intervention the real principle of this bill? Why, sir, according to one of the provisions of this bill, every act of the Territorial Legislature is subject to the absolute veto of a government appointed here. The bill gives the appointment of the Governor to the President. He is made removable by the President. He holds his office only during Executive pleasure; and this Governor, thus appointed, thus removable, thus subject in all respects to Executive control, is to have an absolute veto on every act of the Territorial Legislature. Is that non-intervention? That, sir, is one of the provisions which I shall propose to strike from the bill.

Then, sir, every case between parties litigant which arises under any act of the Territorial Legislature, must, of course, come before the court. Now, who are to be the judges of these territorial courts? Are they to be elected by the people? Appointed by the Legislature? Not at all. Every one of them, under the provisions of this bill, is to be appointed and commissioned here. So that all territorial acts, and all rights claimed under them, are to be brought under the revision of judges, not responsible to the people of the Territory, nor deriving their powers from them, but dependent wholly upon Executive patronage and favor—judges appointed by the President, and, according to recent practice sanctioned by the Senate, removable by him at pleasure. And this, sir, is not all. Not only is the Territorial Legislature, under the provisions of this bill, placed under the control of an appointee of the Federal Executive; not only are its acts subject to revision of judges appointed and removable by the President, but all its legislation is to be reported to Congress; and every act may, if Congress shall see fit to disapprove of it, be declared null and void.

I call attention to these provisions, Mr. President, as features of a bill which, in my judgment, are totally irreconcilable with the principle of non-intervention upon which it is said the bill itself is constructed. For the present, I only ask for a vote upon the amendment I have offered. I propose, hereafter, to offer other amendments designed to remove this provision, and to carry out as far as practicable the professed principle of the bill, and refer all questions of legislation and administration within the limits of the Territories to the uncontrolled and unbiased judgment of the people.

Mr. BADGER. I was not in my seat when the amendment was offered, and I do not know that I have correctly understood its purport from the remarks which have been made. Before submitting some remarks upon it, I ask that it may be read.

It was read accordingly.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I have understood, I find, correctly the purport of the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Ohio. The purpose of the amendment, and the effect of the amendment, if adopted by the Senate, and standing as he proposes, are clear and obvious. The effect of the amendment, and the design of the amendment, are to overrule and subvert the very proposition introduced into the bill upon the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Territories. Is not that clear? The provision as it stands, since the amendment has been adopted, is an unrestricted and unreserved reference to the Territorial authorities, or the people themselves, to determine upon the question of slavery; and therefore, by the very terms as well as by the obvious meaning and legal operation of that amendment, to enable them either to exclude or to introduce or allow slavery.

If, therefore, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio were appended to the bill in the connection in which he introduces it, the necessary and inevitable effect of it would be to control and limit the language which the Senate has just put into the bill, and to give it this construction: that, though Congress leaves them to regulate their own domestic institutions as they please, yet, in regard to the subject-matter of slavery, the power is confined to the exclusion or prohibition of it. I say this is both the legal effect and the manifest design of the amendment. The legal effect is obvious upon the statement. The design is obvious upon the refusal of the gentleman to incorporate in his amendment what was suggested by my honorable friend from Maryland, the propriety and fairness of which was instantly seen by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS.]

Is it proposed by the Senator to test the question whether these people shall expressly have authority to determine for themselves upon the existence of this domestic relation? If so, and the language just put into the bill is not sufficiently explicit, in his estimation, is it not beyond all question that you should put in the words "or introduce?" Under the bill as it stands, the people may regulate their domestic relations as they see fit; but, says the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, that shall enable them, under the Constitution, to prohibit slavery. What is the effect of that amendment but to modify, reduce, restrain, and bring down the latitude of authority conferred upon them by the previous language just incorporated into the bill?

But, Mr. President, that this is the design of the honorable Senator from Ohio he has himself told us; for in the speech which he delivered here the other day, in commenting on the Missouri compromise, of the sacrosanct character of which he seemed to have such a deep conviction and such a profound reverence, what did he tell us? He told us that that compromise contained an express prohibition of slavery north of the line of 36° 30', and no express allowance of it south of that line, though, the Senator confessed there was such an implication in favor of its allowance. And yet, what did the honorable Senator tell us, in that very speech which he has put forth to the world with the captivating title of "Maintain Plighted Faith?" Here was a compromise; according to his own declaration, containing an express prohibition of slavery north of a certain line, and an implied admission or allowance of it south of the line; and he proposes to Maintain Plighted Faith—how? By regarding both parts of the agreement? By maintaining the express exclusion and leaving the implied admission? No, sir. Here is his own language, which furnishes the commentary on his motive for proposing this amendment, and serves to explain his whole course on this bill:

"We believe no permanent adjustment of that question possible, except by a return to that original policy of the fathers of the Republic, by which slavery was restricted within State limits; and freedom, without exception or limitation, was to be secured to every person outside of State limits, and under the exclusive jurisdiction of the General Government."

What, then, is that? It is insisting upon the compromise so far as he likes; it is invoking "plighted faith" to sustain the compromise so far as he likes it, with a distinct announcement that, so far as he does not like it, he goes for repudiating it. What is the effect of that upon the Missouri compromise? It is to convert it, not into a compromise line, but to give it the same effect and operation, in every respect whatever, as if that Missouri compromise, instead of being that slavery should be prohibited north of 36° 30', had been, in terms, that slavery shall be prohibited everywhere. That is the maintenance of plighted faith! That is the mode in which we are taught to regard the arguments so pathetically urged to us, to maintain the plighted faith of the Government! It is to take what is offered, and to refuse the consideration. It is to maintain what you have gotten upon a bargain, and to deny that, in consideration of which, what you have gotten was obtained. It is to say, "adhere to a compromise on your part, which I utterly disregard and trample under foot."

Sir, is there any difference, in point either of moral or of legal obligation, between an express and an implied stipulation? None. In the court below, they hold every man as fully bound in an implied engagement as by an express engagement. It is the engagement that constitutes the obligation. It is binding in law; it is binding in morals. Honor requires that he who has obtained from another anything upon an implication that that other is to receive something in return, should faithfully discharge the obligation by which he has procured that which otherwise would not have been given.

Now, Mr. President, I do not make these remarks by way of blaming the honorable Senator from Ohio for the course which he thinks proper to pursue. I have no right to blame him. I am no tribunal to try him. But when the honorable gentleman proposes an amendment of this character to the bill, I cannot help seeing that, under his notions with regard to his obligation to maintain what he calls freedom to every human being under the authority of the United States, and under the view which he announces with regard to the operation of the Constitution of the United States, he is bound to refuse to us everything: that he can be bound by no bargain, and that no stipulation which could be made by this Senate, even with his own assent, would bind him for an hour—I mean with regard to the subject of slavery.

Why is it not clear? Suppose that the honorable Senator were to agree to a compromise now, to allow the people in these Territories to choose whether they would have slavery or not. Upon his argument he could not be morally bound by it. Why? He thinks the Constitution prohibits slavery in the Territories; he thinks that the people of the Territories cannot be allowed to introduce slavery, even if they choose. I am not mentioning this as a matter of complaint; I am not alleging it against him as blame; I am not affirming that it implies any moral turpitude in him. It is the necessary logical consequence of the positions which he lays down as fundamental on this subject; and therefore it is idle for us to talk about compromises with the honorable Senator; for the honorable Senator who now puts "Maintain Plighted Faith" at the head of his speech, published a speech here during Congress when the compromise measure of 1850 were adopted, which he headed with the solemn title of "Freedom," I think it was, or "Liberty without Compromise." He is against compromises, and yet calls upon us to enforce that portion of the Missouri compromise by which our rights were restricted, as we think.

Now, sir, the true, direct, and manly course to meet this question is that suggested by my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS.] Put into your amendment that the people of the Territories shall be at liberty to exclude or introduce; and if there is anything in the Constitution of the United States which disables a territorial government from introducing slavery, if the honorable Senator believes that, if he is sincere in that opinion, there sits a tribunal below us who will pass upon the validity and constitutionality of any act that we may pass.

I have no hesitation, therefore, in saying that I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. The clause as it stands is ample. It submits the whole authority to the Territory to determine for itself. That, in my judgment, is the place where it ought to be put. If the people of these Territories choose to exclude slavery, so far from considering it as a wrong done to me or to my constituents, I shall not complain of it. It is their own business.

Well, again, the Senator says that the bills passed by the Territorial Legislatures are subject to the approval or disapproval of the Governor, and that they are subject to the revision and disapproval of Congress. Be it so; but not upon this subject in particular. It applies to the whole legislative power of the Territory. The Territory is not an independent State. The Territory is not emancipated from our paramount jurisdiction and control, and there is no inconsistency whatever in retaining in the bill these restrictive and revising powers, and the bill stands with these complete and fair. The restricting and revising power which applies to the subject of slavery applies to every other power of legislation. The bill does not select this case, as a case in which the action of the Territorial Legislature shall be submitted to the Governor; and having received the sanction of the Governor, it does not provide that in this case, in regard to slavery, it shall come under the consideration of Congress; but it is the precise provision, in so many words, which was incorporated into the bills for the organization of the territorial governments of Utah and New Mexico, and is in no way inconsistent with what the bill alleges, and that is, that we intend to leave them freedom upon this subject—just the same freedom that we leave them upon any and every other subject of legislation.

Mr. President, I am content with these remarks on this point. I was necessarily absent in the court below at the time when the honorable Senator from Texas concluded his remarks. I desire to be heard upon this bill, and upon the whole bill. I am in favor of the bill; and I wish to show why I am; and I wish to answer the objections which I have heard taken against it in this Chamber, so far as I think it necessary to do so.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the Senator will allow me, I will move to adjourn.

Mr. PRATT. Oh, no; let us take the question upon the amendment.

Mr. CASS. We cannot take the question yet on this amendment. There is something more to be said upon it.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I hope that the vote upon this amendment will not be pressed this evening. There can be no necessity for urging us to a vote now upon this precise question. I desire to submit my views upon it. I do not desire to make a speech upon the bill, nor anything like a regular argument upon this point; but Senators certainly understand that this has been a mooted question for a long time; and I learn from the remarks which the honorable Senator from North Carolina has submitted, that he thinks that by the vote which we have just taken upon the amendment submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Territories, we have yielded more than I think we have yielded. Sir, if gentlemen from the South and from the North make speeches, which are to go upon the record, and by which our action upon this question is in after times to be interpreted, I shall desire to state my views upon the point; so that when our present action comes to be criticised and interpreted, it shall be understood that all of us did not at the time concur in the view taken by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, and by the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER,] the other day, if I understood him correctly. I may say, in a single word, without intending to discuss the point now, that I have not, in my own judgment, and I trust I have not in my action here, yielded the principle that the people of the Territories, during their territorial existence, have the right to exclude slavery. I have not intended to yield that point, and I do not mean that my action, in future times, shall be so construed. As I am not prepared with authorities to go on upon this precise point this evening, I hope that I shall be allowed about fifteen minutes before the vote is taken, when I will have the authorities with me, to give my views upon this point, and this alone. Therefore, if other gentlemen wish to discuss the question further, I trust they will go on this evening, or if not, that we shall adjourn and hear the speech of the Senator from North Carolina to-morrow.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As the honorable Senator from North Carolina proposes to discuss the main question to-morrow, and as it is late this evening, and as there is a necessity for an Executive session, I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow, in order that we may proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. CASS. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, it seems to me that the discussion may just as well go on upon this point as upon any other. The honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] has touched on one of the main questions connected with it, and which has not been touched upon before. It is a very grave and a very important question. The power of the people of the Territories to legislate upon their internal concerns, during the period of these temporary governments, is most clearly given in this bill, if the Constitution permits it.

Mr. BADGER. Certainly.

Mr. CASS. If the Constitution does not permit, they have not got it.

Mr. BADGER. That is clear.

Mr. CASS. Behind that stands the other question, which must be discussed here; and I, for one, am determined that my constituents shall know my views on the point. It is one on which the honorable Senator from Mississippi and myself differ, and have differed radically, but on which, as I trust, we differ, and shall differ, properly. It is whether, by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, there is a kind of motive power in slavery that immediately spreads it over any territory, or by virtue of which any slave may be taken to any territory of the United States, as soon as it is annexed to the Union. I believe I state the point properly. It has been before us heretofore, and is familiar to us all. Now, behind the power of the people, given by the bill, to exercise this privilege in respect to their internal concerns, stands this grave question; and the honorable Senator from Mississippi is perfectly right in wishing to give his views upon it; for I presume this is the point to which he alludes; indeed, I am sure of it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, before the discussion goes further upon this question, I wish to save myself. I am perfectly willing to vote for the clause as it has been modified by the honorable Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Territories, but with a very clear judgment that, if Congress has not constitutional competency to legislate either one way or the other—either to introduce or prohibit slavery in the Territories—a territorial government has no derivative authority to do so from any act which Congress can pass.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly not.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not intend to go into this discussion; and I am perfectly willing to leave this question under the Constitution.

Mr. DAWSON. There is where it ought to be left.

Mr. BUTLER. I am perfectly willing to leave it under the Constitution, to be decided by the law tribunals of the country; and that is the true ground upon which to put it. If, in the process of settlement, the people of these Territories shall be prepared to assume upon themselves the attributes of a sovereign State, they can then, certainly, either exclude or admit slavery. I presume that will not be denied by any one. During their growth, and before they undertake to become a State, can they assume to exercise a power which Congress itself, under the Constitution, cannot confer upon them? They can have no derivative power on the subject from an act of ours.

Mr. CASS. That is a matter to be argued. I differ from the honorable Senator in toto.

Mr. WELLER. I have a single remark to make, though not upon the point which is now being discussed. Although, as I said in my remarks on Monday last, I am in favor of the general principles of the bill, there are some provisions in it which do not receive the sanction of my judgment. I may refer to that which confers upon the Governor an unqualified veto. I do not think I can vote for any territorial bill which contains a provision of that sort. I see no reason why the Committee on Territories should have reported this bill, on this point, differently from those which have preceded it in our legislation. The veto of the Governor should be a qualified one. I believe in Oregon a bare majority of the Territorial Legislature can overrule the veto of the Governor. I am willing, however, to place it where the Constitution of the United States has placed the veto power here. I would require two thirds of the Legislature to overrule the veto of the Governor; and I would not, under any circumstances, invest an absolute and unqualified veto in one man. I cannot vote for the bill with such a provision in it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The friends of this bill have had the provision to which the Senator from California has referred, and some others, under consideration, and they intend to dispose of these two points—that is, the veto power of the Governor, and as to the revisory power of Congress when we arrive at them. These two provisions are in this bill because they were in the Utah bill, which was our guide. I am aware that the former territorial bills gave the Governor only a qualified veto. I believe the Iowa bill required two thirds of the Legislature to overrule the veto; and in the Oregon bill a majority was required. I intend, when we get through with this provision, to call the especial attention of the Senate to that subject, and state what my own views are upon it. The clause providing for a revision of the laws by Congress has been uniformly inserted, and it arose in this way: In the early history of this country a Territory was legislated for by the governor and judges. Inasmuch as they had no Legislature, no representation, no popular Government, we required their laws to be submitted here, either for approval or disapproval. Since the Territories have had Legislatures, it has become a serious question whether any such revision is necessary; but the friends of the bill will consider that matter when we get through with this point. I renew my motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill, in order that we may proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. BUTLER. With the understanding that the Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Of course.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 15, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting from the Commissioner of Customs, in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1809, entitled "An act to further amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," and the act passed March 3, 1817, entitled "An act to provide for the prompt settlement of the public accounts," a statement of the accounts due more than three years prior to the 30th of June, 1853, on the books of the Register of the Treasury.

On motion by Mr. HIBBARD, the communication was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. COBB. The homestead bill is now the special order for consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, with the consent of the House, I shall present an amendment, which I desire to be made to it, so that it may be referred to that committee, and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection; and the amendment was introduced, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The same course as the above was pursued in reference to substitutes for the homestead bill submitted by Messrs. LETCHER, GROW, and HENN, and amendments to it by Messrs. WALSH and ETHERIDGE.

MISSOURI COMPROMISE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I have received, Mr. Speaker, the remonstrance of Joseph H. Allen and four hundred and forty-five others, citizens of Bangor, Maine, against the repeal of the Missouri compromise; which I move be referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOYCE. I object to the introduction of the remonstrance.

Mr. WASHBURN. I will then present it under the rule.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. BISSELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill No. 124, entitled "An act for the relief of Allen G. Johnson;" which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Also, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 184, entitled "An act for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth C. Smith, of Missouri," without amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Also, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 135, entitled "An act for the relief of Adam D. Stuart, paymaster of the United States Army," without amendment, and with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Also, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 135, entitled "A bill for the relief of the United States troops who were sufferers by the recent disaster to the steamship San Francisco."

Mr. BISSELL. It will be recollected that this bill passed the House, and went to the Senate. That body returned it to us with three amendments, and it was again referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee recommend concurrence in the first and third amendments; and non-concurrence in the second amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, obtained the floor.

Mr. BISSELL. Mr. Speaker, if I could have the attention of the House for a moment, I would desire to make a remark—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] has the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. I merely want to say, sir, that I would prefer to have the whole bill read, with the amendments, for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the whole bill first, and then the amendments.

The bill was accordingly read.

The SPEAKER. The Senate propose to amend the bill, as follows:

"Sec. 1, line 8, after the word 'and,' insert 'and to Lieutenant Francis K. Murray, and any other officers or seamen of the United States Navy who were on board the said steamship under orders.'"

The SPEAKER. (to Mr. BISSELL.) Does the committee recommend concurrence in this amendment?

Mr. BISSELL. Yes, sir; the committee recommend concurrence in it. And I would say, that the committee of the House intended to embrace Lieutenant Murray, of the Navy, in the original bill. He was on board the ship, under orders, to join his squadron in the Pacific ocean. I presume the House will have no objection to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BISSELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to have the third amendment read next.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the third amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

"Sec. 2, line 3, at the end of the section add the following words: 'And that the widows and minor children of those officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates who perished by that disaster, or who died by disease in consequence thereof, shall be allowed pensions in the same manner, in all respects, as if the said officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates had been killed in battle.'"

The question was put, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BISSELL. Now let the second amendment be read, in which the committee do not concur.

The amendment was reported as follows:

"At the end of the first section add the following: 'Provided, that the amount of the pay and allowances advanced to the officers and men, by the authority of the President, previous to their embarkation, shall be brought to their credit, and that their receipts for the same be canceled.'"

Mr. BISSELL. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered by this House, that before the embarkation of these soldiers for California, the President directed that there should be advanced to them six months' pay. Some of the officers and soldiers availed themselves of the privilege which was thus allowed them. Others did not. Some received two months' pay in advance; some four months'; some six months'; some none at all. This amendment provides that the amounts received by the soldiers and officers, under that order, shall be canceled. That would seem to operate unjustly, inasmuch as many of these officers and men did not receive any advance at all; while others did receive pay, varying some for two months, and some for six months.

The committee were of opinion, therefore, that the House ought not to concur in that amendment; and they have recommended non-concurrence accordingly, with a view to ask for the appointment of a committee of conference from this House to confer with the Senate committee; which I think will result in making matters satisfactory to us all.

The question was put on the amendment, and it was not concurred in.

Mr. BISSELL. Mr. Speaker, if this be the proper time, I would ask for the appointment of this committee of conference to meet the Senate committee.

The SPEAKER. The usual time for appointing the committee of conference is after the Senate shall have acted on our rejection of their amendment.

Mr. BISSELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition and papers of Samuel J. Raybourn, reported a bill for his relief; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BISSELL. I have another report from the same committee, which is mislaid at this moment, and I ask the privilege of reporting it when I shall find it.

OBSTRUCTIONS TO UNITED STATES MAILS.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a privileged question. Some ten or twelve days ago, a bill to prevent obstructions to the United States mails; or, to describe it more accurately, to punish injuries to railroads, was reported and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; afterwards, a motion was made to reconsider that vote, which motion is still pending.

The Erie troubles, which doubtless furnished the occasion for reporting this bill, are said to be quieted, and I understand there is no further disposition to press this motion to reconsider. But as I do not know how soon other occurrences may take place, there or elsewhere, which may tempt the House to the exercise of such powers as are contemplated by this bill, I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The title of the bill was read, as follows:

"A bill to secure the safe transmission of the United States mails upon railroads."

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is to reconsider the vote by which that bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] calls up that motion, and moves to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was then put, and the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

REPORTS—AGAIN.

On motion by Mr. CRAIGE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the memorial of Randall Pegg, for additional pay for services as watchman to the Patent Office in the years 1859-59, be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. CRAIGE, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause a supplemental contract to be made with the contractors for the marble for the Capitol extension to procure the columns and ashlar in larger blocks than required by the specifications of their present contract.

Mr. CRAIGE. I desire to make a short statement in reference to that resolution, showing the necessity of its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that the gentleman intended the resolution as a joint one. It is not so by its form.

Mr. CRAIGE. I did intend it as such.

The SPEAKER. The alteration in form will be made, and then the resolution will be read a second time.

The resolution was accordingly modified, and read a second time, by its title, as a joint resolution, in reference to contracts for the extension of the Capitol.

Mr. CRAIGE. On the 19th day of September, 1851, a contract was entered into between Mr. Walter, the architect of the Capitol, and certain gentlemen, for the marble work to be used for the extension of the United States Capitol. The architect agreed to pay these parties "at the rate of 65 cents per cubic foot for all blocks of marble containing thirty cubic feet or less, and $1 98 per cubic foot for all blocks of marble containing over thirty cubic feet, according to the provisions, conditions, and requirements of the agreement."

According to the eleventh specification of the contract, "the shafts, exclusive of the capital and the lower diameter to be three feet, and the upper base, were to be twenty-five feet five inches high, diameter two feet seven inches. The upper torus of the base to be cut on the lower frustum of the shaft, and none of the frusta of the shaft to be less than four feet in height." Those who have charge of the extension now desire to have these blocks in large pieces. At the time the contract was made, it was supposed that they could not be so furnished; but the committee understand now, from those having charge of the quarries from which the marble is supplied, that blocks in large pieces can be furnished; but they refused to furnish them at the prices at which they had agreed to furnish the smaller.

According to the twenty-fifth specification, "the ashlar work throughout the buildings was to have beds from nine to eighteen inches, cut square throughout the entire thickness of the stone, and to be slightly free from the square on the front edge, to prevent fracture at the joints."

The architect and superintendent of this work think that these beds ought to be eighteen inches, and two feet and six inches; but the contractors refuse to furnish them at the low prices at which they were to furnish the other beds.

In order that we may therefore get the necessary supply of marble to carry on this work, I think it necessary that a change in the contract should be made. At the last session of Congress, the work of the Capitol was required to be measured according to the existing contract. The superintendent of the work did not feel himself at liberty to order the blocks of the size which the architect required without the concurrence of Congress, and therefore the committee having this matter in charge have directed me to report the resolution which has been read, and which I ask may be put upon its passage now.

The resolution was then ordered to be engrossed, and having been engrossed, was then read the third time.

The question then being, "Shall the resolution pass?" it was taken, and decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made an adverse report in the case of J. R. Sands, of the United States Navy; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of W. D. Porter, of the United States Navy; which was read the first and second time by its title.

Mr. P. said: There are circumstances connected with this bill which, if they were brought to the attention of the House, would, I think, induce the House to pass the bill at once. It provides for no appropriation, and avoids that question entirely. The bill has passed the Senate twice, and has only failed to pass this House from want of time. It proposes to leave the settlement of the accounts in this case entirely with the Auditor. It simply grants the power to a lieutenant in the Navy to settle his accounts, for until they are settled he cannot go into service. He has been in Washington for some three years, detained from service. On this account I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was read through by the Clerk.

It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Navy to cause the accounts of W. D. Porter, a lieutenant in the Navy of the United States, for moneys actually expended by him in bringing Amin Bey and suite to the United States, in conformity with the request of the Hon. George P. Marsh, the Minister of the United States at Constantinople, to be audited and settled, provided that the whole sum shall not exceed $2,204 32.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I submit that the bill makes an appropriation, and that, in accordance with the rules of the House, must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PERKINS. The bill makes no appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The bill will again be read, and the Chair will then determine whether it must go to the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk again read the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. The Chair will perceive that it makes no appropriation. It simply guards against an excess being paid to Lieutenant Porter. It does not say that even one dollar is due to him, but simply says that the Secretary of the Navy may audit and settle his accounts, and guards against paying more than a certain amount.

The SPEAKER. Under the provisions of the bill, if any money shall be found due to Lieutenant Porter, the Chair thinks he could draw it without any further legislation. In accordance with the rules and usages of the House, therefore, it must go to the Committee of the Whole House, unless, by unanimous consent, the rule be set aside.

Mr. PERKINS. If that be the case, I have no desire to press the passage of the bill upon the House now. I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill accordingly referred.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported "A bill for the relief of E. A. F. Levalette, a captain of the United States Navy;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I am directed, by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to report back a large number of petitions from different States, asking that all national disputes may be settled by arbitration, with the request that the committee may be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be laid upon the table.

There being no objection, the order was accordingly made.

Mr. HARRIS, of Alabama, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely upon the memorial of Francis A. McCauley; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EWING. I wish to present a memorial, which I believe comes within the rule of privilege, in respect to the right of one of the members of this House to a seat upon this floor. I have received this morning, as one of the members of the Committee of Elections, a memorial, signed by certain citizens of New York, representing that the Hon. MIKE WALSH, the Representative in Congress from that district, is not a citizen by naturalization of the United States, and that he was born in Ireland.

I wish to present this petition simply as a member of the Committee of Elections, and have it referred to that committee, without being understood to express any opinion in reference to it, further than simply to say that I should be very sorry to part with my friend over the way.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman need not give himself any trouble on my account.

The memorial was accordingly referred.

Mr. BISSELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill "for the relief of the legal representatives of Captain William Davis, late Commander of the United States transport schooner Eufaula;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. HENDRICKS, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Lieutenant William H. Weirick; and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made adverse reports on the applications of Zacariah Long and Robert Hughes for pensions; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. H., from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 155) "granting five years half pay to the widow of Captain John W. Gunnison;" with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. H., from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 121) "for the relief of Amelia Brown, widow of Major General Jacob Brown, deceased;" with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. H. said: It is right, perhaps, before I make the motion which I intend to submit, that I should state to the House that this Senate bill for the relief of the widow of Major General Brown gives her back pension to the amount of $19,000, and gives her, also, a pension for life, at the rate of $100 per month. This is in violation of all the principles that have governed the action of Congress in reference to pensions. I move that the bill do lie upon the table.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be so disposed of.

Mr. HUGHES. I object.

Mr. ORR. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee if there is no merit at all in the bill? Perhaps it would be better to refer it to a Committee of the Whole House, and consider it there.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana withdraw the motion to lay the bill upon the table?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do, for a moment. In reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, I will say that, in my judgment, there is much merit in the application of Mrs. Brown for a pension; but the Committee on Invalid Pensions have reported to this House a bill, giving her such a pension as she would be entitled to under the general law. That bill is before a Committee of the Whole House, and will be acted upon, and made to suit the House, as a matter of course.

Mr. ORR. Then I have no objection to the gentleman's motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I now renew the motion to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. HUNT. I ask for tellers on that motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ORR. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw that demand. If the House had heard what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] said, I am sure they would not hesitate to lay the bill upon the table. The Committee on Invalid Pensions has already reported a bill for the relief of Mrs. Brown, and it has been referred to a Committee of the Whole House. There is, therefore, no necessity for sending this bill there.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. PRATT. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will be permitted to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to lay the bill upon the table, and it is not debatable.

Mr. HENDRICKS. For the purpose of enabling the House properly to understand this whole question, I will, for the present, withdraw the motion to lay upon the table, and explain the condition of this bill. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have reported a bill giving to the widow of General Brown such pension as she could receive under the general pension law of the United States—that is, half pay for ten years. This bill, which the committee have reported, gives her half pay for ten years—no more than she could get under the general pension law.

Mr. OLDS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. HENDRICKS yielded the floor.

Mr. OLDS. The question I desire to ask is this: Does the bill, as it came from the Senate, propose to give to the widow of Major General Brown any larger pension than during the last Congress was given to the widow of General Worth?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The bill which the Committee on Invalid Pensions have reported does not give so large a pension as that of the widow of General Worth.

Mr. OLDS. But General Worth was higher in rank in the Army of the United States than General Brown.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The widow of General Worth received fifty dollars per month. But the Committee on Invalid Pensions did not think that this departure from the general policy of the pension laws ought to be followed by this Congress. That case was a departure from the policy of the general law. The general law gives to the widow of any officer—if the grade which he holds be above that of lieutenant colonel in the infantry—the half pay for five years which a lieutenant colonel in the infantry would receive.

The bill which we have reported in favor of Mrs. Brown gives her for ten years, the half pay of a lieutenant colonel of infantry: that is, thirty dollars per month. If the House consider this pension too small, it can, as a matter of course, be increased. That bill is now pending before Congress, and is, therefore, under the control of this House. If the House think that thirty dollars per month for ten years is not enough to give to the widow of General Brown, then, I repeat, that bill, as a matter of course, can be amended, to suit the wishes of the House.

The bill which we have reported, and which is now before the House, comes from the Senate; and I am inclined to think that that bill did not receive the careful consideration of that body, for I have never known, in the history of mere legislative action, such a bill to pass any legislative body.

The Senate bill gives her a pension from the year 1838, at the rate of the half pay which her husband was entitled to receive. His half pay while in the service was a hundred dollars per month—his whole pay two hundred dollars per month—a brigadier general of the Army of the United States. The half pay since 1838 to the present time, to which Mrs. Brown would be entitled according to this bill, would give her upwards of $19,000 of back pension; and the bill would also give her a hundred dollars per month for life.

That bill, I think, the House ought to lay upon the table.

A MEMBER. I think so too.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think it ought to be condemned in the most emphatic manner that this House can condemn it. For these reasons, sir, I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, (interrupting.) I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana, who reported this bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is it?

Mr. JONES. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have reported a bill giving to the widow of General Brown a pension, in pursuance of the general law of the land. I wish to ask the gentleman if there is any law upon the statute-books of this Government which authorizes the giving of a pension to a widow of any person who dies in time of peace; and if the pension is due, in pursuance of a general law, what is the necessity for reporting a bill at all? Why is it that a pension was not granted at the other end of the avenue?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That question may be very well discussed when we come to take up the other bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. But, for the present, I say, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, that the general law upon the subject of pensions will give a pension to the widow of a soldier, or of an officer, who dies in time of peace, provided he dies from the effect of wounds received in the public service, or from the effect of disease contracted during the war.

The committee found that General Brown did die from the result of wounds received during the war of 1812; and for that reason they thought the widow ought to have a pension. But she cannot get her pension through the Pension Department of the Government, because she cannot make the proof which the regulations of that Department require. It is satisfactorily shown, to the judgment of any man, I think, that General Brown did die in consequence of wounds received in the service of the country.

I am in favor of paying her a pension, as much as she would receive under the general law, but I am not in favor of such a bill as has come in here from the Senate.

I renew the motion to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was put, and the bill was laid upon the table.

PENSIONS.

Mr. EDMANDS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 117) "for the relief of Moses Olmsted;" which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMANDS also, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill "for the relief of Mary C. Hamilton;" which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMANDS also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Morrison, of New York, a soldier in the war of 1812, for an increase of pension, made an adverse report thereon; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMANDS also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of O. H. Whitney and others, from Mexico, New York, for another law in regard to pensions, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. EDMANDS also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Susan Worth, of Massachusetts, asking for a pension, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill of this House of the following title:

H. R. 175. "An act for the relief of John O. Means."

Also, that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles:

S. 19. "An act to authorize the State of Illinois to select the residue of the lands to which she is entitled under the act of 2d of March, 1827, granting land to aid that State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Illinois river with those of Lake Michigan;" and

S. 36. "An act to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoils committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801."

In which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.]

Mr. EDMANDS, from the same committee, reported back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, House bill (No. 167) "for the relief of pensioners under the act of February 3, 1853."

The bill was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the widows of officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, soldiers, mariners, or marines of the Revolutionary Army, who are entitled to pensions under the act of February 3, 1853, shall commence their pensions from the same date as the pensions authorized by the act of July 29, 1848, which date is the 4th day of March, 1848."

Mr. E. said: I hope that the House will consent to pass the bill at this time, as its provisions are perfectly simple and plain, and are such as should commend themselves to every man who desires to see justice done to a class of petitioners who are not now provided for by existing laws.

Mr. ORR. I hope that the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed. It is proposed to modify the law which was passed the 3d of February, 1853, in a material particular, if I understand it from the reading. The report which has been submitted by the committee in this case has not been printed. It was the intention of those who voted for the bill passed in February, 1853, to restrict the commencement of pensions granted to widows by that act to and from the time when the application should be made, or, at least, not a time prior to the passage of the act. It is the correct principle upon which all pensions should be granted. If the principle of giving pensions can be justified upon any ground at all, it is upon the ground that the Government gives to the beneficiary the means of subsistence. It is a gratuity, and the excuse for the gratuity is, to give him a support; and we should not, therefore, go back eight or ten years behind the time when the bill giving the pensions is passed. At all events, a bill of this character should be referred to the Committee of the Whole, and printed. Let the report also be printed; and if there be anything wrong in it, let the Committee of the Whole have an opportunity of revising and amending it. I hope it will be sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Prior to the passage of the act of 3d February, 1853, no widow of a revolutionary soldier could receive a pension who had married that soldier subsequent to the year 1800. The act of February 3, 1853, provided, that the widows of revolutionary soldiers should receive pensions, notwithstanding the fact that they were married subsequent to the 1st of January, 1800; and no matter at what time. By this act, the widows of these soldiers are entitled to pensions, under the same rule, and subject to the same restrictions, as widows married prior to the 1st of January, 1800. Now, sir, when the act of 1853 was passed and applications for pensions came to be presented under it, the Commissioner of Pensions so construed it, that no pension should commence before the passage of the act granting the pension. That was the construction given at the Pension Office; and why is it that it has been contended that such a construction is wrong? Because, when that law was passed, and applications came to be made under it, if the pension must commence with the date of its passage, February 3, 1853, not enough would be due to pay the agent making the application.

But is not the principle, that the pension shall commence with the passage of the act granting it, a correct one? Suppose you allow it to date back to 4th March, 1848—nearly five years before the passage of the law—and suppose that the soldier himself, who, in the mean time, had been receiving a pension, died on the 1st of January, 1853, if you give the construction to the act of 1853 which this bill proposes, it seems to me that by such a construction you would give two pensions, one to the soldier, and one to the widow. I therefore say, that the bill, at least in this respect, requires amendment, that the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] should prevail, and that the Committee of the Whole should have an opportunity of examining it.

Mr. EDMANDS. The act of February 3, 1853, not only states that this class of widows shall receive a pension, but it also defines explicitly the manner in which it shall be granted. It provides, that they shall receive pensions in the same manner as the pensioner under the act of 1848. But, sir, the Commissioner of Pensions has seen fit so to construe that act as to make their pensions date from February 3, 1853; and it is in consequence of that construction that these pensioners come forward, very properly, as I believe, and ask that they may be allowed their pensions from the same period as those under the act of 1848.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the law of 1853 provides for a five years' pension?

Mr. EDMANDS. It does. That is the extent to which it can be allowed, and it is only for half pay at that. But, sir, I would also look into the intent of the law of 1848, and into the intent of the law of 1853. The law of 1848 merely provided, that those widows who were married prior to 1800 should have pensions commencing with the passage of that act. The law of 1853 steps in to say, that those who married subsequently to 1800 shall have the same rights and privileges as those who married prior to that period. I demand the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman a single question, if he will withdraw the demand for the previous question. The gentleman from Indiana inquired of the gentleman who reported the bill, if the act of 1853 does not limit the pensions to five years, and I understood him to respond in the affirmative. Now, my understanding of the act is, that the first section of it extends additional five years' pensions to all widows of soldiers who have heretofore received five years' pensions. The second section of the act extends the benefits of the pension laws to all widows of revolutionary soldiers who have been married subsequent to 1800. There is no pension law ever passed by Congress which limits pensions to revolutionary soldiers to five years, or to any other period. The second section gives them during life, and that is the pension which it is now required shall go back and commence on the 4th of March, 1848. If the pensions were for only five years, it would be a matter of indifference whether they commenced in March 1848, or in February 1853, but this is to give them pensions for life.

Mr. EDMANDS. This bill is merely to carry out the act of 1853; it is merely declaratory of that act. I move the previous question.

Mr. MILLSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMANDS. I cannot withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MILLSON. I wish to ask if this is the bill which the Commissioner of Pensions says will cost the Government $200,000 a year?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and debate is therefore not in order.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question now being on referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was put; and, on a division, there were—ayes 71, noes 48.

Mr. EDMANDS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and VAIL were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes not counted.

So the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FULLER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not quite expired.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Before that question is put, I wish to say to the House that I am instructed, by the Committee of Ways and Means, to declare their readiness, if it shall be the pleasure of the House, to report a deficiency bill, in order that it may be referred and printed.

Mr. DEAN. For the purpose of allowing the gentleman to make that report I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. Did I understand the gentleman from Kentucky to ask the consent of the House to make the report?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I said I was instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to inform the House of their readiness to report to the House, if it shall be their pleasure, a deficiency bill, that it may be referred and printed.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will allow the Chair, he will suggest that the Committee of Ways and Means will soon be called upon for reports, if the House continues the call a short time longer.

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Libeas H. Babb, of Conway, New York, asking for an increase of pension, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. DENT also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of Leeman Gibbs, Watertown, Wisconsin, a soldier in the war of 1812, asking for a pension, made an adverse report thereon; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DENT also, from the same committee, reported a bill to provide a pension for James K. Welch, of Fulton county, New York; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DENT also, from the same committee, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed:

"A bill to be entitled 'An act to create and provide a pension for David Towle, of Oxford county, in the State of Maine.'"

Mr. DENT. I have been instructed, by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to report a bill in the case of Captain Thomas Porter. Before the report is made, I desire to state the peculiar circumstances which surround this case.

Since I was directed to make the report, and since the report in the case was made up, and the bill itself drawn in conformity thereto, I have been informed, by a gentleman from Indiana, that Captain Porter is dead.

I desire that the bill and report be read, and I hope, considering the peculiar circumstances of the case, that the bill, with an amendment which will be offered to it, will be passed now.

The gentleman from Indiana will move an amendment to the bill. The case is a meritorious one, and I hope it will receive the prompt consideration of the House. I ask that the bill may be read.

The bill, after being read a first and second time by its title, was read through.

The bill provides that the name of Captain Thomas Porter shall be placed upon the roll of invalid pensions, at the rate of twenty dollars per month, to commence on the second day of March, 1831, deducting therefrom such sum or sums as heretofore have been allowed and paid to him as pension money.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is it intended to put this bill upon its passage?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DENT. I desire that the report may be read, as a part of my remarks.

The report was then read, as follows:

W. B. W. DENT, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, in the case of Captain Thomas Porter, makes the following report:

That Thomas Porter entered the service in Captain James A. McClelland's troop of volunteer light dragoons in the month of October, 1812; continued in said service for one year; was severely wounded at the battle of Missinnoway, on the 19th December, 1812—so much so that he had to be and was carried on a litter from the battle ground to Dayton, Ohio, and from thence to Lebanon, Ohio, in a sleigh. His horse was killed in said battle. Partially recovering from said wound, he joined his troop in the following spring, and marched to Fort Meigs; was in the first siege of said fort, at which place he was slightly wounded by a cannon ball, the same killing a second horse for him while in the attitude of marching. He continued in the service till the close of the campaign, partaking in all the engagements of his squadron, and terminating with the battle of the Thames, after which he was discharged. Shortly after leaving the volunteer service, he received, without solicitation on his part, the appointment of ensign in the sixteenth regiment United States infantry, and soon thereafter, without solicitation, the additional appointment from President Monroe, of assistant-deputy quartermaster general, with orders to repair to Carlisle, in the State of Pennsylvania. He accepted the appointment, and promptly repaired to the post assigned him, and there continued, in the full discharge of his duties, until peace was made.

In the winter of 1814-'15, he felt serious inconvenience from the wounds he had previously received, and was confined to his bed for some weeks in consequence thereof. From the month of October, 1819, in consequence of said wounds, he has been confined to his bed, his crutches, and his staff. His sufferings have been great, beyond the power of language to express. The greater part of the thigh bone, below where the ball passed, has been extracted, and has left great inflammation, and a constant running sore. Doctor Jeremiah H. Brown has known Captain Porter since 1820—has been his physician since 1828. Doctor J. Smith, Professor of Surgery in the Medical College of Ohio, Doctor Crookshanks, and Doctor A. Brown, Army surgeons, all certify to the disability, and believe that it was brought on by severe service and exposure in the winter of 1814-'15. Doctor Jabez Percival, a surgeon and physician of fifty years' standing, attending on Captain Porter for four years, commencing in 1819, agrees with the above named medical men, that the disability was incurred by the hard service in the winter of 1814-'15, and says, that in all his history he has not witnessed so much suffering in any one patient.

The muster rolls show that Captain Porter had his horse killed at Fort Meigs, that his saddle, holsters, and pistols were torn to pieces, and that he immediately supplied himself with another horse. The committee find other and voluminous testimony, which they deem unnecessary to bring into this report, as enough has already been adduced to show that Captain Porter served his country gallantly and faithfully in every position in which he was placed—that in the hour of danger he has bravely and enthusiastically stood by his country's flag—that in so doing he has received wounds which make him an invalid for life—that he is poor and needy—that the country owes him a debt of gratitude, and ought to pay it liberally and promptly—that his few remaining days may be soothed with the consolation that his country, while she cannot heal those honorable scars, will provide for the necessities of him who wears them. The committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill.

Pending the reading of the report—

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, said, I rise to a question of order. Is it in order to have reports read during the morning hour upon private matters?

The SPEAKER. It is in order to read such a report as a part of the remarks of the gentleman asking such a privilege. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DENT] asked for the reading of the report as a part of the remarks which he intended to make.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move to amend the bill by adding at the end the following:

And the amount found due, under the provisions of this bill, shall be paid to the children of the said Captain Thomas Porter.

I merely desire to state to the House, that since this report has been made by the committee, Captain Thomas Porter has deceased, in consideration of which fact I have moved this amendment, providing that the amount found due shall be paid to his children. The bill, as reported by the committee, does not encroach upon the precedents heretofore set by Congress. In 1831, Congress placed upon the pension roll the name of Captain Thomas Porter, at the rate of eight dollars per month. At that time there was conclusive testimony that he was wounded at the battle of —, and at the battle of Fort Meigs; that the wounds were of an aggravated nature, and that they produced disability, while he held the rank of captain. This evidence was before Congress at that time; and it is now proposed in this bill that, in lieu of the eight dollars per month granted by Congress, his name shall be placed upon the pension roll to receive, instead of eight dollars per month, the half pay of captain.

I have known Captain Porter from my childhood; and there is another, within the sound of my voice, the son of the lamented Harrison, late President of the United States, who has also known him from a child—

Mr. DEAN, (interrupting.) I ask if the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. LANE. Will the gentleman withdraw the motion long enough for me to move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. DEAN. Certainly; I will withdraw for that purpose.

Mr. LANE. I now move that the bill and amendments be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the report, be printed.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill accordingly referred.

Mr. DEAN. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Must not the rule be suspended to go into the Committee of the Whole of the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. Then a two-thirds vote will be required.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House, a majority in this case may suspend the rules.

Mr. SMITH. I can only say, that I hope the House will proceed with the call of committees for reports.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to know whether the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] can accomplish his purpose in reference to the deficiency bill if we go into committee now?

Mr. SMITH. He cannot.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I hope the House will vote down the motion.

A MEMBER. He can introduce his bill to-morrow morning.

The question was put, and Mr. DEAN's motion agreed to—ayes 80, noes not counted.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. OLDS in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the business before the committee was the consideration of House bill (No. 37) "to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified," and that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEACHAM] was entitled to the floor.

NEBRASKA—KANSAS—SLAVERY.

Mr. MEACHAM. I propose to speak to-day on the subject of the Nebraska bill now before the committee, and being somewhat indisposed, I intend to strip my remarks of everything preliminary, and to give merely the naked line of argument that I wish to present on the subject.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a question of order. As the gentleman from Vermont has indicated the line of remark which he proposes to pursue, I make the point of order upon him that was made yesterday, that he is not speaking upon the subject now before the committee; that the House having limited the debate upon the homestead bill, and appropriated this time for its discussion, it is not in order, under the rules of the House, to discuss another subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the committee that this point was raised yesterday. The Chair stated then that the practice of the House had been to tolerate debate of this kind. On examining for precedents, however, the Chair has been unable to find any case in which a point of order was raised on this special point, although he knows that, during the last Congress, when the homestead bill was under consideration, great latitude of debate was allowed. The Chair stated yesterday that he should have been disposed then to sustain the point of order raised, if it had been raised for the first time. He is willing, to-day, to sustain the point of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MATTESON. I would inquire of the Chair if it is not within his recollection that this point has been repeatedly made before? I think, if the Chair will refresh his memory, he will remember that the point has been frequently made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will make himself distinctly understood by the committee, by stating the question as he understands it. The Chair is aware that the point of order has been made, that in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union great latitude of debate is allowable; but the Chair can find no precedent in which the point of order has been raised, that where a bill has been made the special order, the usual latitude of debate is cut off. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I wish to ask if the Chair does not recollect distinctly that a year ago, when the House was in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon this same bill, or a similar one—the bill of Mr. Johnson, of Tennessee—there was the widest and most unbounded latitude of debate, and that this very question of order was raised, and overruled by the Chairman, Mr. Stanton, of Tennessee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal is entertained. The Chair has already stated, that when the homestead bill was under consideration during the last Congress great latitude of debate was allowed, but not after the bill had been made a special order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I suggest to the Chair that that bill was a special order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides, that inasmuch as the House has determined that the homestead bill shall be the special order, to the exclusion of all other business, the debate must be confined to the homestead bill. From that decision an appeal is taken, and the question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the Chair allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. DISNEY. The question on appeal is not debatable.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I want to inquire of the Chair if this is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has made its decision, and the Committee can overrule the Chair if they wish.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I demand order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to debate the question.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is it not in order to make an inquiry?

Mr. WALSH. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio understand the question?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is as to a point of fact, which was stated by the Chair, that I rise to a question. I wish to have the fact understood, and whether the Chair is correct in its history of past events. I doubt that somewhat myself.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair is in error, the committee can correct it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very well; I wish to correct the Chair in relation to the truth of history, which must be maintained—

Mr. RICHARDSON. I again demand order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The inquiry I wish to ask is this: Whether during the last session a latitude of debate was not allowed on a similar bill, and whether subjects were not debated which were not at the time a special order?

Several MEMBERS. Certainly it was.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio does not understand the question which the Chair made at all. It is not that a latitude of debate is not allowed, for the Chair distinctly stated that such was the fact, but that the point of order which was raised was not distinctly made under the proposition; the point of order having been made, the Chair was disposed to sustain it, and if the committee do not believe its decision to be correct they can overrule it.

Mr. DEAN. I call for tellers on the appeal from the Chair's decision.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs CAMPBELL and DEAN were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 85.

So the decision of the Chair was overruled.

Mr. MEACHAM then resumed his remarks, and stated his objections to the bill to establish the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas. He contended that the population of these Territories was not such as to justify their erection into territorial governments; that by the passage of the bill gross injustice would be done to the Indian tribes inhabiting the region of country to which it applied, the Government having promised, by solemn treaty stipulations, that they should never be included within the boundaries of any State or Territory; and he also objected to the bill, because it proposed to do away with the Missouri compromise. If the Missouri compromise should be repealed, he earnestly believed, before God, it would be the last compromise that ever would be made between clashing interests of different sections; that it would not be the last that would be rendered null and void.

[The speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. FENTON. Will the gentleman from Vermont allow me to occupy five or ten minutes of his time in explanation?

Mr. MEACHAM. The gentleman can go on. I cannot speak any longer.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I should like to know if the gentleman yields the floor altogether?

Mr. MEACHAM. I do.

Mr. FENTON then addressed the committee in remarks which will be found embodied with those subsequently delivered, in another column of this day's proceedings. He was interrupted, before concluding, by the fall of the Chairman's hammer, which intimated that the portion of the hour yielded to him by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEACHAM] had expired.

Mr. WHEELER obtained the floor.

Mr. FENTON. Am I not still entitled to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York as taking a portion of the time of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MEACHAM.]

Mr. FENTON. I asked permission of the gentleman from Vermont to make an explanation. He yielded the floor to me before I commenced my explanation. At the expiration of the hour, I addressed the Chair, desiring then to make my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the gentleman's right to the floor has expired, and that his colleague [Mr. WHEELER] is entitled to it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Do I understand the decision of the Chair as taking the floor from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FENTON?]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so decided.

Mr. LANE. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair still adheres to the opinion, that the gentleman from New York is not entitled to the floor.

After some discussion in regard to the right of Mr. FENTON to address the committee during an hour upon his own right to the floor under the rule, in which Messrs. WENTWORTH, of Illinois, PECKHAM, WHEELER, McMULLIN, LANE, of Indiana, and LETCHER, participated.

Mr. WHEELER expressed a willingness to yield a portion of his time to his colleague, [Mr. FENTON.]

The CHAIRMAN decided, that if the gentleman from New York yielded the floor, except for personal explanation, he must yield it entirely.

Mr. WHEELER. Am I to understand that if I extend this courtesy to my colleague I lose my right to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I do not yield the floor.

Mr. LANE. I now insist that the question shall be taken on my appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The question was then put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Committee?" and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained, ruling that Mr. WHEELER was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to address this committee with some little reluctance, notwithstanding the gratuitous assertion of the honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SMITH,] that "he knew I was anxious to make a speech for my constituency." Sir, when I arrive at that point in my political history of which he boasts, I will hold my peace; until then, I shall at all times, despite the threats of power or Executive promises, speak the honest sentiments of my heart, in behalf of an honest constituency. Sir, in the discharge of my duty I shall be honest and fearless. I came here to sustain the principles of the Democratic party, and to assist in legislating for the common good, not to pin my faith or opinions to the coat-sleeve of any man or any Administration. I am here to do my duty to my country and myself. If, in the discharge of that duty, I use language that grates harshly upon the ear, attribute it to the plain garb in which truth is clothed, rather than a desire to wound the sensibility of any member of this House. Sir, to me the most despicable position for a man on this floor is to have a motive for his vote, and be ashamed to avow it. I do not insinuate that such has been the case; I do not say that the Executive sword has been suspended over the head of any member of this House; but I do say there have been some who, honored by a seat upon this floor, have progressed in notoriety, and hold conspicuous places when they do not enjoy the "largest liberty;" that under the cowardly threat of decapitating one friend, and refusing to appoint another, men have exposed themselves to the suspicion of having forgotten their allegiance to their constituency, and the common good.

In passing the "White House" at the other end of the avenue a few days ago, a friend, looking at its graceful columns and fine proportions, suddenly exclaimed, "AXES GRINDING HERE." I was then, for the first time, struck with the force of the answer, (when asking why a certain member voted as he did,) "Oh! he has an axe to grind." It seems that there is a great Government grindstone, the approach to which is guarded by a modern Cerberus, called "Yield All." In order to use this grindstone you have to divest yourself of all independence of thought and action—you are to have no will of your own. Having constituted yourself a "living corpse," you are at liberty to give a keen edge to your axe, in order that you may cut through the grating of principle and seize fast hold of the spoils.

Sir, my constituency did not send me here to sharpen my axe at the expense of principle; they sent me here to yield nothing; they sent me here to stand up boldly for sound, National Democracy against our common enemy, regardless of spoils or Executive dictation. They use no trick or subterfuge to obtain place. It requires no interpreter to tell what they mean when they speak. They are independent in their action—asking for nothing to which they are not entitled—and that they will have (if at all) without fawning. "I shall in all the best obey them."

Sir, there was a time in the history of this Government, when, to insure the success of a great public measure, it was not necessary to ask—"Does the President approve it?" "How does Mr. Guthrie feel on this subject?" "Won't Jefferson Davis take offense?" "Will Caleb Cushing, independent in nothing but his politics, sanction it?" I say, sir, there was a time when such questions would have been an insult to gentlemen on this floor. That, however, was the golden age of principle, when it was not necessary daily to define one's position; when men's principles were embodied in all their acts; when there was no man-worshipping or timeserving; no getting astride of the line, waiting the issue of the contest, and then leaping to the side of the victor, and claiming the spoils. The man who dared that, was sure to have his shins cracked on both sides of the line, and be made (as he should be) a political cripple for life. But, alas! times have sadly changed. Nothing can now be done without consultation with the "Powers that be." You must trim your sails to the Executive breeze, or you will be driven among the breakers; you must lose all independence, and submit to a dictation as impudent as it is overbearing; you are commanded to take to your bosom the assassins who struck down the party in 1848; you are to make a glorious "union" of all the isms of the day, in order that the Democracy may be invincible. The old rank and file, who have borne our banner in triumph through many a hard-fought contest—whose courage is undoubted, and whose scars are honorable—are thrust aside to make room for—whom, sir? For renegades and traitors; for the ragged camp-followers—the miserable deserters, who, near starvation through their own treachery, now crave the food that will strengthen them for a still more damning treason. Has it come to this? Is the Democratic party so powerless—utterly powerless—as to need the assistance of its enemies? Must she not only grant an amnesty, but pay a bounty to traitors, or meet defeat? Where, oh where is that quickening, life-giving power that for sixty years has crowned with laurels the genius of our party? Where is that spirit that breathed into our system an activity that enabled us to embrace the land that lies between the Atlantic and the Pacific, and say to all the world—this, this is the gift of a liberal, unadulterated, National Democracy?

That spirit is still with us, and we need not the aid of designing and treacherous men; that spirit is fully equal to its mission, is fully able to cope with enemies without, or traitors within. It makes no truces; it grants no amnesties; it pays no bounties; it cannot live in the same atmosphere with Van Burenism, or Free-Soilism.

Sir, the people I have the honor to represent are national, in the strictest sense of the term—opposed to Van Burenism, Free-Soilism, or any other ism that can in the least degree raise the question of disunion. They are against all—ALL—Federal encroachments upon the rights of the States, and will denounce any President who exercises his official power to muzzle any citizen in the free expression of his opinion, or in the exercise of the elective franchise; and the President who does it, in my humble opinion, has in his nature the elements of weakness and despotism. They are in favor of honest men for office, those who have never altered their principles or deserted their party. Now, sir, in this connection, I will say that this Administration has been charged with filling the highest places with the Free-Soilers of 1848. How has this charge been met?—with argument? No, sir; on the contrary, private character has been most villainously traduced, and the columns of the "Organ" fairly staggered under the weight of calumny they contained. This is, indeed, a "crushing-out" Administration—I thank the Attorney General for that word. Instead of convincing argument, we have had presented to us a salmagundi of abuse—a kind of cross between blackguardism and refined vulgarity; instead of the keen, clear cutting of the practical anatomist, it is the mangling of the blacksmith's sledge; instead of manly boldness and eloquent vindication, it is unmanly cowardice and base vituperation.

Why, sir, an individual as humble as myself could not escape the lank jaws of this hyena press that fattens on the blood of character. I have been assailed in the most indecent manner; and my occupation has been sneeringly alluded to. Well, sir, what matters it if I am a hotel keeper—does that place me without the pale of Congress? Does that banish me from the company of honorable men? Does it debar the expression of opinions, for which I entertain honest reasons? Sir,

"I had rather be a toad,

And live upon the vapor of a duncheon," than be the proprietor or editor of a paper so entirely void of respect, and whose somersaults on great public questions are as astounding as the sudden evolutions of traveling mountebanks. I had always been under the impression that the vocation of hotel keeping was an honest calling, quite as necessary to the comfort and necessity of society as to be the "Organ" of an Administration "that runs with the hare and holds with the hounds." Hotel keepers must stand up to their advertisements; they must treat their guests like gentlemen; they must not tell them they are grocers, sawyers, or tape sellers; they must give them bread and meat, and that of the best kind, or they will change their quarters.

Not so with that political hotel at the other end of the avenue, called the "White House." Gentlemen know from experience they must put up with what they choose to give them there, or leave the house, and have all out of doors for their comfort. Now, sir, I am one of those who would prefer, like Lazarus of old, to sit outside and wait for God's mercy, rather than be in doors and have crammed down my throat what I could not keep on my stomach. If I mistake not, the father of that organ's master (one Colonel Benjamin Pierce) once kept a tavern. I am told that when he made his hotel-inaugural, he stood up to his advertisement—the entertainment to which he invited his guests was what they expected and found. His meats were said to have been served upon separate dishes, and not indiscriminately hashed together. But a truce, sir, to this pleasantries.

My Free-Soil colleague [Mr. HUGHES] has had the hardihood to insult the one hundred thousand national men of New York, by asserting on this floor, that at the next election in that State a fife and drum would draw together but a corporal's guard.

Mr. HUGHES, (interrupting.) I will say to the gentleman that I made no such remark. I said that if the existence of "Hards" and "Softs" had been left upon that question alone, no other issues being brought in, then, in such case, it would have taken the life and the drum to collect the "Hards" together.

Mr. WHEELER. That is about the same thing.

Mr. HUGHES. I did not speak of the next election, or of any election.

Mr. WHEELER. Taking the gentleman as he says, yet prophecy does not always turn out to be history, and it may be so with the prediction of my colleague. We are to have a State election in New York in November next, and the National Democrats will not fail to have their ticket in the field. That the Whig party will make their nomination no one doubts; and if the Free-Soilers, with or without the cooperation of this Administration, dare to put forth their candidates, the result will show where the strength of the Democratic party of New York lies. I shall not aim to vie with my colleague in the character of a prophet, but will leave the result to show whether we have four votes to their one, or not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this slur is worthy of being cast by one who boasts that he voted for Van Buren and Adams, and under like circumstances would do it again. This impertinent assault could only come from one who hides himself and his duty to the country behind the burly forms of his constituency. Sir, let me say to that gentleman that very possibly the hour of his reckoning is coming—nay, is close at hand—when that life and drum will be used for the legitimate purpose of drumming from the ranks, to a certain notorious tune, these camp-followers and peculiar friends of the Administration—those who make bargains to break them. Such men, stripped of their borrowed plumage, will hereafter go forth bearing the brand of the letter "D," as an evidence of their second political apostasy.

Now, sir, I desire to trace the progress of this Administration from its inauguration into power up to this present time, and see if it has not proved faithless to the trust the Democracy of the country reposed in it. I recollect with gratification the inaugural of General Pierce. The doctrines it contains commend themselves to the heart of every patriot. But, sir, it is one thing to preach and quite another to practice. The "Union was to be preserved inviolate;" and how has it been done? By the appointment of men to the Cabinet who fought the battle of the Union and the Constitution? By the choice of men who all their lives long had labored for the success of Democratic principles? No—no, sir. The national men of the party have been overslaughed, and a man made the chief adviser of the President who for a quarter of a century warred against the Democratic party. They have taken to their bosoms and confidence men who possess to such an extent the elements of fanaticism—ruthless and merciless—that they would strike down the Constitution and sing peans of rejoicing over a torn and dismembered Union. Can the tongue be silent when the eye witnesses such outrages committed in the honored name of Democracy?

"The Union was to be preserved inviolate," and how? By resting upon the strong arm of that Jeffersonian creed that despised alliance with traitors? No, sir; that was too antiquated—too old fogyish. In order to preserve inviolate the Union, it was thought necessary to bargain and huckster with the Free-Soilers of 1848—with few exceptions men of no consistency, of no principle, and whose capacious maw can digest all the spoils a treacherous Administration can cram it with, and then impudently ask for more. But, sir, not only was the Union to be preserved inviolate, but the rights of the States to be held sacred. How was this pledge carried out? Go to my own State, and ask the one hundred thousand honest, principle-loving, National Democrats what they were fighting for in November last, and they will tell you that they were resisting the encroachments of the Federal Executive; and they did it successfully. They fought, Mr. Chairman, for the rights of their State against the impudent and tyrannical power of an Administration that had shamelessly coalesced with the enemies of the Constitution, and sent its own officers heading bands of hired ruffians to a convention of the people to speak by authority. I say bands of hired ruffians, armed, and of the most desperate character, led on by two officers of the Federal Government, who overawed and controlled its action; and when my "Soft" colleague [Mr. WESTBROOK] made the assertion that this was incorrect, he was guilty, either ignorantly or willfully, of misrepresentation.

Go to Massachusetts, and ask the cause of the indignation of the people of that State, and they will tell you that a Cabinet officer spoke through the trumpet of the President, and threatened Democrats with a "crushing out," if they dared to do that which this Administration has been doing ever since it came into power—coalescing with Free-Soilers. And how did they receive the message? They looked upon it as a direct interference in the rights of their State, and hurled back with indignation the letter of the Attorney General, preferring, if they were to be lectured at all, to have a father of the party do it, and not an apostate from the Whig faith; to have a man whose skirts were clean, and not one who owed all the positions he ever held in the Democratic party to the success of coalitions. And why, sir, was this same letter, to which I allude, telegraphed by a Whig—who boasts of it—to the State of Mississippi, on the eve of an important election, long before it was sent to Massachusetts? Who paid the expense of telegraphing this long letter to that State. This Whig has assured me, repeatedly, that the bill was sent to the office of the Union, the organ of the Executive, and there promptly paid. Why was it done? Why could not the Administration refrain from meddling in the election of a sovereign State? Alas! who would have thought that the rights of the States would be thus outraged?

But not only was the Union to be preserved inviolate, and the rights of the States held sacred, but every citizen was to walk forth free and untrammelled, in all the majesty of freedom. How was this pledge fulfilled? Why, sir, they appointed Greene C. Bronson collector of New York without his solicitation, and because he would not submit to the arrogant dictation of those who were seeking to lower him in the estimation of all honest men, he was dismissed; but not until he had left on record a correspondence as imperishable as it is ennobling; that reflects credit upon his head and heart; that adds to the sum total of our country's honor, while it administers a scathing rebuke to a Cabinet despotism that seeks to make tools out of men who are infinitely their superiors.

Again, sir. During the last election in New York how were the citizens in the employ of the Government treated? Were they left free and untrammelled? No, sir. They were made—that's the word, made—to contribute funds to support the "Free-Soil ticket," and in case of refusal were threatened with dismissal. Many of these employees had large families, and not liking the cheerless prospect of being unprovided through the coming winter, were forced to yield. Others refused, and would not give. They are still in office, but expect to be removed, now that the confirmation of Mr. Redfield has been effected. Is this protection to citizens in the just exercise of opinions? Are men, previous to taking position under the Government, to forego all right of thought or expression? If so, then Democracy is only another name for slavery—slavery the most abject and intolerable.

Now, sir, I am not only speaking to members of this House, I am speaking to the people of the country. I know not whether the committee will agree with me in what I have said, but I know the people do, because they have experienced the crushing hand of the Administration in the manner to which I have alluded. They know that the doctrines promulgated in the inaugural have been discarded; they know the promise has only been kept to the ear, and they are now asking, Why has the pledged faith been violated; why has the President coalesced with Free-Soilers? Why has the sovereignty of the States been invaded? Why have citizens been trammelled in the just exercise of their rights? Why were the compromise measures repudiated, and their friends tauntingly told "that they never had the strength to elect a President?" Sir, I do not believe the Baltimore platform was a swindle. The people do not believe it. There was no acquiescence; it was an unconditional approval. Everywhere throughout the land the people are rising up and declaring the assertion false, that General Pierce was not elected solely on the strength of the compromises. We were not cheated; we were not swindled. General Pierce was not whirled into power upon a delusion—it was a living, breathing, soul-stirring reality. The Constitution and its compromises, was the battle-cry; the Constitution and its compromises was the stake; the Constitution and its compromises was the consummation of the most overwhelming victory in the annals of politics. Sir, the "Hards" of New York claim that victory as theirs; they claim it as the original and steadfast friends of those measures; they claim it as men who have done their whole duty to their country; they claim it as men who, in all time to come, will do their whole duty to their country.

Sir, one word in conclusion. I was astonished to hear the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] apply a test to the "Hards" of New York—a test of their Democracy. Sir, they need no testing. When the Constitution was in danger they stood by it; and if it is about to be endangered again, they will stand by it. He asks what it is the New York Hards want, if it is not the sympathy of the once chivalrous South. Let me tell him they despise sympathy—they want acts. They want the South to be true to the Constitution and State-Rights, and not to be blinded with office and Executive promises, so that they seemingly forget that there is a Constitution, and that there is still a principle left called State-Rights. They want them to have honor enough left not to deliberately stifle investigation into the acts of a treacherous Executive, who has proved recreant to the great principles upon which he was carried into power. True, sir, the Hards have been mocked at, and spit upon by the Administration—that they have been denounced as disorganizers and mischief-makers—that they have been called place-hunters. The Executive has endeavored to drive us outside the pale of the party; all that envy and malice combined could heap upon us has been our portion; and yet they are now begging—BEGGING the Hards on this floor for their votes to aid in the passage of the Nebraska bill. Where are their allies—the Free-Soilers? Certainly they will not desert the Administration in this, its hour of dire extremity.

Sir, there is a story told somewhere of a distinguished British officer, who, during the Revolution, paid a visit to a lady in Charleston. They were walking in the garden, when the officer called her attention to a beautiful flower, at the same time asking, "what is it called?" She replied, "it is called the rebel flower." "And why?" said he. "Because," was the answer, "the more it is trodden on, the more it flourishes." Now, sir, there may be a moral in this, when applied to the "crushing-out" policy of the Administration.

Mr. FENTON next followed, in reply to the speech made some time since by Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. He denied the right of that gentleman to prescribe a test for members on this floor, and if the Nebraska bill should be presented as that test, the gentleman would find Softs springing up all over the North. Mr. F. then gave his views on the Nebraska bill, and earnestly opposed the repeal of the Missouri compromise of 1820.

[The speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. BOYCE next obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. ROBBINS, who moved that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill (No. 37) "to encourage agriculture, commerce, and manufactures," and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I withdraw it.

DEFICIENCY BILLS.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Perhaps it may be the pleasure of the House, before it adjourns, to adopt the suggestion made by me this morning in relation to the Committee of Ways and Means, and allow the bills which they have brought forward to be referred and printed, so that the matter may be in possession of the House.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the gentleman should make the report?

Many Voices. "Yes!" "Yes!"

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE then reported from the Committee of Ways and Means "A bill to supply the deficiency in the appropriations for the services of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1854;" which was read a first and second time by its title.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, unless objected to.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The question was then put to the House, and carried in the affirmative; and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALSH. Was it in order for the Committee of Ways and Means to make a report at this time?

The SPEAKER. It was in order, by unanimous consent.

Mr. WALSH. I certainly made objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the objection, or he certainly would have been governed by it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I wish to report another bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, being a bill to provide for the completion of certain custom-houses and marine hospitals therein mentioned.

Mr. HAMILTON. I object to its introduction.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I hope that the House will allow the bill to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The precise bill which the House agreed, by unanimous consent, should be reported, was the deficiency bill. The Chair must enforce the rules, if any gentleman objects. Does the gentleman from Maryland withdraw his objection?

Mr. HAMILTON. I am opposed to that bill, and I will take every legal advantage to defeat it. I do not withdraw my objection.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to be heard one moment upon this question of order, if the House will indulge me. The request, sir, that was made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE,] was one that he was authorized and directed to make by the Committee of Ways and Means, and it was that he might report these bills together. The committee were unwilling that the subject should be opened or submitted to the House unless the bills were received in that way. They felt desirous that these bills should be placed before the House for its judgment and deliberation, and they thought that wise and consistent legislation required that the subjects should be kept separate, so that the House might fairly understand the measures before them, and be unembarrassed by having measures connected which the votes of the House heretofore may be said to indicate it wishes to consider and vote upon separately. I hope that the matter may come before the House as it was proposed by the committee, and then the House may make such disposition of it as they see fit. Any other course would be getting from the committee what it has never intended or determined to give.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I will state, unless I have forgotten what I did say, that I asked the consent of the House to report bills from the Committee of Ways and Means; and if reference was had to my remarks—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Kentucky arose in his place and stated to the House that he desired to make a report of the deficiency bill. What the purpose of the gentleman from Kentucky was it is impossible for the Chair to understand.

Mr. PRATT. I think that the Chair must be mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that he cannot be mistaken as to the language used by the gentleman from Kentucky. By unanimous consent the report submitting the deficiency bill was made. The gentleman from Kentucky proposes now to report another and a different bill; but the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMIL-TON] makes objection. It is not in the power of the Chair to control the matter. It is certainly not in order for the gentleman from Kentucky to report the bill which he desires now to submit, unless the objection be withdrawn.

Mr. HAVEN. Perhaps I may be allowed to say, that I do not doubt that the Chair states correctly what he understood the gentleman from Kentucky to say, but I desire also to say that I feel it my duty to announce to the House that these two bills were reported together by the Committee of Ways and Means, and that it was the understanding of that committee that they should go together to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and that one should not be reported unless the other was at the same time reported, that the House might exercise its sound judgment upon them.

Mr. HUNT. It seems to me that if this matter was distinctly understood, there would be no difficulty with respect to it. I hope the gentleman from Maryland will withdraw his objection, and allow this bill to go along with the other to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. HAVEN. I do not; but I desire to call the attention of the Chair, and of the House, to the circumstances under which these bills were reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt as to what was the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means. He does not doubt that the two bills were designed to be reported together; but he is greatly mistaken if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] so stated when he asked the consent of the House.

Mr. HAVEN. I will not appeal from the decision of the Chair; but while I am upon the floor, in order to set the Committee of Ways and Means right, duty requires that I should move to reconsider the vote by which the first bill reported to the House was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is the only method by which I can place that committee where it placed itself, and desires to stand.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I have but one remark to make. I have just told the House for what I thought I had asked their consent. The Chair understood me differently. I find, however, that gentlemen around me have the same recollection as myself, that I asked the consent of the House to report bills from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will allow the Chair to say that if he has misstated the request of his colleague from Kentucky, he will be very happy to be corrected in his recollection by the House; but he has stated, and now repeats that it is his recollection, that the gentleman rose in his place and asked the unanimous consent of the House to report a deficiency bill. The consent of the House was given, and the report was made; and the Chair must say, in all candor, that he does not recollect any other remark made by the gentleman from Kentucky. There need be no difficulty, however, in reference to the matter.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will the Chair allow me to make a single remark?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will remember that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] has submitted a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill reported by the gentleman from Kentucky was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and has the floor upon that question.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, I have no doubt that the gentleman from New York will allow me to ask him a single question.

Mr. HAVEN. If the gentleman simply desires to make an inquiry, I will yield him the floor.

Mr. FLORENCE. I only desire it for that purpose.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New York to allow me to say, as I feel a little sensitive upon this point, and as the recollection of the Chair is different from mine, that there are other gentlemen around me whose recollection agrees with mine; and, not only this, but I am informed by a friend that the reporter who took down my language at the time says I was correct.

Mr. HUNT, (Mr. FLORENCE yielding the floor.) In justice to the Chair, I will say that I understood the gentleman from Kentucky as the Chair has stated; but nevertheless, it is no matter whether he has made such a mistake or not. Gentlemen are all agreed that there should be a reference of these two bills, as the report of the Committee of Ways and Means. Let us then make that reference, and adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a single question, and will occupy the time of the House but a moment. I wish to ask him why these two bills have been separated, and whether that separation was made by the order of the Committee of Ways and Means, and has received their sanction?

While upon the floor, I may be permitted to say, that in the confusion incident to the motion to adjourn—I say "incident to," because such a motion always creates confusion in this House—I understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] distinctly to say that he desired to make a report from the Committee of Ways and Means. Well, I certainly concluded that he had the unanimous consent of the House to make a report of one, two, three, or four bills. The report is a unit in itself, so far as the privilege is concerned, and I apprehend that the gentleman has a right to report two or three bills. I ask the gentleman from New York whether both of these bills have received the assent of the Committee of Ways and Means, and if so, why they are separated?

Mr. HAVEN. I would not trouble the House to listen to me while I answered all the questions put to me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have no objection to the reporting of these bills, as is known to the House.

Mr. HAVEN. Let me state briefly, in answer to the first interrogatory, why the bills were separated. The committee think it is proper that limitations and restrictions should be put upon appropriations for custom-houses and marine hospitals. The committee thought that that course was wise. I, for one, thought so, and I think the whole committee thought so too. I so indicated my opinion to the House some days since, whilst the former deficiency bill was under consideration.

I will add, sir, that the Committee of Ways and Means have been censured from all parts of the House, heretofore, for not regarding the estimates from the Treasury, and for not divining in advance what the wishes and sense of the House were on these subjects, and for not reporting their bills beforehand, as the House afterwards determined it wanted them. Now, sir, the committee desired to report both these bills to the House, because the disputed or contested items contained in both of them have received the deliberate sanction of the House, on the yeas and nays.

The committee therefore determined that whilst doing justice to the House, and to the business they were transacting, they would reflect the sense of the House in these two bills, and let the House complain of itself, and not of the Committee of Ways and Means, if it was dissatisfied. The committee desired to reflect back, as far as they could, the deliberate acts and opinions of the House; they felt that would be consistent for the committee, and they knew the House would hereafter remain in its action consistent with what it has done heretofore on this subject. That is the reason why the bills have been reported, and in the shape in which they are reported, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. ORR. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York. I understand that he moves to reconsider the vote by which the deficiency bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Is that his motion?

Mr. HAVEN. It is.

The SPEAKER. That is the motion.

Mr. ORR. Then I desire to inquire of the gentleman what he will accomplish by the reconsideration of that vote? The bill is already in the possession of the House. I regret that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] persists in his objection to allowing the gentleman from Kentucky to report the second bill; but it seems to me that the gentleman from New York will not accomplish the purpose he has in view, even if his motion to reconsider prevails.

The Committee of Ways and Means, if the gentleman will pardon another remark, will, in all probability, be called for reports to-morrow, during the morning hour, when they can submit this second bill. The two bills, being separate, would have to go on the Calendar, each one taking its place thereon; and if the committee report the second bill to-morrow morning, it probably will not be placed on the Calendar below the position it would have occupied if the gentleman from Kentucky had been allowed to report it this evening. I would therefore suggest to the gentleman from New York that he should not press his motion to reconsider, inasmuch as nothing can be gained by it.

Mr. HAVEN. I receive in all kindness, as I have no doubt it was intended, the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina; but I desire to say here, and will repeat while I have the floor, that the Committee of Ways and Means have been "pitched into" from all quarters in this House, and, as one of that committee, I am determined that this House shall quarrel with itself, and not with the committee, in reference to these bills. I will not, for one, consent that the report of the committee shall be divided. It came in here united in reference to these bills, and I ask that they may be reported together, as the committee intended to have them reported, or that the House let us have them back under our control.

Mr. CLINGMAN. By the permission of the gentleman from New York, I would suggest a point of order to the Chair. A difficulty arises in determining what was the extent of the leave which the House granted to the gentleman from Kentucky—whether it was to submit a report embracing two bills, or only a single bill. I submit to the Chair that the House is the proper judge of the extent to which it went in that leave, and that the Chair may properly refer it to the House to say—each member voting according to his own understanding—what was the extent of the leave given to the gentleman. Then, if a majority hold that permission was given to the gentleman to make a report embracing two bills, he can report the second bill. It seems to me that the Speaker would be right in submitting the question to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be very happy to give the subject that direction, and leave it to the House to determine what it was that it intended to do.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I hope the Chair will state the question in that way.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him to make a remark?

Mr. HAVEN yielded the floor for that purpose.

Mr. JONES. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, who holds the floor, I will state that I was not in my seat when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] made his request, and consequently I cannot determine what his exact language was. But I think it is immaterial what it was. All whom I have heard speak of it—the Chair included—agree that he stated he wished to make a report from the Committee of Ways and Means as to the bill or bills supplying the deficiencies in the appropriation of the current year. Then, sir, all the items in these bills have been heretofore before the House, and have been voted in as deficiencies. The most of them, if not every one of them, seem to be for custom-houses, asking for deficiencies; and if all of them had been in the one bill, there would have been but one report. In my opinion, there is but the one report made by the committee at the same time; and whatever may have been the phraseology employed by the gentleman from Kentucky, it seems to me that, from the nature of the case, and from the position of the two bills, and from what was said by the committee when they authorized the report to be made, that they included both of these bills which they proposed to report. One bill comes as much under the force of this request to report the deficiency bill as the other.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Let the House determine whether they gave leave or not, as they understood it. They can vote just as they understood the matter at the time. I think that is a fair way of settling the difficulty.

Mr. PRESTON made some remarks, which, owing to the confusion in the Hall, were too indistinctly heard to be reported, maintaining that the Committee of Ways and Means had, by the votes in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and on yeas and nays in the House, been fully instructed as to what should be reported in the bills now the subject of controversy. He saw no reason why both bills should not be received, referred, and printed. His recollection coincided with that of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] as to the extent of the request made to the House, and to which unanimous consent was accorded. He [Mr. PRESTON] was fortified in his recollection by the gentlemen around him. He therefore thought that the matter was perfectly plain and trusted that, without discussion, the sense of the House would be taken, as proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] as to whether the House should permit the Committee of Ways and Means to make an unconditional report instead of a contingent one.

Mr. HAVEN still retaining the floor.

Mr. KEITT. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HAVEN. With pleasure.

Mr. KEITT. I merely desire to state a point of order in relation to this matter.

Mr. HAVEN. That you could have done without my consent.

Mr. KEITT. I agree with the remarks made by the Chair; and yet I have not a particle of objection to the introduction of those bills by the gentleman from Kentucky. Indeed, I should be glad to have them introduced. But I submit a point of order, whether or not they can be received by this House. These bills can only be introduced by unanimous consent. This being the case, can a majority now, by indirection, accomplish the same purpose? If there be a single individual in the House voting against it, I submit that it is but fair to him to give him the exercise of those rights with which he is invested by parliamentary rule. This bill, therefore, I submit, cannot be introduced, unless by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. HUNT. The difficulty can be remedied in this way. This is a part of the deficiency bill; a part of the one report; and in this way a majority can agree to receive the report under the leave originally granted; or the House may grant leave on motion.

Mr. HAVEN still retaining the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HAVEN. Of course, with pleasure.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman has moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill making appropriation for the deficiencies has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If the House adjourns now, the Committee of Ways and Means can report the other bill in the morning. Then the gentleman can withdraw the motion to reconsider, and the bills will go together upon the Calendar to the Committee of the Whole, and the object sought will be accomplished. I do not see how the gentleman can get at it, unless in some such way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states that he has no recollection at all of any intimation from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] that there were two bills to be reported. His recollection is that the gentleman from Kentucky rose and asked the unanimous consent of the House to allow him to introduce a deficiency bill. The gentleman from Kentucky thinks that the recollection of the Chair is incorrect. Other gentleman, too, think the Chair misremembered the precise request made by the gentleman, and granted to him by the House.

The Chair would be happy, as far as the mere point of recollection is concerned, if the House would take that matter in their own hands. If confined to the rules, the Chair must decide that the objection made by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] to the introduction of the second bill, is conclusive in regard to it, and that it cannot be introduced. The Chair hopes the House will determine what they agreed, by unanimous consent, should be introduced by the gentleman.

Mr. HAVEN. I hope it will do so.

Mr. WALSH. With the consent of the gentleman from—

The SPEAKER. The Chair only asks the House to relieve the Chair.

Mr. WALSH. I remarked to the Chair that I objected to the introduction of the first bill.

The SPEAKER. Very true.

Mr. WALSH. The Chair said he did not hear the objection. Now my objection stands good, if this one does.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the objection made by the gentleman from Maryland must stand, according to the rules.

Mr. HAVEN. One word more. The House is very liable to get fatigued in these operations, and to grow uneasy and weary. I hope it will pardon me. But I have no objection to proceeding with this matter to-night, as long as I can keep myself in such a position that the Committee of Ways and Means, of which I am a member, shall not be made, by the hasty action of the House here, and by the misunderstanding of the Chair, to do a thing which they have not intended to do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say in reply to that that the gentleman from Kentucky should have been more explicit.

Mr. HAVEN. I remarked that I did not doubt that the Chair stated truly what he understood to be the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky. I therefore feel bound to insist upon my motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 34, noes 55; no quorum voting.

Mr. GOODRICH. I would inquire whether it is in order to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to a question of order?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do. Can any business be done by this House when there is not a quorum present?

The SPEAKER. There cannot.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I object to all business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

The Chair then proceeded to count the House, and announced that there were ninety-three gentlemen present.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to inquire of the Chair what the condition of this matter will be if the House should adjourn now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] will be at liberty to call up his motion to reconsider the first thing to-morrow unless it interferes with some previous motions of the like character.

Mr. ORR. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that he had better withdraw the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. A motion to reconsider is a privileged question. There are now one or two motions to reconsider entered upon the Clerk's Journal, which will take the precedence of that made by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HAVEN. Under the decision made by the Chair, and relying, as I believe I may, upon the desire of the House to see justice done, at least in one instance, to the Committee of Ways and Means, when they ask for it, I withdraw my call for the previous question, and move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was then taken upon Mr. HAVEN's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 16, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. WELLER presented the memorial of Lewis Warrington, jr., purser in the United States Navy, praying to be allowed the difference between the pay of a purser of a frigate and that of a first-class steam-frigate, while thus employed on board the steamship Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. JAMES presented the memorial of the heirs-at-law of Captain W. H. Allen, late of the United States Navy, praying Congress to grant them such a sum as will suitably compare with the extent of his brilliant services in the last war with England; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FOOT presented the petition of Nathaniel Doty, of Vermont, praying to be allowed a pension as an invalid of the Revolution; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented a memorial of citizens of Louisa county, Iowa, praying a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Fort Wayne, Indiana, via Rochester, Lacon, New Boston, and Wapello, to Council Bluffs City, on the Missouri river, near the mouth of the Platte; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAMLIN presented two petitions of citizens of Maine, praying the enactment of a law granting one hundred and sixty acres of land to each soldier who served in any of the wars of the United States, and to the widows or heirs of those deceased; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ADAMS presented the petition of James Robertson, praying indemnity for his arrest and imprisonment without cause, by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, in December, 1849; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CHASE presented a petition of citizens of Hamilton county, Ohio, praying that in the organic law of the Territory of Nebraska slavery may be forever excluded from its limits; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of Mahoning county, and a petition of citizens and female residents of Lorain county, in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the Nebraska bill, or any law for the admission of more slave territory into the Union; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of the borough of Canonsburg, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to pass no bill that will impair the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MASON presented the petition of Mary Tasker, widow of James Tasker, a revolutionary soldier, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of Francis O. Morse, for himself and other citizens of the United States engaged in the importation of lasts, and a memorial of boot and shoemakers, in the State of Massachusetts, protesting against the passage of the bill of the Senate giving further remedies to patentees; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Also, a petition of citizens of Rockport, Massachusetts, protesting against any repeal of the prohibition of slavery or the addition of slave territory to the Union; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of Sangamon county, Illinois, praying that slavery may be forever prohibited in the Nebraska Territory; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill granting to the State of Alabama public lands in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of the Alabama and Tennessee railroad, from Selma, on the Alabama river, to the Tennessee river, at or near Gunter's Landing; and also the Memphis and Charleston railroad, from Memphis, on the Mississippi river, to some point connecting with the Nashville, Chattanooga, and Charleston railroad, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EVERETT, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of the heirs of Richard W. Meade, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, for settling the claim of the legal representatives of Richard W. Meade, deceased; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. PETTIT, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Israel Johnson be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion by Mr. CHASE, it was Ordered, That the administrator of Elijah J. Weed have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

ERRONEOUS SURVEY IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. CASS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the payment of damages incurred in consequence of erroneous or fraudulent surveys in township one south, range seven east, in the State of Michigan.

COMMUTATION PAY.

Mr. SEWARD. I am requested to ask that the papers of the heirs of Andrew Fink, an officer in the revolutionary army, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. WALKER. I desire to ask to what subject those papers relate?

Mr. SEWARD. To commutation pay.

Mr. WALKER. I supposed so. I would say, that it is useless to send them to the committee, as it has made a report upon that whole subject, and brought in a general bill, which is now upon the Calendar, and will be acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I will not ask for their reference.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received, by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that they had passed a joint resolution authorizing a supplemental contract for certain marble for the Capitol extension.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, in 1848 a complete series of United States standards of weights and measures was presented to Monsieur DeVattemare, for the purpose of having the same presented to the French Government. I have received from Monsieur DeVattemare a full and detailed report upon the subject of weights and measures, with a request that it should be laid before Congress, and printed in the American as well as the French language. I have given it a careful examination, and I believe I am justified in saying that there is much in it that is worthy of the attention of the public.

This communication is addressed directly through the Senate to the Committee on Commerce, and it is a subject which might appropriately belong to that committee; but inasmuch as the Senate has seen fit to give that subject another direction, and memorials have been presented from scientific societies of our own country, which have been referred to the Committee on the Library, I beg leave to present this report with a request that it may be committed to the same committee, thereby discharging the Committee on Commerce from what would otherwise be their appropriate duty. It would be inappropriate for two committees to have the same subject under consideration. I move to refer the communication to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

SUFFERERS ON THE SAN FRANCISCO.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk, announcing that they had concurred in the first and third amendments, and non-concurred in the second amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House for the relief of the United States troops who were sufferers by the recent disaster to the steamship San Francisco.

The first amendment in which the House concurred, was to insert in the first section, which is as follows:

"That there shall be paid, under the direction of the President, to each of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, who, on the 21st day of December, 1853, embarked at New York, under orders for California, on the steamship San Francisco, and who was on board that vessel on the occasion of her recent disaster at sea, a sum equal in amount to his pay and allowances for four months;"

after the word "sea," the words:

"and to Lieutenant Francis K. Murray, and any other officers or seamen of the United States Navy who were on board the said steamship under orders."

The third amendment, in which the House concurred, was to add at the end of the second section, which is as follows:

"That if any such officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private, shall have died before receiving such payment, from any cause consequent upon said disaster, his widow, if one survive him, and if not, then his minor children, if any there be, shall be paid a sum equal in amount to six months' pay and allowances of the deceased;" the words:

"And that the widows and minor children of those officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates who perished by that disaster, or who died by disease in consequence thereof, shall be allowed pensions in the same manner, in all respects, as if the said officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates had been killed in battle."

The second amendment, in which the House non-concurred, was to add at the end of the first section, as given above, the words:

"Provided, That the amount of the pay and allowances advanced to the officers and men, by the authority of the President, previous to their embarkation, shall be brought to their credit, and that their receipts for the same be canceled."

Mr. HUNTER. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SHIELDS] is not in his seat. The consideration of the message of the House had, therefore, perhaps better be postponed for the present.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, it will be laid upon the table for the present.

SENATE DEBATES.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from Beverley Tucker and William M. Overton, publishers of the Washington Sentinel, proposing to assume the contract relinquished by Robert Armstrong, for the publication of the proceedings of the Senate; which,

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill to lay off the town of Council Bluffs, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, which proposes to direct the judge of the county court for the county of Pottawatomie, in the State of Iowa, to enter certain lands mentioned in the bill at the Land Office, by paying therefor at the rate of $1 25 per acre, under the terms therein mentioned; with the provision, however, that it shall not affect preemption or any other rights which have accrued under any other act of Congress; and with the provision, also, that the entry shall be made within twelve months from the date of the passage of the bill, and that a patent shall issue therefor.

The amendment was agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment was concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

BUNSWICK, GEORGIA.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill making Brunswick, in the State of Georgia, a port of entry, and for other purposes.

It proposes to direct that Brunswick, in the district of Brunswick, Georgia, shall be a port of entry for that district, that a collector shall reside there, and that Darien, in the district, shall be a port of delivery only, and that a deputy collector shall reside there.

Mr. HAMLIN. The bill only proposes to change the port from one place in the district where it now is, to another—to make what is now a port of delivery a port of entry, and what is now a port of entry a port of delivery. It is done in accordance with the recommendation of the Treasury Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

WELSH AND WELLS.

On motion by Mr. BRODHEAD, the bill for the relief of passed midshipmen George P. Welsh and Clark H. Wells was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay Mr. Welsh $341 66, and Mr. Wells $342 93.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to know the grounds upon which that bill is presented.

Mr. BRODHEAD. The grounds upon which these small amounts are claimed are stated in the report, which I ask may be read.

The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs was accordingly read; from which it appears that Mr. Wells and Mr. Welsh were doing duty as passed midshipmen on board the Plymouth, the flag-ship of the East India squadron, in 1848,

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 28.

when vacancies occurred in the lieutenantships, and they were appointed by the Commodore acting lieutenants, their appointments being dated the 11th of October, 1848; in which position they served on board the Plymouth and the Dolphin until June, 1851. By the sixth section of the naval appropriation act of 1847, it is provided that when any master or acting master in the Navy shall, under the order of the commander of the vessel, supply a deficiency in the complement of lieutenants of the vessel, he shall be allowed the pay for the time during which he performs the duty.

This was unknown to the officers of the East India squadron. Mr. Welsh and Mr. Wells were made lieutenants, not from the grade of master or acting master, but from that of passed midshipmen, and of course were not entitled to extra pay. The commodore, when he heard of the law, rescinded their appointments, passed them through the grade of master, and reappointed them on the 1st of March, 1850. The difference of pay which they claim is for the time while they acted as masters previous to their reappointment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

CHARLES G. GUNTER.

On the motion of Mr. FITZPATRICK, the bill to relinquish the reversionary interest of the United States to a certain reservation therein mentioned, and to confirm the title of Charles G. Gunter thereto, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct that all the right, title, and interest which might accrue or revert to the United States, to a certain fraction of section number nineteen, of township number sixteen, and range number sixteen, including an island in the Alabama river, commonly called Manac's Island, a little below the mouth of Catoma creek, and being the reservation to which Samuel Manac, a Creek Indian, became entitled under the treaty of Fort Jackson, shall be relinquished to Charles G. Gunter, his heirs and assigns, and a patent shall be issued to him or them for it upon the payment to the receiver of the land office at Cahaba, in the State of Alabama, of the minimum price per acre of the public lands now subject to entry in the State.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. If there is any doubt about the bill, I ask for the reading of the report.

Several SENATORS. It is all right.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

JUDICIAL RECIPROCITY.

On motion by Mr. BAYARD, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill "to provide for the execution, by the courts of the United States, of commissions to take testimony issuing from the courts of justice of friendly nations," which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following substitute:

That each and every circuit and district court of the United States, and the circuit court for the District of Columbia, shall have full power and authority, whenever it shall be requested by any court of record, or court having equity or admiralty jurisdiction, in any foreign State or country in amity with the United States, by letters rogatory, issuing out and by authority of said foreign court, or by application from a commissioner or commissioners, duly appointed under the authority of said foreign court, to issue all the necessary and proper writs and process, and make and enforce such orders as may be necessary and proper for obtaining the testimony of witnesses, re-iding within the jurisdiction of said circuit or district court, to be used in any civil cause depending in the said foreign court; and for this purpose to make and enforce all such orders as may be necessary and proper for the administration of an oath or solemn affirmation to any witness so resident as aforesaid, whose testimony may be required; which oath or affirmation shall have the same effect, validity, and legal obligation, as if administered in a civil cause depending in the said circuit or district court: Provided, nevertheless, That it shall be discretionary with the said circuit or district court, to which application may be made as aforesaid, by any such foreign court, to refuse the same, if said foreign court has no sufficient authority to extend reciprocal aid and assistance in obtaining testimony to the several Federal and State courts of this Union, when properly requested, or having such authority, has refused on proper application to exercise the same.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the costs of all such proceedings, under any such request or application, in the said circuit or district court, to which the said request or application may be made, shall be taxed by the clerk of the said circuit or district court, subject to the revision of the court, and paid by the person or persons on whose behalf the said request or application may be made.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person, to whom an oath or affirmation has been administered under the provisions of this act, shall, after making such oath or affirmation, knowingly and willfully swear or affirm falsely, such person so offending, shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and shall, on conviction thereof, be liable to the same pains and penalties prescribed by law for persons convicted of willful and corrupt perjury.

Mr. STUART. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Delaware why it is that the bill limits this power to applications made from the courts of Governments, which have conferred the same power upon their courts?

Mr. BAYARD. The original bill was introduced on that basis, and I think it is a sound one. There is no obligation on the part of any nation to assist in the procuring of testimony to be used in courts of foreign nations, unless it is founded on what is called the comity of nations; and, if that comity is refused to you, I think you are perfectly right in authorizing your judges to refuse it to the nation which chooses to place herself in that position. If the authorities of the other nation are not willing to advance the interests of humanity by extending the comity of nations to us, we are not bound to extend the privilege to her. That is the principle on which I suppose the bill stands.

Mr. STUART. I do not know that, upon a brief reading of the bill, I am able to comprehend all its consequences; but if I do, I think that the restriction contained in it ought not to exist. In the first place, it might very well happen, that citizens of the United States would be either directly or indirectly interested in the very litigation for which the testimony would be asked, and yet the Government where the trial was to be held may not have extended similar privileges to those contained in the bill. Now in such a case as that, I apprehend there would be no difference of opinion, but that the testimony here ought to be taken, and taken in a mode to be useful to the court where it was desired.

But, aside from any consideration of this kind, it seems to me that the restriction ought not to be retained in the bill. The bill does not provide any mode by which the court is to ascertain whether this reciprocity exists or not. There might be a difficulty in ascertaining, in a given case, that fact. But waiving all that, I cannot see why this liberality should not be extended without that restriction, for the very purpose of inducing a kind act by being the originator of a generous one ourselves. I cannot see any injury to result to the Government of the United States, or its citizens, in allowing this bill to pass without any restriction. If any foreign court should apply here according to the terms of this bill, and you confer upon our courts the means of conforming to the application, what injury could grow out of that?

Again, it strikes me that there might be some question of doubt as to the propriety of conferring upon courts, inferentially, duties which clearly fall within the treaty-making power. That, sir, perhaps is not a fatal objection, but it is one that might produce, if not a clashing of power, at least such an exercise of power by the inferior courts of this country, which in a given instance might be questionable. Being unable to see for myself any reason whatever for the retention of the restriction, I should feel myself bound, unless some reasons are offered satisfying me, to propose to amend the bill in that respect by striking out the restrictive clause.

Mr. BAYARD. Comity between nations, I suppose, Mr. President, is always reciprocal, and should be so. The very meaning of the word "comity" includes that idea. It necessarily includes reciprocal acts on the part of the nations in which it exists. Whenever it has been exercised by courts of justice, in all subjects relating to the comity of nations, they always confine the exercise of the power to those nations who are willing to return the same acts of comity on their part. I think, therefore, that is a sufficient answer to the objection of the Senator from Michigan.

It seems to me that the bill is quite sufficient and extensive when it tenders to every foreign nation the privilege of advancing the purposes of justice on our behalf, on the same terms on which we advance them in their behalf. The exception stated by the honorable Senator from Michigan, is,—suppose a citizen of the United States were interested in a suit in a foreign court, ought he not to have the means of taking testimony here? My answer is, that is not the basis of the bill at all. We are not passing it for the purpose of interfering with the modes of administering justice in the courts of foreign nations, but we are passing it, under the comity of nations, to permit courts of another nation, if that nation recognizes the comity of nations, to have the same advantages in taking testimony in the courts of this country as we have in their courts.

But this principle is only founded upon the principle recognized in the courts of common law, and certainly in the courts of equity, that on letters rogatory they will authorize testimony to be taken for other courts. In those courts testimony is taken for the purpose of being used in civil causes in other jurisdictions, but they will not exercise that comity unless the court to which the letters rogatory are addressed recognize the same comity on their part. I think the principle a sound one in all national relations. I do not think we are called to go one step towards tendering to a foreign nation the aid to administer justice in their dominions unless they extend the reciprocal aid to us; and that is the provision of the bill.

But, again, the court is not compelled to exercise the power; it is left, and it must be left, to the discretion of the court, as to whether, under the circumstances, it will or will not issue the power to take the testimony, when the foreign nation either does not possess the power, or, possessing the power, the courts of that nation refuse to exercise it for the benefit of the courts of this country. It is left to the discretion of the court, and surely there can be no objection to that.

The honorable Senator complains, further, that the bill does not provide specifically for the mode in which the courts are to ascertain the fact whether the foreign nations extend the same privilege to us. It would be a great objection if the bill attempted to do that; it is a great deal better to leave that to the courts of justice, if the fact is brought before them and established, because that would be necessary to prevent the recognizing of the commission. If the nation is in amity, the court will necessarily carry out the provisions of the law; and if it was made to appear to them, in such modes as a court of justice always requires, that the courts of the foreign nation had no such authority, or that the court from which the letters rogatory issued had refused to exercise a similar duty on their part, of course the court in its discretion would refuse the application. It would be impossible—it would be in vain to prescribe any rule on this subject. It is a great deal better left to the administration of justice under the general discretion of the court, because there can be no abuse under it. That is also a sufficient answer to the objection that is founded on the fact that the interest of a citizen of the United States might be involved in the proceedings in a foreign court, and therefore the testimony should be taken here, even if the foreign Government refused the reciprocity. The court in that might, in its discretion, make an exception, grounded on the right of a citizen, and not on the comity of nations.

It fully provides, therefore, for that objection. The very existence of the discretion is an argument in favor of the bill; and for my own part, as regards all these matters which go to advance civilization, and to enlarge the connection between nations for all proper purposes, I prefer infinitely the system of reciprocal legislation, to the system of treaties which are too often perverted from their original meaning, and so negligently passed, that when you come to their construction, if the policy of either nation happens to alter, the treaties are violated by that nation giving them a construction different from what was intended. Reciprocal legislation is always under your control. If the policy of the nation changes, or circumstances indicate that the reciprocity is useless, it can be withdrawn without any breach of faith.

I do not recollect any other objection which the honorable Senator from Michigan made to the provision here. In that respect, the bill has been adopted in principle as it was originally introduced. The alteration we made was to confine the power to purposes for the furtherance of civil justice. The original bill authorized the taking of testimony in aid of criminal justice in foreign nations. The committee were indisposed to carry the principle so far, and remodeled the bill to restrict it to the purposes of civil justice, and also introduced the clause providing for the punishment of false swearing, and further for the payment of costs and charges where the application is made.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I was not aware that this bill was to be taken up this morning. I have insuperable objections to its passage. I object to its principles. I object to any extension by the Congress of the United States of the judicial power of the United States not granted by the Constitution. The bill proposes to invest in the circuit and district courts of the United States certain jurisdiction in relation to controversies arising in foreign countries. By reference to the provision of the Constitution of the United States, I find that the judicial power extends to certain defined cases, and that this is not one of the cases for which the Constitution provides.

Section second of article third of the Constitution, says:

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States, between a State and citizens of another State, between citizens of different States, between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects."

Now, this judicial power is proposed to be extended to controversies between foreigners, where neither a State of this Confederacy nor a citizen of the United States is interested. If this, then, be intended to be a judicial power, I oppose the bill, upon the ground that it extends the judicial power beyond the cases provided for in the Constitution of the United States; and I apprehend that a reference to the clause of the bill, will show that the power proposed to be conferred is a judicial power. It is not merely a ministerial power; and if it were a ministerial power alone, I should object to it upon that ground. I do not think that the judges of the United States, or the courts of the United States, are organized under the Constitution for purposes ancillary to the administration of justice in foreign nations.

That is not the purpose for which the courts of justice are organized; and I doubt very much our power to impose a duty of that kind upon the judges of our courts. But the provisions of the bill are clearly placed upon the basis of the grant of power being judicial. It provides for the issuing of writs and process upon application. It provides for conferring upon the judges all necessary authority for the purpose of carrying out the jurisdiction which the bill proposes to vest in them. It provides for the punishment of witnesses, who are called before the judges, for perjury in cases of false swearing.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator allow me to call for the special order? This subject, I think, will lead to considerable debate.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will yield the floor, especially as I was not prepared to discuss the bill to-day, not having any idea that it would come up. I will very freely give way to allow the special order to be called up.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I then call for the special order.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be postponed until to-morrow.

There was no objection.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska, the pending question being on the amendment submitted on the 15th instant by Mr. CHASE, to add to the 14th section of the substitute reported from the Committee on Territories, as amended on the motion of Mr. DOUGLAS, the words:

"Under which the people of the Territory, through their appropriate representatives, if they see fit, prohibit the existence of slavery herein."

So that the part of the section relating to that matter would read:

"That the Constitution, and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Nebraska as elsewhere within the United States; except the eighth section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March 6, 1820, which being inconsistent with the principles of non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories, as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, is hereby declared inoperative and void, it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, under which the people of the Territory, through their appropriate representatives, may, if they see fit, prohibit the existence of slavery therein."

Mr. BADGER being entitled to the floor, rose and addressed the Senate at great length in support of the bill as it now stands amended, and against the amendment of Mr. CHASE. [Mr. B.'s speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. SEWARD. I desire, with the indulgence of the Senate, to express my views upon this question. It will not be convenient for me to proceed at this late hour of the day, and I suppose the Senate will not wish to have me commence an argument now.

I move, therefore, to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. JAMES, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent in the consideration thereof, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 16, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the motion made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] yesterday evening, to reconsider the vote by which the deficiency bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

CORRECTION OF AN ERROR.

Mr. HUNT. I rise to a privileged question. I perceive, in the published proceedings of the House in relation to the Patent Office reports, that the Globe represents me as having supported the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] I stated that I was against diminishing the number of the mechanical report, and was perfectly willing to increase the number of the agricultural part, if gentlemen desired it. I wish to make this statement to the House, because I desire it to be understood that I am, and always will be, in favor of liberal appropriations for the diffusion of useful information.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to offer an amendment to the homestead bill now pending, and ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole, and printed.

It proposes to combine its provisions with the provisions of the amendment for the construction of railroads to the Pacific.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. HILLYER. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to say to the House, that the business referred to that committee is so great, and so constantly accumulating, that it is impossible for the committee to investigate it with the degree of care and attention which is necessary to its proper adjudication consistently with their legislative duties. The committee therefore instruct me to ask the House that they may be permitted to employ a clerk, with a compensation of four dollars a day, while actually employed by the committee for that purpose. I ask the consent of the House to introduce this resolution.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be authorized to employ a clerk, with a compensation of four dollars per day while actually employed by the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. HAMILTON. The first thing in order is the question of reconsideration moved by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated. When the House adjourned, the gentleman from New York had the floor upon the question of reconsideration.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to facilitate the public business this morning, and go on peaceably, if we can. I intended to say to the Chair, if it was the pleasure of the House, that I would not call up the motion to reconsider, so that we might go on with the call upon committees for reports, and in that case perhaps the Committee of Ways and Means can be reached, and the whole matter be disposed of without any further difficulty.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the further consideration of the motion to reconsider be informally passed by? The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

PENSIONERS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to reconsider the vote by which House bill, (No. 167), "for the relief of pensioners, under the act of July 3, 1853," was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. My object in making the motion is merely to call up this matter at some future time.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House of the passage, by that body, of Senate bills of the following titles:

"An act (No. 6) to grant to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated public lands remaining unsold in that State;"

"An act (No. 93) to establish a land district in the State of Florida, to be called the district of Tampa;"

"An act (No. 164) to relinquish certain lands to the city of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa;"

"An act (No. 179) to constitute Palatka and Bayport, in the State of Florida, ports of delivery respectively;" and

"An act (No. 200) constituting San Pedro, in the State of California, a port of entry and delivery."

Mr. MILLSON. I desired yesterday to say a word upon the subject of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] does not now wish to consider the motion to reconsider.

Mr. MILLSON. Is it not my privilege to call up the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; the gentleman can call it up, if he pleases.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will not call up the motion now. Let it lie over for the present, and the House can then have an opportunity to examine the bill, which they have not now had.

Mr. MILLSON. I wish to say a word or two upon the subject of the bill now, and therefore I prefer to call it up.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman proposes to discuss this bill now, the Chair suggests that he give way long enough to allow the bill to be read.

Mr. MILLSON. Certainly; I will give way for that purpose.

The bill was then read by the Clerk.

Mr. MILLSON. I give notice to the House, that before I take my seat I shall move to lay this motion to reconsider upon the table. But before doing so, I beg to say a very few words as to the character of the bill before us. It is a bill which proposes to give to a certain class of widows—one among the many classes of widows who have received pensions under the legislations of Congress—five years' pay in addition to that which was granted to them by the act of 1853.

This bill is reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions—a committee not properly chargeable with the subject—at least not properly chargeable with this bill, so far as it has reference to the subject of giving pensions to the widows of the soldiers and officers of the war of the Revolution; and when I state to the House that the passage of this bill—for such seems to be the object of the motion to reconsider—will draw from the Treasury of the United States a sum of money which may amount to nearly $2,000,000, I think they will see that it is a matter of some importance. Yes, sir, I do not think I exaggerate, when I say that, for aught we now know, the passage of this bill may involve a draft upon the Treasury not far short of that providing for the payment of French spoliation.

Yet it is gravely proposed to take up such a bill as this, and pass it, without reference to the Committee of the Whole, and, perhaps, without due discussion in the House.

Having been charged, during the whole of the last Congress, as chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, with the consideration of this subject, I trust the House will see that it is, perhaps, somewhat incumbent upon me to give them the results of the investigations then made.

A brief historical narrative may be necessary to enable the House to see the effect of this bill. Some time in the year 1836, I think, Congress, for the first time, determined to grant pensions to a class of widows of revolutionary officers and soldiers—that is, to those who were married before the close of the war. The argument was this: We ought to grant pensions to those widows who were married before the close of their husband's last period of service, for they participated in the perils and sufferings of that period; they remained at home, to attend to the domestic affairs, while their husbands were in the field in the service of their country; and having been married before the close of the revolutionary war, the number of those who now survive must be exceedingly small, and there will be but a very small draft upon the public Treasury for the purpose of providing pensions for that class of widows.

The law passed. I do not now remember the precise number of widows who were entitled to receive pensions under that law. It was not very large.

Mr. ORR. It was larger than was supposed.

Mr. MILLSON. It was certainly larger than was expected. Some time afterwards, as the number diminished by death, Congress undertook to increase the number of those who should be entitled to pensions, by extending the term of marriage from the termination of the service of the husband to the year 1794 or 1796. An additional class became entitled to pensions under that law. Some short time afterwards Congress still further extended the time, by granting pensions to those who married at any time previous to January, 1800. There was a still further addition to the pension list in consequence of the passage of that law, and thus the law remained.

There were, however, other petitions from those who were married after the year 1800, praying that they too might receive the benefit of the pension laws. A bill, having that object in view, was considered in the Thirtieth Congress. Strenuous efforts were then made to extend the law so as to grant pensions to those who were married at any time before the year 1810; but this House, by a very large majority, rejected the bill, refusing to grant pensions to those widows of revolutionary officers and soldiers who were married after 1800, and before the year 1810. These petitions continued to come in till the Thirty-First Congress. They were there either reported against, or no action at all was taken upon the subject.

During the Thirty-Second Congress, when I had the honor to act as chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, a number of petitions was sent in to us. They were deliberately considered. I addressed a letter of inquiry to the then Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Heath, for the purpose of ascertaining what would be the probable number of widows who would receive pensions if the law was extended so as to embrace all those who were married after the year 1800. I received a letter in reply, in which it was stated, that if such a law should pass, numerous frauds would be practiced upon the Government, and it would involve the payment of a very large annual amount out of the Treasury of the United States. Sir, we did not report favorably on these petitions.

One of the reasons why the committee did not report in favor of granting pensions to those widows who had been married after the year 1800 is simply this: Those widows of revolutionary soldiers who are now living, and who were married after the year 1800, must present the case of the marriage of a young girl to a very old man. From the very nature of the case it must be so. If a revolutionary soldier married in the year 1815, 1820, or 1830, and if his widow be still living, then it follows, almost as a matter of course, that this could only be the result of the marriage of a young girl with a very old, decrepit man; and, sir, I did not see that there was so much merit in the fact of a young girl marrying a very old man, as to consider we were therefore obliged to place this female on the pension roll, and support her at the cost of the public Treasury for the rest of her life.

But, sir, towards the close of the last session of Congress, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] introduced a bill here, not intended at the time, as I believe, to provide for this class of widows, but having other objects in view. He gave notice that, before he took his seat, he designed to call for the previous question. He, however, yielded the floor to several gentlemen, who proposed amendments of one sort or other, and I think that among the amendments thus offered was one proposing to place on the pension roll those widows of revolutionary soldiers who were married after the year 1800. I then sought to get the floor, that I might have the opportunity of making a brief statement, showing the probable effect of the passing of this law. The gentleman from Alabama declined to yield me the floor. The bill passed, under the operation of the previous question. There was no examination made; and, as the Commissioner of Pensions has lately reported, Congress appropriated only the sum of $24,000 for the purpose of providing for the payment of that class of pensions.

But, sir, what are we now told by the Commissioner? Why, Mr. Waldo comes forward and tells us, that the deficiency for the current year alone will amount to upwards of $200,000. He tells us, that the amount necessary to pay these pensions for the present year is about $240,000, and you have appropriated but $24,000 for that purpose. Thus, then, there will be a deficiency of more than $200,000 for the current year alone; which must be provided for in the deficiency bill, when the House shall again have that subject under consideration.

And now, sir, after having passed this law without inquiry, without reference to a committee, without discussion, and on the distinct and express refusal of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] to allow even a word of caution to be addressed to the House, it is proposed to make these pensions commence in 1848, instead of 1853. The gentleman from Alabama now says he never intended that it should have any such result—

Mr. COBB. And I did not think so at the time.

Mr. MILLSON. That admission, Mr. Speaker, is an emphatic warning as to the danger of such hasty legislation. The gentleman, [Mr. COBB,] who then had charge of the bill, comes forward now, and tells this House that he never intended it should have had any such result as this. And yet the gentleman refused to allow me an opportunity last year of giving a warning to the House as to the probable effect of it.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman from Virginia presses very hard. The bill has been construed by the Commissioner of Pensions precisely as the committee then intended it to have been construed, and as they desire it to be construed to-day.

Mr. MILLSON. I do not know that that is any answer to my remark.

Mr. COBB. I am not mistaken in regard to what I then did, because the view I entertained then was carried out by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. MILLSON. I understand the gentleman to tell me that it was never intended to have that result.

Mr. COBB. I said that it was never designed to go back to 1848.

Mr. MILLSON. But the present bill does contemplate carrying the pensions back to 1848. The act reported yesterday by the Committee on Invalid Pensions does carry it back to 1848. That is the very object of this bill.

Mr. COBB. Then I am not to blame.

Mr. MILLSON. I did not say the gentleman was to blame. I only stated the fact that the act did carry the pensions back to the year 1848,—the fact, that that bill was passed during the last Congress, under the operation of the previous question; and that the gentleman refused to allow me the floor for the purpose of suggesting to the House the amount which would be taken from the public Treasury, if that bill should be passed.

I am now saying that the amount exceeds $200,000 a year. I say that the Commissioner of Pensions, in his recent report, declares that he is now receiving applications from that class of widows at the rate of sixty per week; that the number will run up to three thousand and that there is already a deficiency of upwards of $200,000, during the current year.

One of the objects of this bill, then, being to extend these pensions back to 1848, and to entitle these widows to pensions from February of that year, instead of February, 1853, it gives to that class alone just $1,200,000, even if there be no further addition to the pensioners than that estimated for by the Commissioner of Pensions.

The sum of $1,200,000 will be voted out of the public Treasury for the payment of that class of widows alone, if these pensions are to date back to 1848 instead of to 1853.

I deem it proper to make these remarks, not for the purpose of going into an extended discussion of the bill. When it comes up for consideration in Committee of the Whole I may, or I may not, do so. I make these remarks now merely for the purpose of indicating to the House that this is a bill too important to be considered without a reference to the Committee of the Whole, and that it involves too important consequences to induce this House to act upon it without that deliberation which ought to be bestowed upon such a matter.

I mean to close these remarks by a motion to lay upon the table this motion to reconsider. If the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EDMANDS,] who I perceive rises in his seat, wishes to make a remark I will give him the opportunity to do so, although he declined to extend a similar courtesy to me yesterday. But if he does not wish to do so I will move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, for I do not think the time of the House ought to be consumed in the discussion of this matter, when we have other business pressing for consideration.

Mr. EDMANDS. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman in his remarks. I wish, however, to say a few words upon this question.

Mr. MILLSON. I yield the floor only for that purpose, but do not mean to lose this opportunity of making the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. I yield for the purpose of explanation only.

Mr. EDMANDS. I shall wait until the gentleman has finished his remarks.

Mr. MILLSON. I have already stated that I mean to conclude my remarks by making the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. EDMANDS. I will renew the motion, if the gentleman yields me the floor.

Mr. MILLSON. I will give way to any explanation, but I do not wish to lose the floor. I have already declared that I will move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. I do not think that this is a question which ought to engage the attention of the House at this time.

Mr. EDMANDS. I only wish to say to the House, that the bill now proposed does not extend, in the least, the circle of pensioners. No new pensioners are to be added to the number upon the rolls, in any way. The present bill merely proposes to carry out the purposes of the act of February 3, 1853. I would state, that on the 29th of July, 1848, an act was passed granting to the widows of officers and privates the same pensions that their husbands would be entitled to if living—limiting the benefits of the act to those who were married prior to 1800. On the 3d of February, 1853, another act was passed, taking off that restriction, merely giving pensions to those who were married subsequent to 1800, as well as those who were married prior to that year.

That act reads as follows:

"That the widows of officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the revolutionary army, who were married subsequent to January, 1800, shall be entitled to pensions in the same manner as those who were married before that day."

Now those who were married before that day drew their pensions from the 4th of March 1848; and the pensioners, under the act of February 3, 1853, supposed that they could draw their pensions from the same date. The construction which the Commissioner of Pensions has given to it is, that they were to draw their pensions from the date of the passage of the bill. The committee were fully aware that it was the custom, and properly so, of the Commissioner of Pensions to give an interpretation to the act according to the uniform practice; and they have been very particular, accordingly, to report a separate pension law providing for this class of cases, so as to make that explicit and certain which is now very indefinite. They chose to report a general law to that effect. They felt as though it was reasonable to do so, when they saw that the act of February 3, 1853, itself provided that the pensioners named in that act should draw their pensions in the same manner as those of 1848.

Mr. MILLSON. I did not say that the bill would increase the number of pensioners. What I stated was, that the effect of the law was to give these pensioners a pension, not from the period of the passage of the law, the time when they became entitled to it by the law, but from the year 1848, when no law existed in relation to these pensions at all. The effect of the present law would be to draw from the Treasury at once $1,200,000 for that class of pensioners alone.

And, sir, the thing does not stop there; for if we decide that widows, who are entitled by the act of 1853 to pensions, shall commence their pensions with the 3d of February, 1848, then the heirs of those widows who have died in the interval between 1848 and 1853, will come forward and demand to be placed upon the same footing as these widows themselves. I trust I have now said enough to enable the House to see that this is not one of those unimportant bills which ought to be considered and acted upon hastily.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman allow me to explain?

Mr. MILLSON yielded the floor.

Mr. COBB. The explanation I have to make in reference to my action in relation to this question, during the last Congress, shall be brief. I offered an amendment to provide for the widows and minor children of the officers and soldiers of the various wars. This revolutionary measure was attached to mine in the Senate. It came back again with some disagreement, and we had a committee of conference upon the subject. I agreed to the measure, with the understanding that it should not extend back beyond the date of its passage.

As far as the matter of its having taken $2,000,000 out of the Treasury is concerned, if I had the work to do over again, and were satisfied that it would take $10,000,000 to do justice to that class of individuals for whom I was endeavoring to provide, my course would be the same. Whenever the case of destitute women and children comes up here, and their rights are to be defended, you will always find me upon their side. But when questions come up of extending certain provisions to certain individuals, who are, perhaps, not so meritorious, I confess that I am occasionally found voting against them. This is all the explanation I have to make; and I repeat, that if I had the same thing to do over again, though $10,000,000 stared me in the face, my course would be the same.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I also desire to make a brief explanation.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow this matter to go over, and that we go into the Committee of the Whole on the special order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no objection to that, if the gentleman from Virginia, by whose courtesy I have the floor, will permit the motion to be made.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I then move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MILLSON. I think we had better dispose of this matter now. I do not yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will then proceed to make my explanation now. I think this question ought to be looked into somewhat by the House before it is finally disposed of. I think the measure introduced yesterday by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EDMANDS] ought not to be voted down upon a single argument made against it. I made the motion to reconsider the vote by which it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, not for the purpose of discussing it this morning. I desired that the motion to reconsider might be entered and passed over for the present, in order that all of us might have time to examine the question, and be prepared to express ourselves upon it when it should again come up for action. But the gentleman from Virginia, who, it seems, had some connection with it during the last session of Congress, makes a long speech in opposition to it this morning. Sir, I had nothing to do with the matter during the last Congress. I was not connected with the committee which had charge of it, and I did not examine into the merits and demerits of the bill. But the gentleman from Virginia having this morning made along speech against the measure, and then moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, the effect of which is practically to take the subject out of the control of the House, I hope the motion will not be sustained.

The persons who are to receive the benefits of this act are not long to remain among us to receive any benefit that we can confer upon them. They are the widows of revolutionary soldiers; and therefore I say, that if this bill is to pass at all it ought to pass this session. If it be finally referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it will not be reached again till the next session; before which time half the persons it is designed to benefit will have passed beyond its power to benefit. Hence I made the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that the matter might be within the control of the House. I think this was very right.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EDMANDS,] when he introduced this bill, thought that it gave a proper construction to the law of last winter. I am not prepared to say whether it does or does not. The House ought to consider it, and if it does give the proper construction to that law it ought to pass.

I cannot see why the law of 1848 should give pensions to the widows who were married to revolutionary soldiers prior to 1800, and deny pensions to all who were married after that year. It is an arbitrary arrangement, and one not founded on any reason that I can appreciate.

This bill, if it passes, will, as I understand it, place widows who were married to revolutionary soldiers after the year 1800, in precisely the same position that those occupy who were married prior to that year. I think the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table ought not to prevail, but that the motion to reconsider ought to be kept under the control of the House.

Mr. MILLSON. One word in reply to the remarks which have been made, and in explanation of my personal position. I am not very fond of addressing the House. I trust that my course here during a service—now not a very brief one—has already enabled gentlemen to perceive that I am not forward to address the House; and I think I am generally even more reluctant to speak than the House can be to hear me. I rarely do so except when I think I am under some obligation to communicate to the House the result of investigations that I may have made; and, I must confess, that I sometimes blame myself for allowing my unwillingness to ask the attention of the House, to prevent me from saying what it would perhaps be right for me to say.

But the gentleman from Indiana states that I made a bitter and relentless speech against the bill, and then concluded by moving to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. Why the gentleman will recollect, that with the very view of enabling others to present their views to the House, I myself invited gentlemen to take the floor during my hour before I closed. I invited them to make such explanations as they desired to make. I refused the floor to nobody, and three or four gentlemen have sought and held the floor, for the purpose of making explanations connected with the bill. Surely, then, the gentleman cannot justly charge me with making a speech against the bill, and then moving to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, so as to exclude all further debate. I desired to act fairly towards the House, and made only such remarks as I thought would induce the House to conclude that this was a bill which ought not to be passed upon hastily. The bill has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There let it remain. It will still be within the power of the House. A majority can, at any time when we go into committee, take it up and consider it. A bill is not beyond the control of the House when it is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

As to the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. COBB,] about the propriety of relieving the wants of destitute females, perhaps my sympathies in such cases will not be less active than those of some other gentlemen. It does not follow that the widows of those who served in the revolutionary war are necessarily destitute, and it is not the province of the Government of the United States to relieve all cases of suffering. When we indulge our sympathies, let us do so out of our own private means, and not at the cost of others. Let not gentlemen seek to place upon the pension roll, to be supported at the public charge, a class of persons who have themselves done no service to the country, and who, as has been repeatedly decided by Congress, have no claim whatever on the public for support. But, at least, though we may choose to provide for their future support, I see no propriety in voting them a gross sum out of the Treasury, equal to their pensions for five years, by declaring that they shall be entitled to claim from 1848, instead of 1853, when they were first placed upon the pension rolls.

I now move, Mr. Speaker, to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question was put; pending the result, Several MEMBERS. "Divide!" "Divide!"

The House divided; and the Speaker announced 49 in the affirmative.

Mr. ORR called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. McMULLIN and ROBBINS were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 65.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move now that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TWEED. I demand the yeas and nays on the last question.

Mr. HAMILTON. It is too late.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to call for the yeas and nays after the decision is announced. The Chair heard no demand for the yeas and nays before the decision was announced.

Mr. FULLER. I wish to inquire, if the House refuses to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, what will be the business first in order?

The SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports.

Mr. FULLER. Then I hope the House will not go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GREEN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported, as correctly enrolled, House bills of the following titles:

"An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California,' approved March 3, 1851;

"An act for the relief of William Blake;" and

"An act to confirm to Hercules Dousman his title to farm lot No. 32, adjoining the town of Prairie du Chien, in the State of Wisconsin."

Thereupon the same received the signature of the Speaker.

Mr. TWEED. Are not reports in order from the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

The SPEAKER. They are not in order until the pending question is disposed of.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a report from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be done unless the pending motion to go into the Committee of the Whole be withdrawn for that purpose.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have no objection to withdrawing the motion a moment, for that purpose.

Mr. ROGERS. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to make the report.

Mr. WALSH. How many bills constitute a report?

The SPEAKER. One only.

On motion by Mr. ROGERS, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the petition of John Winslow, Edward Winslow, and others, asking for compensation for revolutionary services of General John Winslow, be discharged from the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. ROGERS also, from the same committee, reported "A bill for the relief of the heirs of Daniel Bedinger;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. ROGERS, it was Ordered, That the same Committee, to which was referred the petition and papers of Isaac S. Bowman, Executor of Isaac Bowman, a lieutenant, &c., in the revolutionary war, asking for half pay, and other compensation, be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the same be referred to the Secretary of the Interior, for liquidation, under the act of July 5, 1832.

Mr. ROGERS also, from the same committee, reported "A bill for the relief of Colonel John H. Stone and heirs;" which was read the first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROGERS also, from the same committee, reported "A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Colonel Willis Riddick, deceased;" which was read the first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the motion made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 42, noes not counted.

So the House refused to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ORR. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WALSH. I rise to a question of privilege. It is well known that there is a question before one branch of this Congress now, and it is shortly expected to come up before this body, which has created a great deal of sensation in the public mind. Without expressing any opinion upon it, either one way or the other, I would like to know, while there is such an immense amount of outside influence brought to bear upon it, whether it is proper for distinguished gentlemen, members of this House, to be seeking information by communication with the other world? [Laughter.] I understand that there has been a rule adopted by this House precluding the introduction of liquor, and I would like to know whether it is proper, in the face of that rule, to introduce spirits upon the Nebraska question, as they have been introduced down stairs, in a room there? [Great Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Reports are now in order from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. TWEED, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made adverse reports in the cases of Daniel B. Lewis, Reuben Apperson, and John Stevin; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. TWEED, it was Ordered, That the same committee be discharged from the further consideration of the case of the widow of Captain Timothy Newman, and that the petition and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. TWEED also, from the same committee, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed:

"An act for the relief of James M. Lewis."

Mr. VAIL, from the same committee, made an adverse report upon the following cases; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed: The claim of Henry Jackson for a pension, on account of disability incurred in the Mexican war.

The petition, with accompanying papers, of Charles Bemns, praying for an additional pension, on account of services in the war of 1812.

Mr. VAIL also, from the same committee, reported bills; which were read a first and second time by their titles, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed:

"A bill for the relief of William Mayo, of the State of Maine;" and

"A bill for the relief of James Walsh."

Mr. STRAUB, from the same committee, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed:

The petition of Lee H. Thomas, of Chambers county, Alabama, for a pension for services rendered the United States during the late war with Great Britain, and in the Indian war of 1836.

The petition of Ephraim Sharp, of Dryden, Tompkins county, in the State of New York, praying for a pension.

Mr. STUART, of Ohio, from the same committee, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed:

"A bill for the relief of Jesse R. Faulkner, of Missouri."

On motion by Mr. STUART, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 234, entitled "A bill to amend the pension laws therein mentioned;" and that the same be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. S. also made adverse reports in the following cases; and the petitions and papers were ordered to lie upon the table:

The petition of J. N. Newton and others, asking for the passage of a law providing that invalid pensions may be allowed from the time when the pensioners became injured, in the service of the United States, up to the time when their names were entered upon the list of invalid pensions.

The petition of John B. Smith and others, citizens of the State of New York, asking for the passage of a law enabling persons entitled to pensions, under the act of April 24, 1816, to receive said pensions from the time of the passage of said act.

The petition of R. R. Platt, asking for the passage of a law placing him upon the pension roll, as in similar cases.

Mr. CHRISMAN, from the same committee, made adverse reports in the following cases; and the petitions, with accompanying papers, were ordered to lie upon the table:

The petition of Peter Frost, for an increase of pension, dating from the time of his discharge, July 1, 1846.

The petition of sundry citizens of Grand county, State of Kentucky, praying that arrearages of pensions may be paid to George Williams, who was wounded in the war of 1812.

The petition of Judith Taylor, widow of Captain John Taylor, who was killed during the war of 1812, for a pension.

Mr. CHRISMAN also, from the same committee, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed:

"A bill for the relief of Albro Tripp."

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That fifteen hundred extra copies of the annual report of the Postmaster General be printed, for the use of the Post Office Department.

BOOKS FOR NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on the Library, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, joint resolution of the Senate (No. 6) "for supplying new members of the Senate and House of Representatives with such books of a public character as have been heretofore supplied.

Mr. C. moved the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I rise to make an appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr.

CHANDLER,] to withdraw the motion for the previous question for a few minutes, to enable me to submit a few remarks in opposition to this resolution. I am now, and ever have been, opposed to this practice of voting money out of the public Treasury for the purchase of a private and political library for members of Congress. I regard it as a flagrant abuse; and I trust the gentleman will withdraw his motion for the previous question, that I may give the reasons, to my constituents and the country, which govern my action.

A MEMBER. Read the resolution.

The Clerk read the joint resolution. It provides that each of the new members of the two Houses of Congress shall be supplied with the same number and description of such books of a public character as were supplied to each member of the Senate or House of Representatives during the last Congress, provided they be furnished by the publishers at prices not exceeding those at which they have heretofore been supplied for the use of members of either House.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is with extreme reluctance that I, at any time, impose the previous question on any gentleman, and if I could be sure that this matter would come up to-morrow morning, I would consent to its postponement until then; otherwise I cannot do it.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to that. Let it be postponed.

[Cries of "Question!!"]

Mr. CHANDLER. I am urged by gentlemen around me to press the resolution now. I therefore demand the previous question, and leave it to the House to decide.

Mr. DAVIS. All I can say is, that I hope the House will vote down the previous question, and let us discuss this matter.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire some information on the subject now before the House. What is the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is a resolution from the Senate for the supply of books to new members. It is reported back by the Committee on the Library, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. McMULLIN. I should like to hear it read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, unless objection is made.

There being no objection, the resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. On the third reading of this joint resolution, the previous question is demanded.

The previous question was seconded—107 voting in the affirmative; and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the resolution on the table; and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then put on the motion to lay the joint resolution on the table; and it was not agreed to.

The resolution was then ordered for a third reading; and having been read the third time, the question recurred, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. CHANDLER demanded the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I trust that the demand for the previous question will be withdrawn for a few moments.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays cannot be ordered on the second to the demand for the previous question; but they may on the ordering of the main question.

The previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that, on the ordering of the main question to be put, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The main question was then ordered to be put. Mr. CHAMBERLAIN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. EWING demanded tellers on the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered.

Mr. DEAN. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. EWING. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion. I want the yeas and nays, in some way or other.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay the resolution on the table, and decided in the negative.

The question then recurred upon the passage of the resolution; and being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was passed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put, and the latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. VAIL. I ask for tellers upon that motion. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. VAIL and DEAN appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER resumed the call of committees for reports.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask now to present the report of the joint committee appointed by the House and the Senate, in reference to the sufferers and rescuers connected with the steamship San Francisco.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

It was read, as follows:

Joint resolution manifesting the sense of Congress towards the officers and seamen of the vessels and others engaged in the rescue of the officers and soldiers of the Army, the passengers, and the officers and crew of the steamship San Francisco, from perishing with the wreck of that vessel.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to procure three valuable gold medals, with suitable devices, one to be presented to Captain Creighton, of the ship Three Bells, of Glasgow; one to Captain Low, of the bark Kilby, of Boston; and one to Captain Stouffer, of the ship Antarctic, as testimonials of national gratitude for their gallant conduct in rescuing about five hundred Americans from the wreck of the steamship San Francisco; and that the cost of the same be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 2. Resolved, That a sum not exceeding $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the President to reward, in such manner as he may deem most appropriate, the officers and crews of those vessels that aided in the rescue of the survivors of said wreck, and such other persons as distinguished themselves by offices of humanity and heroism on that occasion; the reward to be proportionate to the nature of the efforts made, and the merit of the services rendered, so far as the same can be ascertained.

The resolution was then read the second time.

The SPEAKER. The resolution contains an appropriation, and it must therefore go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know that it provides an appropriation, and that, according to the rules of the House, it must go to the Committee of the Whole; but it has been resting so long in our hands, and so many events have transpired since it was introduced to occupy the attention of the House, that I hope the House will give their unanimous consent to act upon it at this time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I believe the rules say, that bills or resolutions providing an appropriation must have their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That is the rule of the House; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as the Chair understands, is in the act of appealing to the House to suspend the rules, by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that the House will consent to act upon the resolution now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks the unanimous consent of the House to consider the resolution now. Is objection made?

Mr. McMULLIN. I object.

Mr. CHANDLER. I make the motion, then, that the House make this matter a special order for Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. There is already a special order for that day.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will then say Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. Is it the unanimous pleasure of the House that the consideration of this resolution be postponed to Wednesday next?

Mr. McMULLIN. I move its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view to its consideration there.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order, and will be entertained. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, however, asks the unanimous consent to make the resolution the special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. HUNT. I hope that the House will grant unanimous consent to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make his motion. This is a matter which properly presses itself upon the attention of the country—

The SPEAKER. The Chair must remind the gentleman from Louisiana that there is a special rule of the House requiring bills or resolutions which contain appropriations to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and if any member objects to their consideration when introduced, they must go there.

Mr. HUNT. I was perfectly aware of the rule; but there was only one gentleman objecting to its consideration, and I hope that he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. McMULLIN. I can inform my friend from Louisiana that I was not the only member objecting, but that there were several members who objected.

Mr. HUNT. I am mistaken, then, it seems.

Mr. BUCK. I object to making this matter a special order, upon the ground that I endeavored to get a bill to authorize the construction of steam frigates made a special order, but the House refused to do it.

The SPEAKER. The question now pending is upon referring this joint resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CUTTING. Will the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs inform the House what action they had upon this matter?

Mr. BISSELL. I will inform the gentleman from New York, that the Committee on Military Affairs took the subject up with a view of considering it; but, upon understanding that the Select Committee were about ready to make a report, they concluded to defer action until that report should be made, in order that there might not be any conflict in the action of the two committees.

Mr. CUTTING. I would ask whether a report has not been made by the Committee on Military Affairs upon the same subject, and what disposition was made of the bill so reported?

The SPEAKER. The bill reported by them was passed a few days since.

Mr. CUTTING. That was another bill.

Mr. BISSELL. It was the bill for the relief of the sufferers on board of the San Francisco, which came from the Senate, but which has been sent back to the Senate with the non-concurrence of the House in one of its amendments. I thought that the gentleman referred to the bill rewarding the captains and officers of the ships that rescued the San Francisco.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is that motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. The rules of the House require that all bills or joint resolutions making appropriations shall be first considered in the Committee of the Whole; and, inasmuch as this resolution makes an appropriation, the Chair thinks it is not debatable, but that it must go to the Committee of the Whole, and that it may go there without the vote of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I desire to inquire if it has not been the usual practice of the House to allow debate upon motions to commit to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is the opinion of the Chair that a bill containing an appropriation cannot be first considered in the House, and therefore that the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole is not debatable. How far it might be competent for the gentleman to discuss the motion to print is another question; but the rule is quite clear as to the motion to refer.

Mr. TAYLOR. Does the Speaker decide that we have no right to debate a motion to commit?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that it is not in order to debate first in the House any bill containing an appropriation.

Mr. HUNT. We are not proposing to debate the bill. It is only proposed to discuss the question of reference. When a bill is presented in the House, and a motion is made to refer it to a certain committee, is not that motion regularly before the House, and is it not subject to discussion?

The SPEAKER. There is no such motion to refer to any standing committee pending, that the Chair is aware of.

Mr. HUNT. I understood my friend from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN,] to move to refer the resolution to the Committee of the Whole; and that it was this motion of reference which the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposed to discuss.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the motion cannot be debated, under the 133d rule of this House, which is as follows:

"All proceedings touching appropriations of money shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House."

Mr. CHANDLER. It is very evident that if this bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, there will be divers other shipwrecks before it will ever be reached, and any action taken upon it there. I propose, therefore, if it be in order, to move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Library.

The SPEAKER. The motion is in order, but the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union takes precedence, and must be first put.

Mr. ORR. I would suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania that he can accomplish his purpose by allowing the resolution to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and then, on Monday next, under a suspension of the rules, he can have it made a special order. In this manner he can insure to it an early action upon the part of the House.

Mr. CHANDLER. With that understanding, I have no objection to its going to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. My only object is to secure for it the action of the House at an early day.

The question was then put upon Mr. McMULLIN's motion, and decided in the affirmative.

So the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RIDDLE. I desire to remind the Chair, that, in calling the committees for reports, he has omitted to call the Committee on Engraving.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Engraving is a privileged committee, and has the right to report at any time.

Mr. RIDDLE. I am instructed by the Committee on Engraving to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Engraving be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to have lithographed and printed the maps accompanying the report of the Secretary of War on the exploration of the routes for the Pacific railroad: Provided, That the cost shall not exceed $75.

The Committee on Engraving thought that this was a subject in which the House was very much interested, and as the work involves so little cost, they authorized me to offer this resolution.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported "A bill to provide for the completion of certain custom-houses and marine hospitals therein mentioned;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAVEN. I move that the Committee of Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution adopted by the grand jury of Philadelphia, with reference to post office accommodations in that city. The resolution does not appropriately belong to the Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire now to give the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. CHANDLER] an opportunity of moving to refer the resolution to such committee as he thinks the proper one.

Mr. ORR. I would suggest the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HAVEN. It seems to me that it might appropriately go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to say, that I understand the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads does not intend to take any action with reference to post office buildings. I can only say that there will soon be no accommodation for the Philadelphia post office, as there is not room for it in the building in which it is at present situated.

I sent some memorials on this subject to the Committee on the Judiciary recently, and perhaps this resolution had better go to that committee also. I move that it be so referred.

The motion was agreed to:

Mr. HAVEN, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back House bill (No. 47) "making appropriation for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending 30th June, 1855;" with a recommendation that the House disagree to the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill.

The bill and amendments were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAVEN. Has the bill making appropriation for custom-houses and marine hospitals been referred?

The SPEAKER. It has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAVEN. Then I desire to say to the Chair that I will withdraw the motion which I submitted yesterday, to reconsider the vote by which the deficiency bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent. If there be no objection, however, the gentleman will have leave to withdraw the motion.

No objection being made, the motion to reconsider was then withdrawn.

Mr. MACE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill "for the relief of General John E. Wool;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, together with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. MACE, from the same committee, reported a bill "for the relief of the legal representatives of Colonel Francis Vigo, deceased;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDGERTON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of A. F. Clifton, made an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

Mr. EDGERTON, from the same committee, reported back bill of the Senate "for the relief of Priscilla C. Simonds;" with a written recommendation that it be rejected.

The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, together with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDGERTON. I am also directed, by the same committee, to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, to John Lee, $250; it being the sum withheld from him by Richard M. Young, when clerk of this House.

The question was put, and the resolution was adopted.

On motion by Mr. CURTIS, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Allan Mead and others, asking compensation for losses sustained by John Mead, during the war of the Revolution; and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. CURTIS, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John Baldwin, asking for the payment of a balance under a contract with the Navy Department; and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LETCHER, from the Committee of Claims, made an adverse report on the petition of John T. Ball, praying for extra pay for services rendered in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FULLER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to report back, with certain amendments, Senate bill (No. 39) "to extend the warehousing system, by establishing private bonded warehouses, and for other purposes." And I am directed to ask that the bill and amendments, and the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the letter of the collector of customs of New Orleans accompanying them, be printed; and that the bill and amendments be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

It was so ordered.

Mr. FULLER. I now move to reconsider that motion, and I ask to make a word of explanation why I do so. When the bill and amendments and letters are printed the House will see that there is a necessity for immediate action in the matter. And after they have been printed I propose, at the proper time, to call the attention of the House to the matter, and to ask for its consideration.

Mr. DUNBAR. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back, with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill (No. 55) "to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans."

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman make in reference to it?

Mr. DUNBAR. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage. There will be, I believe, no objection made to it. I request that the bill be now read.

The Clerk reported the bill, as follows:

"That the port of New Orleans be so extended as to embrace the right bank of the Mississippi river for the same distance up the said bank as it now extends on the left bank."

The bill was then ordered for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. DUNBAR, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred House bill No. 113, upon the same subject, be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be laid upon the table.

Mr. MILLSON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, Senate bill (No. 50) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Noah Miller, of Lincolnville, in the State of Maine, and for the relief of other persons."

The bill was ordered to lie upon the table, and the report to be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. OLDS in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the business before the committee was the consideration of House bill (No. 37) "to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for the period herein specified;" and that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BOYCE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOYCE addressed the committee on the subject of the tariff. He advocated such a system as would impose the least amount of taxation upon the people possible by which the Government could be supported. He maintained, that any tariff system which cherished and protected one branch of industry at the expense of others was unconstitutional. He was opposed to the principle of levying upon the people a tax to build up any system of manufacture which was in itself unprofitable; and maintained that the proper principle of economy for the United States was to buy in the cheap market and sell in the dearest.

[The speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, here obtained the floor.

Mr. HAVEN. The gentleman from Georgia is laboring under ill health, and, with his permission, I will move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. With the indulgence of the House, the Chair would suggest that the gentleman from Georgia, being in ill health, desires to speak the first thing to-morrow morning. If he will give way, other gentlemen can occupy the floor this afternoon, and, by unanimous consent, the gentleman from Georgia can have the floor to-morrow morning.

[Cries of "Yes!" "Yes!"]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest that to-morrow is private bill day, and private bill days are excepted out of the special order. Yet, if they think proper, the House can go into committee, notwithstanding.

Mr. STEPHENS. I am perfectly willing to yield the floor, with the understanding that the next time the House goes into committee I shall have the floor upon this bill.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, that understanding will be considered as the pleasure of the House.

No objection being made, Mr. STEPHENS yielded the floor, and

Mr. SAPP obtained it, who addressed the committee in favor of the homestead policy, maintaining that it was constitutional and wise. [This speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Having concluded—

Mr. KERR obtained the floor.

Mr. DEAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield the floor, to enable me to make a motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. KERR,] that the gentleman from Georgia is entitled to the floor, and has, in consequence of indisposition, postponed addressing the House until to-morrow morning. That gentleman will therefore be heard first to-morrow; but as the gentleman from North Carolina has now obtained the floor, it will be given to him next after the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. OLDS) reported to the House that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the Union generally, and especially House bill No. 37—being the homestead bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly adjourned, at half-past three o'clock, p. m., till to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 17, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORTON. I ask leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the memorial of Charles Evans and others, for losses sustained by the occupation of their land by troops of the United States in 1814.

The PRESIDENT. No motion of the kind can be entertained. This is private bill day.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senate will grant me unanimous consent to have these papers withdrawn, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. PRATT. Now let us go on with private bills.

The PRESIDENT. If there be any objection the Chair cannot entertain any motion in reference to any business except private bills.

Mr. PRATT. If we are to take up the Private Calendar we had better proceed with it at once. If on the other hand, it is the desire of the Senate not to proceed with private business, we had better take up the special order immediately.

Mr. PETTIT. I wish to make some reports from the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. PRATT. The rule is that the Private Calendar shall be taken up to the exclusion of all other business.

Mr. PETTIT. I wish to know what the rule is—whether it applies to the Private Calendar alone, or to private bills?

The PRESIDENT. The rule is as follows:

Resolved, That for the residue of the present session, every Friday shall be set apart exclusive for the consideration of private bills on the general orders of the day; and that on the first Friday of every month, no such bill shall be taken up to which there may be objection, or the consideration of which may lead to debate.

Mr. FOOT. I do not propose to commit any breach of the rule, but I ask the indulgence of the Senate, and their unanimous consent, to allow me to make a report from the Committee on Public Lands, which I had not the opportunity to make yesterday morning. It is important that the report should be presented now. It is a railroad bill. I desire to have it deferred for consideration until Monday morning with the other bills which have been assigned for that day. I presume there will be no objection to that.

Mr. PRATT. I feel very reluctant to do an act of discourtesy towards any one. Such is not my intention certainly. But the rule of the Senate is that to-day is to be exclusively occupied in the consideration of private bills which have been heretofore reported, and are upon the Calendar. Now, sir, if it be the desire of the Senate that we shall depart for to-day from that rule, well and good; but if we are to proceed with the Private Calendar, let us commence at once. For the last two or three Fridays the consideration of private bills on the Calendar has been broken in upon. I hope my friend from Vermont [Mr. Foot] will not suppose that it is from any indisposition to indulge him in reporting his bill that I object.

Mr. FOOT. Certainly not.

The PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of private bills.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to inquire whether the rule excludes the introduction of private bills?

The PRESIDENT. It does. It excludes everything but the consideration of private bills on the Calendar.

HODGES, LANSDALE, AND JOHNSON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee of Claims, for the relief of Hodges and Lansdale, and of the legal representatives of Rinaldo Johnson, and of Ann E. Johnson, deceased.

It proposes to direct the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to audit their claims for tobacco destroyed by the British in 1814, at the warehouses at Nottingham and Magruder's Ferry, Prince George's county, Maryland, and from such competent proof as may be exhibited to them, within six months after the passage of the bill, ascertain the quantity and value of the tobacco so destroyed, and pay the amount.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to make some remarks upon the bill. Before doing so, I ask for the reading of the report of the Committee of Claims.

The report was accordingly read.

Commodore Barney, in 1814, commanded the United States flotilla, designed by the American Government to protect the Chesapeake bay and its tributaries from the naval force of the enemy. To prevent the capture of the vessels under his command, he was compelled to abandon the Chesapeake, and was induced to sail up the Patuxet river, one of its tributaries, with the hope that the British would be unable, or at least unwilling, to follow with their larger vessels. This expectation, however, was not realized. He was pursued by the enemy, and was compelled to blow up his vessels to prevent their capture. From that period the Patuxet river was occupied by the naval forces of the enemy, and became the point from which various military expeditions were ordered against the surrounding country, terminating with the capture of Washington, and the burning of the Capitol. General Winder was placed in command of this military division; the militia was called out to resist the landing of the British forces, and for a considerable period were successful; in several instances in preventing the landing, and in all instances in driving the enemy back to their vessels.

Two public warehouses had been erected many years before this period, upon the margin of the Patuxet, for the inspection and deposit of the tobacco grown by the citizens of Prince George's county—one at the village of Nottingham, the other at Magruder's Ferry. These houses were in 1814 filled with hogsheads of tobacco, the property of the planters of that county, or of merchants who had purchased it for shipment; and the tobacco for which remuneration is now claimed by the petitioner, R. Johnson, had been deposited in the warehouse at Magruder's Ferry, and the tobacco for which payment is asked by Hodges & Lansdale was deposited in the warehouse at Nottingham. The warehouse at Magruder's Ferry was burned by the British, with all the tobacco it contained; and all the tobacco in the warehouse at Nottingham was either taken away or burned by the enemy.

The petitioners could not have claimed indemnity under the general laws of 1816 and 1817, because the relief designed to be afforded by those acts expressly and exclusively applied to injuries to real property.

The committee, however, were unable to recognize the force or propriety of the distinction which makes the United States liable for real property destroyed by the enemy, and which exempts the Government from liability for personal property destroyed under the same circumstances; and they were of opinion that the United States should be held liable to reimburse her citizens, whenever private property has been (in accordance with the usages of civilized warfare) destroyed by a public enemy, because of its use for military purposes by the authority of an officer or agent of the Government.

In reference to the warehouse at Magruder's Ferry, it appears that a considerable American force was stationed behind it. Being filled with tobacco, it afforded complete protection against the cannon of the enemy; and a battle was fought with the British vessels, which continued until the ammunition of our troops was exhausted, and they were consequently obliged to retreat. Upon the retreat of the American force, the British landed and burned the warehouse, with the tobacco of the petitioner, R. Johnson, and others therein contained. In regard to the tobacco destroyed at the Nottingham warehouse, it appears that this warehouse was for a considerable time the depository of the military stores intended for the use of the militia employed in the defense of this exposed section of Maryland; and that upon one occasion the tobacco was rolled, by the directions of the officer in command, from this house, with which a breastwork was formed, from behind which the enemy were fought and repulsed. It also appears that when the enemy subsequently landed and proceeded to Washington, they destroyed or took away all the tobacco deposited in this warehouse, which belonged to the petitioners, Hodges & Lansdale, and others.

There are many precedents to show that the Government have paid for personal property destroyed under similar circumstances.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, it strikes me that that bill carries the principle of indemnification very far; much further than any general law can carry it. The accidents of war are such that no nation can, in my opinion, indemnify private individuals for all the losses that occur. Now, the principle of that bill, if carried out, would require the Government, in case a city is bombarded, and property in that city is destroyed by such bombardment, to indemnify the citizens who suffer losses in consequence of it.

I do not believe that principle could be maintained in any country. There are certain cases where a Government is bound to make up for losses—that is, where the Government itself takes possession of a house. A general law provides for that, or where the Government troops take possession of a house, and for the time being convert it into a fortification, and in consequence of such occupation the house is destroyed. Then the Government ought to make up for the loss; but when it is one of the inevitable and unavoidable casualties of war, such as the destruction of a city, or the destruction of property by an enemy, then I hold the Government is not bound to make up the loss.

When war is carried into a country, the citizens of that country must share a portion of the calamities of that war. The Government cannot indemnify all those who may by possibility suffer a loss. No Government does.

What has struck me in this bill is the length to which the principle will carry indemnification. If we act upon the principle, and an enemy should bombard any of our cities, as the Americans bombarded Vera Cruz, it will become an obligation and the duty of the Government to make up the losses of private citizens who suffer in consequence of that bombardment. It seems to me, no Government could indemnify them. It may be such that it would be impossible for any exchequer to meet the demand. I only mention this because the bill seems to carry the principle too far.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand the Senator from New York [Mr. Seward] proposes at one o'clock to request the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Nebraska bill. If that be so, it would be idle for me now to go into the discussion of the principles connected with this claim.

This claim, in common with a great number of others, was referred to me when I became a member of the Committee of Claims at the first session when I was a member of this body. After giving to these cases the best consideration which I could, I made up my own opinion against them, though my view was contrary to that of the majority of the committee; and I wish now to assign at length, as the principles of this bill embrace a class of cases, my reasons for opposition to the whole. I wish to discuss the principles upon which the bill is framed, and the application of the facts which are proved in the case to the principle upon which the bill is said to be founded. It will take some time, probably, to do that; and if the discussion is to be interrupted at one o'clock, I should think it would be almost useless for me to attempt to proceed now; but if, on the contrary, it is intended to devote this day entirely to private bills, I am perfectly ready and willing to go on.

I only wish to know what the sense of the Senate is as to this point. The Senator from New York is under the impression that, at one o'clock, he will be permitted to proceed with his remarks on the Nebraska bill. If that is the case—if it is the understanding of the Senate that the discussion of the Nebraska bill shall be resumed at one o'clock, I presume it will not be proper to go on with the discussion of this bill now. I think it would be more agreeable to the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. Pratt], who takes a different view of the case from what I do, not to devote a portion of the day to a partial discussion of this matter, and then postpone it. I desire to know the sense of the Senate upon that point, before going on with any remarks which I may have to make, and which will probably be somewhat enlarged. With a view to test the sense of the Senate, I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I supposed that this question was settled when the Senate met this morning—that this day, under the rule, was to be devoted exclusively to the consideration of private bills on the Calendar. If, however, there was a general understanding to the contrary yesterday, I yield to that understanding. I do not wish to interpose a single objection to what is the general sense of the Senate. I never will do that. I do not think it is right, when a large majority of the Senate desires to proceed with any measure of public business, for me to interpose my single objection.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to have the yeas and nays upon the motion to postpone, so as to ascertain whether it is the sense of the Senate.

Mr. ADAMS. Before the vote is taken on the motion of the Senator from Delaware, I wish to say that I think this bill passed the Senate after a full discussion at the last session of Congress. The sense of the Senate was then ascertained upon this particular bill; but there may be some change of opinion since that time, and Senators may desire to express the reasons for that change. I should like, however, before the question is taken upon the pending motion, to call the attention of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Shields] to a feature in this case, differing from the principle which he thinks it involves. I am confident that if he looks into the facts of the case he will not only change his views, but will vote for the bill.

Mr. PRATT. He voted for it last year.

Mr. ADAMS. I have not investigated this claim at this session of Congress; but, if I recollect it aright, from what occurred at the last session, I think it is not one of that class of cases to which the objection of the Senator from Illinois would apply. The principle on which this bill is reported is this: The property proposed to be paid for by the bill was used as a means of defense, and the proof shows that it was destroyed by the enemy in consequence of having been used by our troops as a means of defense.

That is my recollection of the nature of the claim, and it is the reason why it is taken out of the exception for which the Senator from Illinois contends. I am confident it does not come within the rule laid down by him; and if he finds that I am right in this, I know his generous disposition will induce him to vote for the bill if it is right.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PRATT. I imagine, sir, that private claims will have to yield to the public business of the Senate; and therefore that this bill will not be discussed to-day. In justice to the claimants, and to those who under this bill stand in the same position, it may be appropriate that I should give some of the facts of the case, so as to disabuse the mind of my honorable friend from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] and those who have heard his speech.

Under the general law of 1816, the Government of the United States bound itself to pay for all houses and buildings which were destroyed by the enemy, where the destruction was caused by the occupancy of such houses by the military forces of the United States, or the agents of the United States. The principle of the present bill is, that the Government is equally bound to pay for personal property, where that personal property was rightfully destroyed by a foreign enemy, in accordance with the usages of civilized warfare, in consequence of its use by the officers or Army of the United States. The committee who reported the bill, as they state in the report, have been unable to comprehend a difference between an obligation to pay for a house which is destroyed, because that house is occupied by the Army of the United States, under the authority of the Government, and the obligation to pay for the personal property of an American citizen which is destroyed with the house.

Now, if the committee are right, I would ask my honorable friend (between now and the next day when private bills shall come up) to consider whether he can form in his own mind a distinction between the obligation to pay for personal property which happens to be in a house occupied by the American forces and destroyed in consequence of such occupancy, and the obligation to pay for the house itself.

Again, sir, I desire to throw out another view of this question for my honorable friend from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] that he may consider it. The tobacco claimed by one of the parties to be paid for was taken away by the British after their retreat from the city of Washington. The other was destroyed. My honorable friend from Delaware voted the day before yesterday, and always has advocated, the payment of the claims for French spoliations. I see that he smiles with incredulity at the idea that there is any analogy between the two cases; but I desire him to consider this view.

Under the treaty of Ghent, Great Britain obliged herself to pay for the property of citizens of the United States taken away by the British army. The two Governments were unable to agree in reference to that subject, and the whole question was referred to the Emperor of Russia. That potentate decided, that under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, Great Britain had obligated herself to pay for all the property of citizens of this country which was taken away by her forces at the end of the war, or during the war of 1812-1814.

After this decision of the Emperor of Russia, a convention was held between the two Governments of the United States and Great Britain, by which the stipulations of the treaty of Ghent, as decided upon by the Emperor of Russia, were altered to this extent: Great Britain agreed with the United States, in lieu of this general obligation, to pay for all property taken away, to pay the gross sum of about $1,400,000 to the United States, and the United States, in consideration of the receipt of that amount of money, agreed to pay its citizens for all property which had been taken away; which, under the first article of the treaty of Ghent and the decision of the Emperor of Russia, the Government of Great Britain was bound to pay for. The article of the treaty is in these words:

"ART. I. His Majesty, the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, agrees to pay, and the United States of America agree to receive, for the use of the persons entitled to indemnification and compensation, by virtue of the said decision and convention, the sum of twelve hundred and four thousand nine hundred and sixty dollars, current money of the United States, in lieu of, and in full and complete satisfaction for, all sums claimed or claimable from Great Britain, by any person or persons whatever, under the said decision and convention."

Now, sir, the money which was thus received by the United States from Great Britain, was applied exclusively in the payment for slaves taken, I believe, from Maryland and Virginia alone, during the war of 1812. The article of the treaty of Ghent, and the decision of the Emperor of Russia, applied as well to all other property as to slaves. The decision of the Emperor of Russia was:

"That the United States of America are entitled to a just indemnification from Great Britain, for all private property carried away by the British forces, and as the question regards slaves more especially, for all such slaves as were carried away by the British forces, from the places and territories of which the restitution was stipulated by the treaty, in quitting the said places and territories."

Here, then, was the consequent obligation on the part of the British Government to pay, not merely for slaves, but for all property taken away by the British during the period of that war; and when the United States received $1,204,960, and obliged themselves to settle with the American citizens for all the property which was taken, they placed themselves, in reference to the claims under the treaty at Ghent, precisely in the position which they occupied in reference to the claims for spoliations committed by the French prior to 1800.

I have made these remarks because I thought it was necessary to disabuse the mind of my honorable friend from Illinois of the false impression which he has taken in reference to the facts of this case. My recollection is, that after the discussion of last year, my honorable friend went with me in voting for this bill. I know that my friend from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] who expressed, in his seat, his concurrence with the views of the Senator from Illinois, did vote for it. The principle in the bill is simply that personal property should be paid for as well as real property, when destroyed under the same circumstances. If this were real property, the Government, under the law of 1816, would be obliged to pay for it. If my friend can draw a distinction between the obligation to pay for property destroyed in a house, and the obligation to pay for the house itself, it is a distinction which I cannot draw or understand.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will examine the facts in this case between now and next Friday, and it is very likely I may change my view of the subject. If I find that the bill comes within the principle which I have laid down as the correct principle, I shall vote for it; but it struck me, on hearing the reading of the report, that it did not come within that principle. The true principle I take to be this: A Government pays for property which itself destroys, or which it is the cause of being destroyed.

Mr. PRATT. That is it.

Mr. SHIELDS. But it does not pay for all property destroyed by the enemy. If the bill comes within this principle I shall vote for it.

Mr. BAYARD. Though the case is to go over until next week, I cannot allow the remarks of the Senator from Maryland to go without some additional ones from me. I think the distinction very obvious between the principle on which the claimants for French spoliations are entitled to relief from Congress, and the principle upon which the class of cases now before you, under the treaty of Ghent, rests. It seems to me so; and I think I can show by previous repeated reports of committees—for I do not rely on my own opinion alone—that the distinction to which the Senator from Maryland objects has been recognized, and recognized on principles, I may say, incontrovertible as between real and personal property.

I may mention one ground of distinction which has been taken, and which applies to the whole class of cases. It is this: The principle on which you give relief at all in such cases is, that where the enemy destroys property according to the usages of civilized warfare, you should compensate your citizen who suffers by that destruction, if the destruction has been in consequence of your having imparted to that property such a character as justifies it. I hold that that cannot take place as to personal property at all. It may as to realty. You may convert houses into barracks; you may make them places of military deposit, and you may justify their destruction by the enemy under these circumstances; and then you are bound to compensate your own citizen who suffers.

But if you take possession of property for barrack purposes, or for purposes of military deposit, the possession of the Government must be exclusive in its character, and the individual has no right to permit his personal property to remain there; and you impress upon it no character which justifies the enemy in its destruction, according to the usages of civilized warfare.

This is a principle which I wish to discuss when we come to the discussion of this claim. For the present, I adhere to my motion to postpone.

Mr. PRATT. There is one point which I wish my friend from Delaware to bear in mind, and it is that this tobacco was taken possession of by our army, and with it a breastwork was formed, from which the battle was fought. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and submit to the manifest desire of the Senator to postpone the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDENT. It will require unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the question was not taken by yeas and nays.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

JOSEPH CAMPAU.

On motion by Mr. STUART, the bill for the relief of Joseph Campau was read a second time, and considered in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to confirm his claim to the tract of land occupied by him, lying in township six north, of range seventeen east, in the State of Michigan.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

CONTRACTS ON THE CAPITOL.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives, authorizing a supplemental contract for certain marble for the Capitol extension, was read a first and second time by its title; and, on motion by Mr. BAYARD, referred to the Committee on Printing.

JOHN DEVLIN.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, the bill for the relief of John Devlin was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the claim of John Devlin, for services as temporary clerk in the Fifth Auditor's Office, in 1837 and 1838, to be settled, and to pay him such sum as may be found due, not exceeding $1,366.

It appears that John Devlin was employed to discharge the duties of two regular clerks in the Fifth Auditor's Office who were absent, and whose business could not be postponed, and was subsequently retained in the office, and usefully occupied in the service of the Government for thirteen months. The reason why he was not paid was, that there was no fund provided for his compensation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

JOHN P. McELDERRY.

On motion by Mr. BRODHEAD, the bill for the relief of John P. McElderry was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be paid to Mr. McElderry $133 33, in full for his services as a clerk in the Bureau of Yards and Docks, in the months of May and June, 1851.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

IRA DAY.

Mr. FOOT. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Ira Day, of Vermont. It passed the Senate, it will be recollected, during the last Congress, and then a very full and elaborate discussion was had upon it, in regard to the question of the payment of interest upon the claim, which was then reported by the committee. It passed the Senate then with the allowance of interest; but the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have now reported the bill for the payment of the principal sum only, without interest.

The PRESIDENT. The bill has not been returned from the printer, and therefore cannot be taken up.

RAILROADS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. FOOT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill making a grant of land to the State of Alabama, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the line of Georgia, on the Chattahoochee river, to the city of Mobile, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report recommending its passage; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOOT. I move that the consideration of this bill be assigned for Monday next, in connection with other bills of a similar character, which have been postponed until that day.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. SHIELDS. Before the Nebraska bill is taken up, as I do not see in his seat the honorable Senator from North Carolina, whose special prerogative it is to make the usual motion to-day, I move that when the Senate adjourn, it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. McKean, its Chief Clerk, announcing that it had passed a bill and joint resolution of the Senate, of the following titles:

"An act to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans;" and

"Joint resolution for supplying new members of the Senate and House of Representatives with such books, of a public character, as have been heretofore supplied."

Also, that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills:

"Bill to confirm to Hercules L. Dousman his title to farm lot No. 32, adjoining the town of Prairie du Chien, in the State of Wisconsin;"

"Bill supplemental to an act entitled 'An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims the State of California,' approved March 3, 1851," and

"Bill for the relief of William Blake."

INDIANA UNIVERSITY LAND.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Forney, its Clerk, announcing that it had passed the bill of the Senate to indemnify the State of Indiana for the failure of title to a township of land granted to said State on her admission into the Union, in 1816.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, it is somewhat out of order, owing to the derangement of the business of the Senate this morning; but, nevertheless, having received from his Excellency, the Governor of the State of New York, the resolutions of the Senate and Assembly of that State, remonstrating against the passage of this bill, I ask leave to present them now, and ask that they may be read, and ordered to be printed.

The resolutions were read, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEWARD then addressed the Senate at length in opposition to the Nebraska and Kansas Territorial bill, and against any interference with the Missouri compromise. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. PETTIT. I desire to address the Senate on this question. As the day is far spent, I do not desire to proceed now; but for the purpose of addressing the Senate on Monday next, I move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until that day.

Mr. SUMNER. I would like to suggest, also, that I design to take the floor at an early day and address the Senate on this subject, and, with the permission of the Senate, I shall be glad to follow the Senator from Indiana on Tuesday.

Mr. DAWSON. I desire to ask whether, if we accept the proposition made by the Senator from Massachusetts, taking day after day in this way, when he says he desires to address the Senate after another Senator, he acquires any parliamentary right, other than from our courtesy, to the floor? I have no objection, of course, to hearing the honorable Senator—

Mr. SUMNER. I make the announcement only as a matter of notice.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 17, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] to lay upon the table the bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The title of the bill was then read, as follows:

"An act to indemnify the State of Indiana for the failure of a title to a township of land granted to said State on her admission into the Union in 1816."

THE NEBRASKA QUESTION.

Mr. DEAN. I have received, this morning, a letter from the Governor of the State of New York, transmitting joint resolutions of the Senate and Assembly of that State, passed on the 8th of February, instant, in relation to the territorial question now before Congress. I ask that these resolutions, together with the letter of the Governor, be read, and that they be laid upon the table, and printed.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It is not necessary to read them.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let them be read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the resolutions will be read.

Mr. WALSH. I object to the reading. I have a copy in my possession if any gentleman wishes to read them.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope there will be no objection to their reception, and as to the reading it is not customary in such cases.

Mr. DEAN. I believe it is usual to read the resolutions of any sovereign State upon any subject pending before Congress.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope there will be no objection to the reception, and as to the reading it is not material one way or the other.

The SPEAKER. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. WALSH. It is not. I objected to the reading, and not to the reception.

Mr. DEAN. I suppose they may be read by the order of the House?

The SPEAKER. The resolutions are received by unanimous consent, and it is in order, after papers are received, to read them, if desired.

[Many MEMBERS. "Read!" "Read!"]

The resolutions were then read, as follows:

Resolved, (if the Senate concur,) That we view with deep regret, and with unfeigned alarm, the proposition contained in a bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska, submitted on the 23d day of January, 1854, to the Senate of the United States, from the Committee on Territories, whereby it is declared that the "eighth section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March 6, 1820, was superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, and it is hereby declared 'inoperative'"; that the adoption of this provision would be in derogation of the truth, a gross violation of pledged faith, and an outrage and indignity upon the free States of the Union, whose assent has been yielded to the admission into the Union of Missouri, and of Arkansas, with slavery, in reliance upon the faithful observance of the provision, (now sought to be abrogated,) known as the Missouri compromise, whereby slavery was declared to be "forever prohibited in all that territory ceded by France to the United States, under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of 36° 30' north latitude, not included within the limits of the State" of Missouri.

Resolved, (if the Senate concur,) That inasmuch as it is expressly, and in terms, enacted in an act entitled, "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her northern and western boundaries, the relinquishment by the said State of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico," approved September 9, 1850, as follows, viz: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair or qualify anything contained in the third article of the second section of the joint resolution for annexing Texas to the United States, approved March 1, 1845, either as regards the number of States that may hereafter be formed out of Texas, or otherwise;" which said third article of the second section of the joint resolution for annexing Texas contains the following provision: "And in such State or States as shall be formed out of said territory, north of said Missouri compromise line, slavery or involuntary servitude (except for crime) shall be prohibited," the principle and the application of the Missouri compromise is maintained, unimpaired, and unqualified, and that the Legislature and the people of this State will hold the application by Congress, of a contrary intent, at this time, to be in derogation of the truth, an arbitrary exercise of assumed power, an unjust and unworthy violation of good faith, and an indignity to the free States of the Union.

Resolved, (if the Senate concur,) That although the people of the State of New York have abolished slavery within their limits, and have thereby expressed their disapprobation of the holding in bondage of human beings, they are not disposed to interfere with the rights of other States to regulate their internal policy according to their own sense of right. But, at the same time, duty to themselves, and to the other States of the Union, demands that when an effort is making to violate a solemn compact, whereby the political power of the State, and the privileges, as well as the honest sentiments of its citizens, will be jeopardized and invaded, they should raise their voice in protest against the threatened infraction of their rights, and declare that the negation or repeal, by Congress, of the Missouri compromise, will be regarded by them as a violation of right and of faith, and destructive of that confidence and regard which should attach to the enactments of the Federal Legislature.

Resolved, (if the Senate concur,) That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to oppose any action which shall look, in any degree, to a repeal or to a negation of the binding force of the provisions known as the Missouri compromise, and that they use all honorable efforts to defeat the passage of that, or any other bill violating said compromise, or authorizing or allowing the establishment of slavery in any portion of the Territories of the United States, north of the line established preparatory to the admission of Missouri as aforesaid.

Resolved, (if the Senate concur,) That the Governor of this State be requested forthwith to furnish copies of the above resolutions to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the resolutions, together with the letter of the Governor, be laid upon the table, and printed.

The SPEAKER. Unless objected to, that disposition of them will be made.

Mr. McMULLIN. I do not think it necessary that they should be laid upon the table, and printed.

The SPEAKER. Is objection made to laying the resolutions upon the table?

Mr. McMULLIN. It was my purpose to object to laying the resolutions upon the table, but understanding that such has been the custom of the House in similar cases, I waive my purpose.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, it is unanimously ordered that the resolution be laid upon the table, and printed.

Mr. HILLYER. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope that we will take up the special order.

LAND TO INDIANA.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, that the first business in order is the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to indemnify the State of Indiana for the failure of title to a township of land, granted to said State on her admission into the Union, in 1816."

The previous question was demanded and seconded upon the passage of the bill, but a motion was made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Jones] to lay the bill upon the table. By the unanimous consent of the House its consideration was postponed to this day, and it is, of course, the first business in order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I rise to make a privileged motion, and that is, that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PECKHAM. I hope the House will not agree to that motion, but go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion, a demand for the previous question having been made and seconded upon this bill, that it is not in order to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then the decision of the Chair is contrary to the former practice of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the practice indicated by him has always been held here.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will remind the Chair of a precedent. When what was called Mr. Dorr's resolution was offered—

Mr. PECKHAM. I wish to ask the Chair a single question. What was the order as to the resolutions submitted a few minutes since?

The SPEAKER. They were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I was about to remind the Chair of a decision upon this point, touching the question now pending, which I have no doubt the Chair will recollect very well. When Mr. Doty's famous resolution was offered in this House, the previous question was sustained, and the main question ordered to be put, and we then resorted to two motions. It was decided by the Speaker, Mr. Cobb, that we could not have a call of the House, owing to the fact that the previous question was seconded. Motions were made to go into the Committee of the Whole, and to adjourn, and alternated, and we were kept here until midnight. I have no doubt the Chair will recollect that such was the condition of things. It has been clearly decided since that time, that a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or a motion to adjourn, was in order at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that a demand for a call of the House, for instance, is a call of the same dignity as a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The recollection of the Chair is, that it has been the practice of my predecessors, when the demand for the previous question had been seconded, and the main question ordered to be put, that it cuts off either one of these motions.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The Chair can refer to these precedents. The only one I recollect is the Doty resolution, in the session of 1850, where we sat up until midnight, and it was decided that it went over—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Has the main question been ordered?

The SPEAKER. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, but a motion is now pending to lay the bill on the table. The consideration of the subject was postponed, by unanimous consent, until this morning. That is the condition of the question. The Chair is not disposed to change the practice either way upon this subject, and has not time now to look up the precedents.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The Chair will find, I think, that I am not mistaken as to the practice.

A MEMBER. Read the rule.

The SPEAKER. The following is the only rule which is applicable to the subject:

"50. The previous question shall be in this form: 'Shall the main question be now put?' It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present, and its effects shall be to put an end to all debate, and bring the House to a direct vote upon a motion to commit, if such motion shall have been made; and if this motion does not prevail, then upon amendments reported by a committee, if any, then upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question. On a motion for the previous question, and prior to the seconding of the same, a call of the House shall be in order; but after a majority shall have seconded such motion, no call shall be in order prior to a decision of the main question."

The Chair thinks that a motion for a call of the House is, at least, of equal dignity and equal privilege with that to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and that it cannot, therefore, be entertained after the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The Chair may be correct in what he states as to the comparative dignity of the two motions, but if he will turn to the case to which I have referred, he will find that the decision of the Speaker was then the other way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recollect what the practice was in the case to which the gentleman alludes.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the Chair will turn to it, he will find that the decision was as I have stated—

Mr. HILLYER, (interrupting.) I call the gentleman from North Carolina to order. This question is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated his decision. Does the gentleman from North Carolina appeal?

Mr. CLINGMAN. No, sir; I will not appeal, but I protest against the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. If, upon reference, the Chair finds the practice of the House has been as the gentleman from North Carolina states, he will not be disposed to change the practice of the House.

The question now being upon the motion to lay the bill upon the table, it was taken, and decided in the negative.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the following amendment:

Add the following at the end of the bill:
Provided nevertheless, That this act shall not take effect until the suit now pending in the supreme court of Indiana, by the trustees for the Vincennes University vs. the State of Indiana, be finally settled; and unless the decision of said suit be in favor of the plaintiff, and shall deprive the said

State, or those claiming under her, of the township of land, or the proceeds of sale thereof, which are the subject of said suit: Provided further, That the State of Indiana may cause the lands to be selected at once, and that the Secretary of the Interior on being notified by the Governor of Indiana, at any time, that a selection of the lands herein provided to be donated has been made by the proper authorities of that State, shall therefore withdraw and reserve such lands from sale till the termination of said suit.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. Upon the adoption of that amendment I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MILLSON. I demand tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ORR. I demand tellers upon the adoption of the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. McMULLIN and PHILLIPS were appointed.

The question was then put; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and being engrossed, was subsequently read the third time.

The question now being, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. LETCHER demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 47; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Belcher, Bissell, Bliss, Boyce, Breckinridge, Campbell, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chase, Clark, Cobb, Cook, Corwin, Cox, Crocker, Curtis, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dean, De Witt, Dick, Disney, Drum, Dunbar, Dunham, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmunds, Edmundson, Ellison, English, Farley, Fenton, Flagler, Florence, Giddings, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Harrison, Hastings, Hendricks, Henni, Hester, Howe, Hughes, Ingersoll, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Kittredge, Knox, Kurtz, Lane, Macdonald, McDougall, McNair, Mace, Macy, Matteson, Mayall, Middleswarth, Murray, Nichols, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Packard, Pennington, Phelps, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Russell, Sapp, Seymour, Simmons, Gerrit Smith, William R. Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Straub, Andrew Stuart, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Trout, Tweed, Upham, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Warren, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Yates—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Ball, Bennett, Bocoock, Buggs, Caskie, Chrisman, Clingman, Colquitt, Craigie, Dent, Dowdell, Elliott, Etheridge, Gamble, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Wiley P. Harris, Hill, Hillyer, George W. Jones, Kerr, Lamb, Letcher, McCulloch, McMullin, Maurice, Millson, Morgan, Morrison, Orr, Peckham, Puryear, Ready, Reese, Ruffin, Sabin, Shaw, Singleton, Skelton, William Smith, Snodgrass, Tracy, Walsh, Witte, and Zollcoffer—47.

So the bill passed.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put on the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Has the title of the bill been disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. JONES. I wish to make the title state what the act is—that it grants an additional township to the State of Indiana for educational purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announced, in the usual form, that if there was no objection the title would stand as it was, and no objection was made. The Chair thinks that it is too late to amend the title now.

CORRECTION OF THE OFFICIAL REPORTS.

Mr. MATTESON. I rise to a question of order, or rather to a privileged question, and a question of privilege, both. I rise to have the Journal corrected—the reports of our proceedings in the Globe—

The SPEAKER. The Globe is not the Journal at all.

Mr. MATTESON. I speak of the proceedings in the Congressional Globe.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is not the Journal. It is no privileged question.

Mr. MATTESON. The proceedings in the Globe are published by the order of the House.

The SPEAKER. It will be in order for the gentleman to move to correct the Journal which was read this morning; but the Globe is not the Journal at all, and no privileged question can arise out of what the Globe reports—none whatever.

Mr. MATTESON. It is a personal matter.

The SPEAKER. Then it will be for the House to determine whether the gentleman shall be allowed to make a personal statement.

Mr. MATTESON. It is a personal matter, and a question of privilege, both.

The SPEAKER. It will be for the House to determine whether the gentleman shall be heard.

Mr. MATTESON. Is it possible that when the official reporters of this House omit a part of what occurs here, it cannot be corrected?

Mr. McMULLIN. You can make the correction by a note to the editor of the Globe.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The House has nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. MATTESON. I wish to state my point, and my question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

Mr. MATTESON. On Wednesday last, when one of my colleagues was speaking on the other side of this House, the chairman of the Committee on Territories interrupted him, and suggested that the objection he was making to the bill would be obviated by way of an amendment when the discussion might come up. Hearing that, I made a suggestion to the chairman of that committee, with the permission of the gentleman who was then speaking on the subject of the Nebraska bill. I asked the chairman [Mr. RICHARDSON] if that bill would be open to amendment. He at first answered me—and so far I speak from recollection—that, so far as he knew, it would. I put the question to him again, and he answered that it positively would. Now, sir, every word of that is omitted in the report of our proceedings of that day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must announce to the gentleman from New York, that there is nothing of a privileged character in what the gentleman has brought forward.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. MATTESON,] as the Chair understands him, has not asked the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

Mr. MATTESON. In what I have said I intended no imputation whatever on the gentleman from Illinois. I have said nothing which could be so construed. I have only said that what occurred then in this House did not appear in the report of the official proceedings.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, am I entitled to the floor?

Mr. MATTESON. Mr. Speaker, I desire—

The SPEAKER. The Chair must say to the gentleman from New York, that there was nothing whatever of a privileged character in the matter which he has introduced to this body. Nothing. The Chair again states that the Congressional Globe is not the Journal of this body; and it is not competent, as a question of right, under the rules of this House, for the gentleman to undertake to correct the report of the speeches made upon this floor. There is nothing of privilege in it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] asks the unanimous consent of the House to allow him to make a personal explanation. Is that consent given?

Several MEMBERS. Yes, yes.

Mr. MATTESON. I wish to say again that I cast no imputation on the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has once or twice suggested to the gentleman from New York that he can only arrive at the object which he has in view by asking the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation. He has not availed himself of it; and the gentleman from Illinois has asked and obtained the unanimous consent of the House to make a personal explanation. The gentleman from Illinois, therefore, has the floor for that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will allow the gentleman from New York to make any further statement he has to make.

Mr. MATTESON. I repeat, I did not design anything offensive to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RICHARDSON resumed the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from New York will be allowed to make the explanation which he desires.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. SAPP. It appears to me that the gentleman from New York had the floor.

The SPEAKER. The unanimous consent of the House has been long since given to the gentleman from Illinois, to make a personal explanation. The gentleman from New York asked no such privilege; and the Chair is bound to decide that he has no right to the floor as a matter of privilege. If he had asked the leave of the House to make a personal explanation, the Chair has no doubt that it would have been given to him.

He declined to do that. The Chair twice suggested to him that he could attain his object in that form; but he chose to rely on his right under the rule. He did so, and the Chair ruled him out of order. The House has given its unanimous consent to the gentleman from Illinois that he has a right to be heard in personal explanation. This is the history of the matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from New York, if he had put himself to the trouble to have inquired of the reporters at the desk, would not have brought this question before the House. I assure him that I am utterly incapable of suppressing, or skulking, from the responsibility of any declaration which I make here.

Mr. MATTESON. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to say one word?

Mr. RICHARDSON. With pleasure.

Mr. MATTESON. I assure the gentleman that I intended or designed no such imputation as he deduces from my remarks.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman, Mr. Speaker, has said that, and I accept it. But I am not dealing with his declarations. I am dealing with the deductions that are to be drawn in other quarters from the statement which he has made here.

Mr. Chairman, I presume it has happened very often, in the experience of gentlemen who have been here for years, that when notes of remarks have been sent to a gentleman's room for correction, that they did not happen to get into the paper of the next morning. Such is the case, I state upon this floor, in regard to the remarks I submitted here the other day. I changed, in a slight particular only, the statement of the reporters, in relation to the matter upon which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FENTON] was commenting. So far as the questions and replies between the gentleman from New York [Mr. MATTESON] and myself are concerned, the language is left precisely as it came to me, not changed, in any particular, from the form in which the reporters took it down. The notes are at my room. I happened to be absent from my room for a short time when they came to get them, and the result was that they could not go into the Daily Globe. I intend that they shall go into the Congressional Globe. The gentleman shall have the full benefit of all that I have said or shall say here.

I must be permitted here to say, that with this matter there seems to me to be a very morbid desire to magnify this into something of vast importance, and to give the gentleman some notoriety by calling up somebody for skulking from what they said here. If the gentleman had gone to the quarters where true information could have been had, he would have had no business with it before this House in this shape. The gentleman makes himself quite conspicuous when he undertakes to determine what the action of each gentleman upon this floor is to be. When he marks out and lives up to his own course he will have quite enough to do without undertaking the guardianship of me.*

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now ask that the question be put upon the pending motion, to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was put, and decided, upon a division, in the affirmative—ayes 92, noes not counted.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. OLDS in the chair.)

THE HOMESTEAD BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee last rose, they had under consideration House bill No. 37, being the homestead bill. The Chair begs leave to state, that under the special order this bill would come up for consideration; but private bill days are excluded from the operation of this order, and the Chair, therefore, does not see how this special order then can come up without the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. EDGERTON. Do I understand the Chair, if objection be made, that discussion upon the special order cannot take place now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that under the rule making the homestead bill the special order, that bill would come up for consideration were it not that private bill days are excepted from the operation of any special order. Therefore the homestead bill is not the special order for this day.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will it not come up as unfinished business, if no objection is made?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to submit this question: The homestead bill is made the special order from Tuesday, the 14th, to the 21st day of February—Friday bill days being excepted. If the House determine to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, do they not thereby pass over the private bill Calendar, and resolve to take up the special order of the day?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The House has resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and being entitled to the floor, I claim my right to hold it.

Mr. EDGERTON. I supposed, when the House determined to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that the homestead bill came up as a matter of course, and that we were not to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, until I heard the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs leave to state to the committee, that there are two or three bills on the Calendar ahead of the homestead bill. By unanimous consent they can be passed over, and the homestead bill be taken up.

Mr. CAMPBELL. There are no private bills in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is aware that no private bill can be taken up in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union last rose, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, having the floor, addressed the House on the Nebraska bill, controverting the ground taken by Mr. MEACHAM, of Vermont, and Mr. FENTON, of New York. After reviewing the ground taken by the former-named gentleman he argued that his positions were altogether untenable.

In 1821, when Missouri applied for admission, under her constitution, into the Union, she had made no compact or contract whatever in regard to the existence of slavery within her territory. She claimed admission on her right as a State, and this compact, as it was called, was a mere law, and nothing but a law. When Arkansas applied for admission into the Union, did the North give her sanction to this compact, as it was called? If there was any compact between the North and the South in 1820 it was that slavery should exist in the South.

The principle then settled was the principle as between Lot and Abraham: "You shall go to the North, and we will go to the South." The first State that applied for admission into the Union, after this "compromise," was the State of Arkansas. He had in his hand the vote upon that question, and John Quincy Adams moved to amend the proposition, by providing that nothing in this act should be so construed as relating to the subject of slavery, and eighty gentlemen from the North voted against it.

When the gentleman, therefore, from Vermont talked to him about compacts, and contracts, and honor, he would ask him whether the South had ever proposed to disturb this line? Never, never. Every effort in that direction had come from the North. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FENTON] had talked about this Missouri compromise as being a bond of union between the North and South for thirty years; and who sought now to unsettle that bond? The North, the North.

Well did he remember, and perhaps many gentlemen here remembered also, that on the 15th day of June, 1850, the South had on the floor of that House offered to continue by this compromise. He well recollected that day; and, but with few exceptions from the North, no man voted to recognize it. The South was pressed to the wall. The North was unyielding. They would have "all or nothing"—every foot of territory we had acquired from Mexico; and when the South saw that there was no faith in the North—he spoke of the Free-Soil sentiment of the North—they said, "If you obliterate all land-marks we must throw ourselves back upon our constitutional rights—the rights we possess under the Constitution of the United States."

In 1850 it was solemnly agreed upon that the subject of slavery should be taken out of Congress. They might call him Whig, or Democrat, or Republican, or what they pleased, but he would ever adhere to principle, regardless of names, and that principle was the right of people to govern themselves. He alluded to the speech of Mr. Webster in the Senate, in 1850, when he declared this great doctrine, and when it was thought by all that this demon of discord was ejected both from the Senate and the House. In that year it was solemnly decided, by the compromise measures, that the people of the Territories should be allowed to form their governments as they pleased, without regard to any restriction. It was on that principle those measures were passed; and he claimed, as an American, that the North should stand upon that principle, and upon that alone.

He recommended the gentlemen of the North to follow the example of that great man when Faneuil Hall was closed against him, and he went to an open space in front of the Revere House, and there boldly told an assemblage, of more than three thousand persons, that they should conquer their prejudices, and fulfill their agreement with the South.

He granted that the compromise acts of 1850 did concede the right to come into the Union with or without slavery, and it was only the Free-Soilers of the North who desired to discriminate. If ever we were to have repose in the country, it would only be when the Free-Soilers of the North learned that Congress should not interfere with this question, but should leave to the people of the Territories the right to do as they pleased. He hoped it might be the honor and glory of this Congress to give sanction to those principles, so recently established, and so nobly sustained. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. CAMPBELL sought the floor.

Mr. KERR, (who was entitled to the floor under the arrangement entered into yesterday.) If the gentleman from Ohio desires to address the committee in opposition to the views which we have just heard, I will yield the floor to enable him to do so, if I can resume it after he has concluded his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the pleasure of the committee that the gentleman from North Carolina shall be considered as entitled to the floor when the gentleman from Ohio concludes?

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman from Ohio can proceed.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will my colleague yield me five minutes of his time, to enable me to set the gentleman from Georgia right as to an historical fact?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I prefer not to do it.

Mr. PECKHAM. I desire to move that the committee do now rise, that we may go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield the floor for that purpose?

Mr. CAMPBELL. No, sir; I cannot.

Mr. PECKHAM. I will not press the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion cannot be submitted whilst the gentleman from Ohio holds the floor.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House of the passage by that body of Senate bills of the following titles; in which he asked the concurrence of the House.

"An act (No. 92) for the benefit of citizens and occupants of the town of Council Bluffs, in Iowa."

"An act (No. 112) making Brunswick, in the State of Georgia, a port of entry, and for other purposes."

Also sundry private bills.]

*The remarks referred to will be found in the Appendix, embodied in the speech of Mr. FENTON, on the Nebraska bill, page 158.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, next addressed the Committee. He would yield to no gentleman on that floor in his devotion to the Constitution and the Union. He had never been disposed to agitate this question of slavery, and had never spoken about it except when called to the stand by the speeches of southern gentlemen. He was surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, who, on a former occasion, had protested against the agitation of this question, and who had now made a most thrilling speech upon the subject, taunting the North with a breach of faith.

Although he believed that there was nothing in the Constitution which authorized the Missouri compromise, it could not be denied that there were occasions in the history of every Government which required the enactment of extra constitutional measures. Where was the authority in the Constitution of the United States to annex Louisiana, or Florida, or Texas, or to make a conquest of and annex the territory we acquired under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo? Mr. Jefferson had said that in annexing Louisiana we had gone beyond the Constitution.

He entered into a relation of the history of the institution of slavery in the United States, from its earliest period, contending that the framers of the Constitution regarded it as an unnatural incubus, and desired that it should never be extended beyond its then existing limits. Not one word was said in the Constitution concerning the institution of slavery; and the framers of the Constitution not only never looked to its extension, but even had an eye to its final abolition.

He believed that Congress had the power to exclude slavery from the territories, and such, he contended, were the views of Mr. Webster, as explained in his great speech of 7th of March, 1850. He also quoted the opinions of Mr. Clay, delivered in the House of Representatives in 1837, which coincided with the views he [Mr. C.] entertained. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. KERR was here recognized by the Chair as having the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remark to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] that but a minute and a half of his colleague's time remains.

Mr. KERR. As the House is rather thin, and doubtless weary—

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. It is too late.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I prefer to hold on to the floor, if the committee is about to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have but a minute or so, and the gentleman from North Carolina can have the floor to-morrow morning.

Mr. KERR. I shall not detain the House long, and I prefer not to yield the floor.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. KERR then addressed the House. He said this question had not been canvassed before his constituents before he left home, and he was somewhat taken by surprise to find its discussion here.

He regarded the compromises of 1850 as the only means on earth by which the two sections of the Union could be made to move on harmoniously together, and by which the prosperity of the Union could be maintained; and, for one, he was determined to adhere to them.

He did not believe that the spirit of the compromise was violated in the measure which had been for several days discussed—the Nebraska question. If he thought so, he would be against it. He had examined that question anxiously before he made up his mind that it was perfectly in consonance with the adjustment of 1850. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. GIDDINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield to a motion for the committee to rise?

Mr. GIDDINGS. No; I prefer to go on now. I do not propose to detain the committee for more than eight or ten minutes. It is not my intention to enter into the discussion of either of the questions to which the attention of the committee has been directed. I shall not even allude to the bill now under consideration, although it is one in which I feel a deep interest; nor am I about to discuss the Nebraska bill. I rise solely for the purpose of setting gentlemen right upon some points of history which, although they may not be important in their bearing upon the questions now before us, may hereafter be referred to.

I have taken part somewhat in the debates alluded to, and have some knowledge of the history of the transactions to which reference has been so frequently made for the last few days. I will state what I believe to have been the distinct understanding of statesmen at the time our treaty with France was made, in 1803, in regard to the extent and boundaries of the "Louisiana purchase," to which the compromise was confined. And I invite the attention of the learned gentlemen who represent States framed out of that territory, those who understand the language in which its history is written; and if I am wrong I trust that they will correct me.

Sir, it seems to me that much of our misunderstanding of the subject arises from the difference in historical views. The French nation claimed the territory to what was termed "Louisiana," by right of discovery. I wish to be distinctly understood on this point: that her original title, and her only title, was in the discovery of the mouth and sources of the Mississippi river; and that such title extended, by a rule or comity of nations, to the country drained by its tributaries. That, by the discovery and occupation, the British claims extended from the Atlantic coast, on the east, to that river; and therefore the French claim rested solely to the country drained by its western tributaries. I wish to be specific, because gentlemen, here—and perhaps it is not out of order to allude to the other end of the Capitol—have connected Oregon with the "Louisiana purchase," and insisted that in attaching the Wilmot proviso to Oregon, we denied the validity of that compromise. Now, I lay it down, that the French nation claimed title solely by that law or rule among nations which gives to the Government making the discovery of an important river the country drained by its waters. By that rule, and by no other, was "Louisiana" bounded.

The Rocky Mountains, which bounded the tributaries of the Mississippi, was the western boundary of "Louisiana," as understood by the French nation, as understood by the American nation, as understood by Congress, as understood by all our statesmen down to a very recent period. This is my view of that matter. I know it to have been so understood by leading men of that day. In the words of the treaty ceding "Louisiana" to us, there was no room for misapprehension or misunderstanding of the boundaries. It was "Louisiana, as held by France previously to her ceding it to Spain." It is, therefore, under the original title of France that we hold that country, bounded as it was while in her possession. Such was the title which we received, and which was held for something like sixteen years.

We held the entire country drained by the southern tributaries of the Arkansas, as well as that drained by its northern tributaries. The Middle Park, to which allusion has been made at the other end of the Capitol, emptied its waters into the Colorado, and not into the Mississippi; and we had no more title to the Middle Park under the "Louisiana purchase" than we had to California or Oregon.

I intend to say, the dividing ridge between the Colorado and the waters of the Arkansas was the boundary of that purchase. Now in 1819, when the negotiation of the treaty with Spain was entered into—some sixteen years subsequently to the treaty with France, by which we obtained this territory—Spain owned the whole country adjacent on the southwest, and then, by the treaty with Spain, the boundary between that country and ours was defined and established, without following the lines of the "Louisiana purchase."

Here let me call the particular attention of gentlemen to the fact, that in that treaty we surrendered to Spain the whole of the country watered by the southern tributaries of the Arkansas, which empty their waters into that river west of the hundredth degree of longitude. That country, which constituted a part of the "Louisiana purchase," was given to Spain, and the boundary was established on the Arkansas river, instead of the southern "divide" which separates its tributaries from those streams which run south.

Following the Arkansas to its source, the line agreed upon runs thence due north, until it strikes the forty-second degree of north latitude, thus giving to us that tract which Fremont describes as the "Middle Park," whose waters, as heretofore stated, empty into the Colorado. This tract had belonged to Spain, until the ratification of our treaty, in 1821. It constituted no part of "Louisiana," and did not belong to us when the Missouri compromise was adopted; and, of course, could never have been subjected to that compromise, which was confined to the territory ceded to us by France.

The Middle Park was held by Spain by force of the same principle which France held "Louisiana"—by discovery—claiming the whole country watered by the tributaries of their streams, among which was the Colorado.

It is also a fact, worthy of note, that our title to Oregon was also based upon the discovery of the mouth of the Columbia river, by Captain Grey, of Boston; and I think, if gentlemen will look into the documents, they will find such to have been our title, and that by force of this rule Great Britain admitted our claim to the whole region north of that river watered by its tributaries.

Now, sir, another historical fact. When gentlemen say it was proposed to carry the Missouri compromise to Oregon, these facts were proclaimed upon this floor. It was here stated that Oregon had no connection or association with "Louisiana"—that it was entirely distinct, separate, and independent of that purchase, that we held it by another title. I do not now mean to say that no one suggested that it was so connected, but I give the facts. And when it was proposed, as remarked by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] to-day, that it lay north of 36° 30', a member from my own State, who had served long in these Halls—I allude to Mr. Vinton—arose and stated to gentlemen here, that the Missouri compromise had relation solely to the "Louisiana purchase," and to nothing else. And, sir, the Wilmot proviso was attached to the Oregon Territory, as far as my recollection extends, with this express understanding, and as far as I have any knowledge of the views of other members then upon this floor—it was attached with this belief that it constituted no part of the Louisiana purchase.

I mention these things that members may not make mistakes by speaking of Oregon as a part of Louisiana. I do not regard the facts important, as connected with the present discussion, but I prefer to vindicate the truth of history, and to keep our record of transpiring events as accurately as we are able.

As remarked when I first rose, I have no intention of entering at present into the discussion of the question which is now exciting so much interest in this body, and do not know that I shall desire to speak upon it, unless the "agitators" become so deeply excited as to require me to pour oil upon the troubled sea which now begins to rage about us.

Mr. NOBLE here obtained the floor, but yielded to—

Mr. DEAN, who moved that the committee do now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania] taking the chair, the Chairman of the committee reported to the House that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the Union generally, and was about to say that they had particularly under consideration the Nebraska bill, but that parliamentary forms required him to say that they had particularly under consideration House bill, (No. 37,) commonly called the homestead bill.

Mr. PRESTON. I move that when this House adjourns, that it adjourn until Monday next.

Mr. LETCHER. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays. There are several gentlemen who desire to speak upon the homestead bill.

Only seventeen gentlemen rising, the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. JONES. I ask for a division, to see whether there is a quorum or not.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Preston's motion; and, a division being had, there were—yeas 67, noes 36.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FLORENCE. Count the House.

Mr. HAMILTON. Upon a division of the House, on the question of adjourning over, there was no quorum present. I ask the Speaker to count the House, and ascertain whether there is a quorum present, before we do adjourn over.

Mr. LETCHER. Is my motion to adjourn in order now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question first is to ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a point of order. I understand, under the rules, that any member can move to adjourn, yet the Speaker has come to the decision that there must be a quorum present in order to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] made his question of order, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] rose to another question, and that was for the Speaker to ascertain whether there was a quorum present or not.

Mr. MEACHAM. I call for tellers, to ascertain whether there is a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has the right to appoint tellers to ascertain whether there be a quorum in the House.

Mr. FULLER. I will save the Chair that trouble. The House cannot adjourn over without a quorum. The vote which has been taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PRESTON] shows that there is no quorum present. I therefore move that the House do now adjourn, and I ask that the Chair shall entertain the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. FLORENCE. Upon that motion I demand tellers.

Mr. PRESTON. I rise to a question of order. I insist that the question cannot be taken upon the motion to adjourn while the motion to adjourn over is pending.

Mr. FLORENCE. I call the gentleman from Kentucky to order. His point of order has been once decided by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. It is in order at any time to move that the House adjourn.

Mr. PRESTON. If the Chair will permit me, I will state my point of order. I obtained the floor, and then made the motion, that when this House adjourn, it adjourn to meet on Monday next. There has never been any decision of that motion, and, pending it, various motions have been made to adjourn. I now demand the Speaker's decision, whether or not I am entitled to have my motion first decided by the House?

Mr. FULLER. I submit that the question was put upon the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, and the Chair announced that no quorum voted. That is all the decision the gentleman's motion can have, for less than a quorum cannot adjourn over.

Mr. PRESTON. I demand that my point of order shall be decided by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky was entertained by the Chair, and put by him to the House; but, upon a division, it appeared that there was no quorum voting. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] then made the motion that the House adjourn, which the Chair thinks he was bound to entertain, and upon that motion the gentleman from Pennsylvania demanded tellers. The question therefore is upon ordering tellers upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. PRESTON. Then I shall be compelled to appeal from the decision of the Chair; for there has been no decision upon my motion.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask that the question may be taken upon the motion that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question must first be taken upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair, ruling that the motion to adjourn is not first in order. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Only one appeal can be taken at a time.

Mr. DISNEY. Do I understand the Chair to decide that less than a quorum cannot adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has made no such decision.

Mr. DISNEY. I apprehend that two can adjourn as well as two hundred.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no doubt of that; but the Constitution provides that less than a quorum cannot adjourn for more than one day. The question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to lay the appeal upon the table, and upon that motion I demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then put on Mr. FLORENCE's motion; and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move that the House do now adjourn. That motion is in order, and I demand that it be put.

Mr. PRESTON. I now again submit the point of order that my motion has precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Indiana. I submit that a motion to adjourn to a particular day takes precedence of a motion to adjourn.

Mr. LANE. Oh, no.

Mr. PRESTON. Here is the rule. Will the Chair permit me to read it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. PRESTON. Rule 48:

"A motion to adjourn, and a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, shall always be in order."

Here is the note to that rule:

"It has been decided and acted upon, that, under this rule, a motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn takes precedence of a motion to adjourn. The reason of this decision is, that before the House adjourned, it was proper to fix the time to which it should adjourn. To this decision, and upon this reasoning, no objection has been made."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The rule which the gentleman has read is clear and plain—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Is the question debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. LANE. I want to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Indiana is entertained by the Chair in preference to any other.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to ask the Speaker one question. I ask him if he did not put the question on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PRESTON,] and if, upon a division, there was not less than a quorum voting? The Chair announced that fact. Now the Constitution provides that less than a quorum can only adjourn from day to day. A motion was then made to adjourn, and that motion was in order, the motion to adjourn over having failed for want of a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn submitted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANE] has been entertained by the Chair.

Mr. PRESTON. Then I now move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

[At this stage of the proceedings other motions were made to adjourn, which were intervened by questions of order; and there was great confusion in the Hall.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I ask what question is before the House? Is it the simple motion to adjourn, or the motion that when it do adjourn, it adjourn till Monday next? Whatever it is, I move that the Speaker put the question quickly and decisively.

The question was then put on Mr. PRESTON's motion, which was adopted; so it was agreed that when the House adjourn, it be till Monday next.

The question was put on the motion to adjourn, which was also adopted.

The House accordingly adjourned, at twenty minutes past three o'clock, to Monday next, at twelve o'clock.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 20, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the 28th March last, requesting him to report the average prices annually, for the last ten years preceding 1853, of the various kinds of iron at the markets of production abroad and at home; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. BADGER presented the memorial of Asbury Dickins, praying to be allowed the difference between the compensation of chief clerk in the Treasury and State Departments, and that of the head of those Departments, during the time he performed the duties of head of those Departments respectively, under appointment by President Jackson; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of East Hamburg, New York, praying that the agricultural products of Canada may not be admitted into the United States free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, a memorial of citizens of New York, remonstrating against the renewal of Cyrus H. McCormick's patent for improvements in reaping machines; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Also, a petition of electors of the town of Smithfield, and a petition of electors of the town of Kingsbury, New York, remonstrating against a repeal of the Missouri compromise of 1820; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of electors of the town of Skaneateles, a petition of citizens of Hannibal, and a memorial of citizens of the town of Scio, New York, remonstrating against the passage of the bill, in its present form, to organize the Territory of Nebraska; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of citizens of Fabius, Onondaga county, New York, praying that the law organizing the Territory of Nebraska, may be so framed as to prohibit slavery therein; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, resolutions adopted at a meeting of the voters of Skaneateles, New York, held at Lyceum Hall, in that town, February 13, against the organization of the Territory of Nebraska, without a recognition of the validity and binding force of the Missouri compromise; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, resolutions adopted at a meeting of citizens of Seneca county, held in the town of Ovid, New York, protesting against all legislation tending to the introduction of slavery into any of the territories of the United States where it does not already exist; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, three petitions of the State of New Jersey, and a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of any bill which will permit slavery in the Territory of Nebraska, or infringe the eighth section of the Missouri compromise act of 1820; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EVERETT presented the petition of C. C. Beatty, executor of Reading Beatty, a surgeon in the revolutionary army, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the memorial of J. Randolph Clay, praying that a law may be passed to provide for the temporary relief of distressed and destitute American citizens, other than mariners, in foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, a petition of citizens of the town of Webster, Massachusetts, without distinction of party, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska, or the extension of the area of slavery; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FISH presented the memorial of Meigs D. Benjamin and others, merchants and citizens of New York, praying that the excess of duties paid by them on certain importations made by them under the tariffs of 1824 and 1828, may be refunded with interest; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, a petition of citizens of the county of Monroe, New York, praying that the bounty land laws may be so altered as to grant a hundred and sixty acres of land to each officer and soldier who was engaged in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, a petition of citizens of Dutchess county, New York, remonstrating against the passage of the Nebraska bill in its present form, or any other bill which may impair the validity of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Also, four petitions of citizens of Martinsburg, New York, praying that provision may be made in all treaties with foreign nations for referring to the decision of an umpire all questions that cannot be adjusted by amicable negotiation; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BENJAMIN presented the petition of Ralph King, late United States Consul at Bremen, praying compensation for services rendered the United States, during the years 1851, 1852, and 1853; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FOOT presented a petition of citizens of Hinesborough, Vermont, remonstrating against the passage of the bill, in its present form, to organize the Territory of Nebraska; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHASE presented the following petitions against the passage of the Nebraska bill, and praying that slavery and the slave trade may be abolished wherever the constitutional jurisdiction of Congress extends; which were ordered to lie on the table:

- Petition of citizens of New Concord, Ohio.
- Petition of citizens of Martinville, Ohio.
- Petition of citizens of Mahoning county, Ohio.
- Petition of the Kennett Monthly Meeting of the religious Society of Progressive Friends, in Chester county, Pennsylvania.
- Petition of citizens of Buffalo, Illinois.
- Petition of citizens of Morgan county, Ohio.
- Petition of citizens of Somerton, Ohio.

Also, a memorial of the Board of Trustees of the Protestant University of the United States in the State of Ohio, praying a grant of public land for the endowment of that institution; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON presented additional documents in relation to the claim of James Erwin, for himself and heirs of Daniel Greathouse, praying indemnity for losses sustained under contracts for subsisting emigrating Indians; which, with his petition on the files of the Senate, were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented twenty-three memorials of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that suitable accommodation may be provided for the post office and courts of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania; which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, a memorial signed by citizens of Montgomery county, and two petitions of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the repeal of the Missouri compromise act of 1820; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Also, twenty-nine petitions, numerous signed by citizens of Philadelphia, praying that the United States Mint now in that city may not be removed; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, a remonstrance of citizens of Philadelphia against the renewal of Woodworth's patent for a planing machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of William A. Cameron, praying the passage of an act for the settlement of the claims of John Denman and George Towley, of New Jersey, for cattle furnished by them for the use of the Army in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the memorial of H. D. Johnson, Delegate from the Territory of Nebraska, claiming for the people of that Territory the right to legislate for themselves on the subject of slavery, and that Congress should leave the question to the decision of their own choice; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented documents in relation to the claim of Lucinda Morrill, widow of Stephen Morrill, to a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BROWN presented a resolution of the Legislature of Mississippi, in favor of the establishment of a direct overland mail route from Grenada, Mississippi, to Memphis, Tennessee; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, additional documents in relation to the petition of Nannie Denman, widow of Lieutenant F. J. Denman; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of Hall J. Kelley, of Palmer, Massachusetts, setting forth his services in the colonization of the Territory of Oregon, and praying compensation therefor. He also prays that the matter may be submitted to a special committee. That I shall not attempt to ask, but move that it be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER also presented a petition of citizens of Cambridge, Massachusetts, praying the reduction of ocean postage to two cents for letters weighing not more than half an ounce; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, the following petitions protesting against the repeal of the eighth section of the Missouri compromise act, or the admission of more slave territory into the Union; which were ordered to lie on the table:

- Two petitions of inhabitants of Longmeadow, Massachusetts;
- Petition of citizens of Boston;
- Petition of citizens of Holliston, Massachusetts;
- Petition of citizens of Pennsylvania;
- Petition of the citizens of Keene and its vicinity, New Hampshire;
- Petition of Rev. James Johnston and others; and
- Petition of citizens of Ohio.

Also, a petition of William B. May and others, citizens of Massachusetts, praying the enactment of a law authorizing certain invalid pensioners of the United States, living in that State, to draw pensions from the date of the injury received in the public service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition of Lewis Elwell and others, of Northport, Maine, who were detained as prisoners-of-war in Dartmoor during the war of 1812, praying compensation for loss of health occasioned by their captivity; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a petition of citizens of Maine, praying that the benefits of the bounty land law may be extended to all who performed actual duty in any war of the United States since 1776; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Encas Munson be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. SLIDELL, it was Ordered, That the memorial of William H. Henderson be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion by Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Hudry be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore approved and signed two enrolled bills of the following titles:

- "An act for the relief of William Blake;" and
- "An act supplemental to an act entitled 'An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California,' approved March 3, 1851."

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. PETTIT, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph Smith, assignee of a certain land warrant, praying the right to locate a quantity of land therein described, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of John S. Wilson, praying remuneration for a quantity of land purchased of the United States, and of which he was dispossessed, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills from the House of Representatives, reported them back without amendment, with a recommendation that they pass:

- "An act for the relief of Mary Deany;"
- "An act for the relief of Aaron Stafford;" and
- "An act to provide a pension for Silas Champion, of Genesee, State of New York."

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of George Fitzsimmons, praying a pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Hezekiah Johnson, of the town of Bridgewater, in the State of Vermont, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills from the House of Representatives, reported them back without amendment, with a recommendation that they pass:

- "An act for the relief of Harriet Leavenworth, widow of the late Brevet Brigadier General Leavenworth."

"An act for the relief of William B. Edwards."

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Carlton, administratrix of Moses Carlton, a soldier in the revolutionary war, praying a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, for her relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the documents in the case of Leonard Procter, praying a pension, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Benjamin S. Roberts, praying remuneration for losses sustained in the Mexican war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Commander G. J. Pendergrast, praying remuneration for expenses incurred for medicines and medical aid, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of certain clerks in the Second Auditor's office, praying an increase of compensation, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, on the ground that one bill had been already passed for their relief, and that another was now under the consideration of a standing committee with the same object in view; which was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill to remove obstructions to navigation in the mouths of the Mississippi, at the Southwest Pass, and the Pass à l'Ouvert, reported it back with an amendment in the form of a substitute.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHIELDS asked, and obtained, the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill to constitute Cairo, in the State of Illinois, a port of delivery; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a bill to provide for the survey of the public lands in the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE SAN FRANCISCO.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, the Senate proceeded to consider the message from the House of Representatives announcing that they agreed to the first and third, and disagreed to the second, amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House for the relief of the United States troops who were sufferers by the recent disaster to the steamship San Francisco.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, the Senate insisted on their second amendment, and asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and, on his motion, it was ordered that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

HARBOR AND RIVER IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill for removing obstructions in the mouth of the Mississippi river, at the Southwest Pass, and the Pass à l'Ouvert, have directed me to report it with a substitute. As the bill contains but a single section, and is a matter of importance, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate now to take it up for consideration.

Mr. STUART. I shall have to ask my honorable friend to postpone the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SLIDELL. I hope the honorable Senator from Michigan will reconsider his determination to oppose the immediate passage of the bill. A bill appropriating an amount nearly as large, for a purpose much less important and much less national, passed the Senate the other day by unanimous consent, without even a report on the subject. I allude to a bill appropriating $200,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Cape Fear river. The bill just reported by my colleague for the removal of the obstructions in the passes of the Mississippi is one which, I presume, will command the unanimous consent of the Senate. I think there will be no objection to it. Unless, therefore, there be some special objection on the part of the Senator from Michigan, I hope he will waive his objection.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, if there is one thing more unpleasant to me than another, it is to interpose an objection when gentlemen with whom I agree in sentiment, or to whom I am opposed, desire to do a particular thing. But I will say, in a few words—for I cannot, of course, at this time be permitted to say much to the Senate—that I agree, in reference to these appropriations, with the gentlemen who are the most liberal under the powers conferred in the Constitution. But here is a fact that has met me in the face ever since I have had the honor of a seat in Congress, and members of this House, as well as of the other, ought to understand and contemplate it. The fact is, that there is a very considerable minority of Congress opposed to river and harbor improvements. The rules of the House of Representatives are such that that minority there can prevent, whenever they choose, the consideration of a single bill; that is, a bill having for its object a single appropriation only. Now, if the friends of harbor and river improvements mean to surrender the whole thing; if it is the sense of the Senate and of Congress to surrender the whole question to its opponents, they will fall into this snare of reporting separate bills; because just so long as they do that, and just so long as the rules of the House of Representatives remain as they are, one single bill cannot pass except as a matter of grace; and when you pass a bill as a matter of grace you exasperate all the remainder of the country that stands upon an equal footing; and it is for that reason that I signified, in the committee, my intention, both in and out of it, to oppose the passage of separate bills.

Let a bill be prepared, such a one as ought to be reported and presented—and I offered a resolution the other day with the view to instruct the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, if the House does not act in season, to report—and let us act upon it; and I may suggest, in view of some past legislation of the Senate, let us act with discretion and with prudence, and it can be passed, and ought to be passed. But if separate bills are considered, as I have said, they will be lost. And I will suggest to the Senate how they will be lost, and then I will consume no more time at present.

By the rules of the House of Representatives, appropriation bills are entitled to precedence over all other business. A bill making appropriations for rivers and harbors has been repeatedly adjudged by the House to fall within the provisions of the rule, and hence in Committee of the Whole the majority can take up that bill, whenever they choose to act upon it, and pass it. A separate bill clearly is not within the rule; it goes upon the Calendar; and inasmuch as the discussion in that body in Committee of the Whole permits the member speaking to discuss anything he chooses, the result is that everything except the subject under consideration is discussed during the whole Congress; and separate bills of this character, or any other, are not reached.

I will state a fact. A bill was reported quite early in the first session of the last Congress in the House of Representatives to provide for an appropriation in money to construct the St. Mary's Canal; and although the first session of that Congress was nine months long, and we also sat the constitutional time of the second session, we did not get within sixty of that bill.

It will be recollected by the Senator from Mississippi, who was then a member of the House, [Mr. BROWN,] that the chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals reported separate bills for improving the rivers early in the session, among the very first bills that were reported at the first session of the last Congress, and we never came near one of them during the whole year; and I say now, what I have frequently said in that House, that if Congress were to sit nine years continuously, with the rules of that House as they stand, a minority opposed to river and harbor improvements can prevent you from reaching a separate bill. My object, therefore—and it is said with the utmost friendship to my friends from Louisiana and to this measure—is simply, at the proper time, to call the attention of the Senate to these facts; and if the Senate decide the question against me, decide to surrender the whole question of river and harbor improvements, I certainly shall not oppose it; but, as at present advised, I cannot consent to the consideration of this bill until we can have time to take up the question and consider it.

Mr. BELL. I wish to add a few words to the considerations which have been suggested by the honorable Senator from Michigan. Under the circumstances and influences which exist in regard to a river and harbor bill—I will not specify what they are—at the present session of Congress, I foresaw, at a very early day, that probably, unless the Committee on Commerce of the Senate should take up this subject, which I think it is their bounden duty to do, we should have no harbor and river appropriations during the session; and I agree with the views presented by the honorable Senator from Michigan: if we attempt to get these bills for certain specific, very important, and indispensable objects—and such an object I know this to be, which is presented by the Senator from Louisiana—one after another, it will be a death-blow to any but some particular favored ones; and I doubt whether even those will get through.

There is another reason which I hope will influence the Senate. I did not know, indeed, that there was a resolution pending on the subject, but I hope to-morrow morning the Senate will take up that resolution, and instruct the Committee on Commerce to report a general bill of this description; for it is not only highly expedient, if we mean to direct attention to these appropriations, and to these great and valuable objects, that the Senate committee shall report a bill, and that it shall pass through both Houses, but it is also highly important that it should be done at an early period of the session.

We appropriated some $2,000,000 last Congress to various objects of more or less importance—some of very little, to be sure, but a great number were highly important improvements—and they are in a half finished condition. If we let these bills lag along and wait upon the House of Representatives until they report their bill, at a late period in the session, when we shall have to hurry it through near the close of the session of Congress, which I think I foresee will be some time in the month of September, or in all probability in October, a great portion of the appropriations, and of the valuable works which have been commenced under them, will be wholly lost; and the works only commenced will be in a state of dilapidation and decay, swept away by storms or floods, for want of a continuation of the work. We not only want the appropriation, but we want it at an early period of the session. Whatever appropriations we propose to make, if it be the will of both Houses to make any, ought to be passed before the spring opens, so that the works may be recommenced. I hope, therefore, the honorable Senator from Michigan will not fail, to-morrow morning or next day, to move for the consideration of his resolution.

Mr. STUART. I intend to do it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I shall withdraw my request for the consideration of the bill, and join the honorable Senators from Michigan and Tennessee to get the action of the Senate upon the subject of river and harbor improvements, in the way of an instruction to the Committee on Commerce.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. ALLEN. The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom were referred the resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan in relation to claims for lands, have directed me to report a bill appointing commissioners to ascertain certain facts relative to private land claims in Michigan, and to ask for its consideration at this time. It meets with the approbation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The bill was read twice by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to appoint the register and receiver of the Detroit land office commissioners to ascertain, under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, what title to lands lying within the Territory of Michigan were confirmed by the commissioners in their several reports to the Secretary of the Treasury, which are not covered by any act of confirmation of Congress, and for which patents have not been issued; and that they shall take an oath, or affirmation, faithfully to perform the duties prescribed in "An act appointing commissioners to ascertain certain facts relative to private land claims in the Territory of Michigan."

It proposes to direct, further, that it shall extend to claimants to land the title to which was confirmed by previous commissioners, and to which the claimants did not receive any conveyance from the United States, and to claimants to land the title to which was confirmed by the commissioners, and who received a patent from the United States for a less quantity of acres than was confirmed; with the provision, however, that it shall not extend to claimants who received a patent from the United States for lands included within the metes and bounds set forth in their application or in the confirmation of the commissioners, or who received other lands equal in quantity; that the claimants shall, within one year from the passage of the bill, give specific notices of their claims to the commissioner, minutes of which notices, and all subsequent proceedings, with the evidence in each case, shall be entered by the register in a book kept for the purpose; that the commissioner shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses, administer oaths, and have access to all records of the United States that may be necessary in their investigations; and that within two years after the passage of the bill, they shall furnish a certified transcript of their proceedings and the evidence, together with their opinion, upon the merits of each case, to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who shall immediately thereafter lay them before Congress, with his recommendation thereon.

Mr. GWIN. What is that bill?

Mr. STUART. I will state to the Senator, that it is for the purpose of enabling the Land Office Department to ascertain certain facts respecting private land claims in the eastern part of our State, with a view to their being properly adjusted. It is a preliminary movement to enable the Land Office to ascertain the facts in the case.

Mr. GWIN. It makes no settlement?

Mr. STUART. Oh, no; it is only with a view of getting the facts to enable a proper disposition to be made afterwards.

Mr. PETTIT. The bill was drawn under my direction and advice. It does not give away or dispose of an acre of land. It only authorizes the appointment of commissioners, which is necessary to enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to know where certain lands lie, and how much of them there are, and to direct them to report, in order that patents may be issued.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

CAPITOL EXTENSION.

Mr. BAYARD. The Committee on Public Buildings, to whom was referred the joint resolution from the House, authorizing a supplemental contract for certain marble for the Capitol extension, have directed me to report it back without amendment, and with a recommendation in favor

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 29.

of its passage; and I am also instructed to ask for its immediate consideration.

The Senate accordingly proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to direct the President of the United States to cause a supplemental contract to be made with the contractors for marble for the Capitol extension, and to procure the columns and ashlar in larger blocks than are required by the specification of their present contract.

Mr. BAYARD. The reason for asking the immediate consideration of the resolution which passed the House last week, is, that it is necessary, for the construction of the Capitol, if the alteration of the contract is to be made in the size of the blocks used for the purpose of construction, that it should be passed at once. The ground on which it is asked is, that, in making the original contract, the quarry from which the marble was to be taken had been just opened; it was not known, or was not supposed, that blocks of the size which will be requisite to make the columns for the Capitol would be obtained; and the contract, therefore, stipulated for furnishing the blocks, which would require six pieces to each column.

The Superintendent is of opinion, and I have no doubt correctly, that the effect of the change upon the columns, either as regards beauty or permanence, will be far more than any increase of cost arising from the purchase. The other alteration of the contract which is contemplated is in the enlargement of the size of the blocks which form the face of the Capitol. As it now stands, the width and depth of some of these blocks, it appears from a drawing exhibited by the Superintendent, are nine inches; and under the contract, as originally made, the contractor refuses to deliver them in that width at the prices which the contract would call for. It is believed that the permanence of the building, its facing and durability, require the blocks to be six inches; and in order to obtain that, it is necessary that a supplemental contract should be made.

I will state generally that the increase of cost, according to the estimate of the Superintendent, arising out of these alterations, tending to the greater permanence and beauty of the structure, will be somewhere about $148,000.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

ISAAC BOWMAN.

On the motion of Mr. JONES, of Iowa, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution reported from the Committee on Pensions:

Resolved, That the claim of Isaac Bowman, legal representative of Isaac Bowman, deceased, for half pay due his father under the act of the General Assembly of Virginia of May —, 1790, be referred to the Secretary of the Interior for liquidation under the act of Congress of July 5th, 1832, and that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from further consideration of the case.

The resolution was agreed to.

RAILROAD BILLS.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am not familiar with the rules of the Senate, but I will suggest that various railroad bills were assigned as special orders for to-day. I wish them to preserve their preference on the Calendar, and I presume it will be enough now to take them up and make them the special order for to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The Chair will suggest, that in his judgment, that is entirely unnecessary. They do not lose their order on the Calendar, although they are not taken up on the day assigned.

INDIAN TERRITORIES.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill to establish and organize the Territories of Chahlahkee, Muscogee, and Chahta. I desire to have the bill read twice and referred to the Committee on Territories, and to ask also that it be printed. That, I presume, will be done, and I wish then to have a further step taken in regard to it, which I will submit to the Senate.

Leave was granted to introduce the bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

It proposes to enact that, in order more fully to extend the protection of the Constitution and laws of the United States over the Cherokee, Muscogee or Creek, Seminole, Choctaw, and Chickasaw nations of Indians, and to enable them to advance civilization, and hereafter to become citizens of the United States, all that portion of country west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, included within certain limits, as follows: Beginning at a point on the old western territorial line of Arkansas Territory, being twenty-five miles north from the point where the said territorial line crosses the Arkansas river; thence running from said north point south on the said territorial line to the point where it crosses the Verdigris river; thence down said Verdigris river to the Arkansas river; thence down said Arkansas river to a point where a stone was placed in the year 1833, opposite the east or lower bank of the Neosho or Grand river, at its junction with the Arkansas; thence running south 44° west, one mile; thence in a straight line to a point four miles northerly from the mouth of the north fork of the Canadian river; thence along the said four mile line to the Canadian river; thence down the Canadian river to the Arkansas river; thence down the Arkansas river to that point on the same where the eastern Choctaw boundary line strikes said river; thence running with the western boundary line of the State of Arkansas to the southwest corner of Missouri; thence along said western boundary line of Missouri to the lands assigned to the Senecas; thence on the south line of the Senecas to Grand river; thence up Grand river to the northwest corner of the lands of the Senecas and Shawnees; thence along the northern boundary line of those lands to the western boundary line of Missouri; thence with said western boundary line of Missouri to the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude; thence with that parallel of latitude to the one hundredth parallel of west longitude; thence with that parallel to where it crosses the northern line of Texas; thence with that line to the one hundred and third parallel of west longitude; thence with that parallel of longitude to where it crosses the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude; thence with that parallel of latitude to where it crosses the one hundredth parallel of west longitude; thence with said parallel of longitude to a point on the same, due west from the place of beginning; and thence due east to the place of beginning, shall be with the assent of the Cherokee nation of Indians, to be obtained in a manner specified in the bill, erected into a special and qualified Territory of the United States, to be called the Territory of Chahlahkee; and that all that portion of country south and west of said Territory, bounded on the north and east by said Territory, on the south by the Canadian river, and on the west by the one hundredth parallel of west longitude, shall be, with the assent of the Muscogee or Creek, and the Seminole Indians, erected into a Territory of the United States, to be called Muscogee; and that all that portion of country west of the State of Arkansas, bounded on the east by Arkansas, on the north by the Territories of Chahlahkee and Muscogee, on the west by the one hundredth parallel of west longitude, and on the south by Red river, shall be, with the assent of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, erected into a Territory to be called Chahta.

Mr. JOHNSON. This bill has been prepared with a great deal of care, after some conversation and consultation with the members of the Committee on Territories. The design of the bill, is, if possible, to solve what has always been a very grave and a very serious and difficult question with the Government and people of the United States; that is, as to what shall be the fate of the unfortunate aborigines of this country—what the destiny and the end of our Indian tribes.

It proposes to give them some description of government, simplified as much as may be, which shall tend to elevate them in the scale of civilization, and which will hold out to them inducements to use and improve upon the civilization which they already have, to such a degree that they may ultimately become citizens of the United States, and be vested with the highest rights of self-government. The object of the bill will be seen at once by this statement.

The tribes to which this bill relates are now highly civilized for Indians, and are the only tribes on the continent of America, that I know of, where this experiment could be fairly tried; for, of course, this is as yet but an experiment. In order that the intelligence of these tribes may consider and scan this bill, I ask that a thousand additional copies of it may be printed. The object is, that a certain portion of the printed copies may be distributed amongst each one of the tribes, so that their chief men may have time to examine the provisions of the bill, and report back to us such objections as they may find to it, and such improvements as they themselves may think would be for their best interests.

I ask, therefore for the printing of a thousand additional copies to be used in that way.

It is a subject that will address itself with peculiar interest to the benevolent and humane in every nook and corner of this prosperous, powerful, and happy country. It is in discharge of a debt we all acknowledge, in fulfillment of a duty to a much and long injured race of people, that ought to be, and I trust is, a matter of conscience throughout the land.

If the effort now proposed be successful, it will show to the world that the vast sums appropriated by the Government of the United States, and advanced and expended by the benevolent societies of our people, to aid in educating and civilizing these suffering people, have not been thrown away.

If successful, liberty and christianity, good government, and individual advancement in all that makes life desirable, will have been achieved for the unfortunate, consolation and encouragement for the benevolent and conscientious, and a settled policy for the Government, (where now there is none,) that shall atone in some degree for wrongs that are innumerable, and oppressions unequaled in the history of all the world beside. I have unlimited and abiding faith in its success.

The PRESIDENT. The motion now go to the Committee on Printing, unless by unanimous consent the reference be dispensed with.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have the question taken now.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. PETTIT. Before proceeding in my remarks, and as prefatory to them, I desire to read a short dispatch that has just reached me:

"The Baltic has arrived with Liverpool dates of the 8th instant. Count Orloff's mission has failed, and the Russian ministers have left Paris and London. The Czar's last proposition has been finally rejected, and all further negotiations broken off. England and France are making extensive preparations to send troops to Turkey. Unless the Czar speedily withdraws, a general war is certain."

Mr. President, I return, this morning, my sincere, devout, and humble thanks to the Ruler of all nations that our beloved country is not involved in that dire catastrophe—war. Long may we be spared such a calamity.

He then proceeded to speak on the bill before the Senate and occupied its attention for three hours. A report of his speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CASS. I gave way to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, but I want a few minutes for explanation. I do not like to sleep upon this matter. I am not going to imitate the dogmatical manner or the coarseness of language of the honorable Senator from Indiana. My respect for the Senate and myself—not for that Senator—prohibit. Every member of the Senate who knows me knows that very well; but there are some things which he has said to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. It is necessary to the proper understanding of my position; and, therefore, I should desire the attention of the Senate either to-night or to-morrow morning.

Several Senators. To-morrow morning.

Mr. CASS. I would rather go on now.

Several Senators. Go on! go on!

Mr. SUMNER. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. CASS. I prefer to go on, and I shall not detain the Senate long. The Senator from Indiana has made a most extraordinary speech. He says he has reflected upon it, and that the fire has burned within him, I think, for about four years, apparently wholly smothered. Well, sir, it has finally come out, something after the manner of a volcano—with a great explosion, but a very harmless one. I did not suppose he had nursed it up so long; and, under all the circumstances, the view which the honorable Senator has taken is wonderful, indeed. The Senator admits he did say that Congress had power to sell the people of the Territories into slavery. If I had said that in the American Senate, I should be in a great passion with myself, as he evidently is, and not being willing to turn upon myself, I should turn upon somebody else. It was a most extraordinary sentiment, atrocious, indeed. Now, what were the circumstances under which I referred to it? Two years preceding my speech on which the Senator commented I wrote a letter, which is somewhat known, I presume, to every Senator, and has, in a measure, become historical, in which I went into the consideration of the constitutional power of Congress over the Territories. The Senator, a few months after that letter was written, when I was not here, reviewed the doctrine I advocated in the severest terms, using such epithets as "silliness," and "absurdity," and others of a similar character, applying them to those who advocated the same position which I maintained. Knowing perfectly that I had advocated it, how could I suppose but that he meant his remarks to apply to me? The first opportunity I had after I returned here I took up the question connected with the government of the Territories, and in so doing, I turned over the Congressional Globe, and reviewed all that had been said upon the subject.

Why, sir, any man who has heard the Senator from Indiana to-day would have supposed that I had picked him out, and that he was the only person to whose opinions I had alluded. I went over the history of the whole matter, in my examination, in order to ascertain the views of the respective speakers, and the foundation upon which they placed the assumed power of Congress to govern the Territories. My own colleague was one of them, and he will recollect the circumstances perfectly well. I did review them all. I quoted their language, in order; in the first place, to show these assumed grounds, and then, subsequently, to show that, in my opinion, there was no power in the Constitution of the United States giving the right to Congress to govern the Territories. That was my conclusion. Among these was the Senator from Indiana; and I was far more struck with the unjustifiable sentiments he advanced than by the strength of the argument he displayed. I commented upon them, as I had a right to do. And it is among the extraordinary perversions of human nature to witness the spirit displayed by the Senator four years after the occurrence, at this very common procedure.

But, sir, the Senator says I said this when he was absent. And does he suppose he can shoot a speech like a Parthian arrow, and then place himself beyond reach of observation? The gentleman left his speech here. It was a public document, among the Congressional archives of the nation. It had gone out to the country, to the knowledge of the American people. Because he was not here, was his doctrine never to be reviewed? It was no personal matter; it was the speech of a member of the House of Representatives of the United States. I found it in the Congressional Globe. It laid down constitutional doctrines in which I did not believe. I will ask any man, within the hearing of my voice, if this was not a proper ground of criticism and of examination? and I appeal to every Senator to look at my speech, and see whether I did not examine it in a proper spirit. There is no question but that I had a right so to do, and he has no right to reproach me for having performed this duty.

The gentleman examined, in my absence, the doctrines which I had advocated, and, though he did not use my name, no man can doubt, who knows the history of the country, that I must have been one of the persons in his mental eye at the time he was so prolific in his denunciations. It could not have been otherwise.

As to the general power and jurisdiction of Congress over the Territories, I am not going to argue that now. I have done that before. I leave others to judge. I must confess I am better pleased with my work since I have seen the temper in which it has been received by the Senator. He who is right generally preserves his self-balance. I will say, however, a few words, in consequence of the positive tone and apparent self-complacency in which the Senator asserted he had established his position beyond doubt. How has he established it? Why he has established it by loose and general references and implications. He supposes the power of acquisition to include the power of government. This is a non sequitur. We may organize governments without the least necessity for regulating the internal affairs of the people. Those should be left to themselves. When you acquire territory there is a moral necessity for the organization of government. That you may do as a matter of necessity. But there the necessity and your power stops, and from that point the right of the people to exercise the power of self-government commences. The two powers of external organization and of internal regulation are as different as two political principles can be, and he who does not understand the difference, does not understand the doctrine of our fathers, and their separation from England.

Now, Mr. President, I will ask any Senator here to put his finger upon that clause in the Constitution which gives Congress the power to regulate the internal affairs of the Territories. You cannot find anything like it from the beginning to the end of that instrument. You find the power to regulate and "dispose of" the "territory and other property belonging to the United States;" but what has the Supreme Court said about that provision? That the word "territory" in that part of the Constitution means land, and the power is, in other words, the power to regulate and dispose of the public lands; and I ask any man if that includes the power of political jurisdiction, the power of life and death, over all the inhabitants living there? The power to dispose of the land, upon the construction of the Senator, gives a political jurisdiction over all the concerns of life, and all that makes life desirable—the right to sell land gives the right to sell the people into slavery. Never under the Government of Turkey or Russia was such a power conveyed in such language.

The Senator says that Judge Marshall so decided. He did in some measure intimate such an opinion; but the Senator quotes Judge Marshall's words, and most singular they are; showing great doubts upon the subject—and any candid man on examination will say so. What does he say in the very words which have been quoted? Why, that whatever may be the foundation of the power, the United States unquestionably possess it. Is that in the usual manner of that clear-sighted, and clear-spoken man, when he saw the subject before him without doubt? No; it in fact abandons the question of right, as not to be maintained, and places the exercise of power upon possession only. And the Senator repeats the same view, and says, no matter where the power came from, the United States have got it. Is it no matter, in this Government of limited power, where Congress gets its authority? Has Congress nothing to do but to exercise any powers which it may lay its hands upon, and then justify the possession by the usurpation? That certainly is a most reprehensible and dangerous doctrine. I must again say, however, that I could never understand how the Court—after determining that the word "territory" in the clause, giving Congress power to make all needful rules and regulations in the territory, and other property of the United States, meant "land," and that it was only a power to regulate lands—could decide that this Government had full power of life and death over the people of the Territories.

The Senator says that I am arraigning all the people to whom he referred, dead and living, judges, legislators, and many other characters.

What kind of an argument is that? I acknowledge the value of precedents; I am not bound by them, indeed, but I acknowledge them as reasonable evidence of the proper meaning of the Constitution; but is that any reason why I should not examine their truth and foundation? In a Government like this, of written and limited powers, they are less authoritative than in any other, for we have always our great charter to fall back upon. The Senator has yet to learn one of the main principles of the Democratic faith, and that is, that no precedent supersedes the Constitution. The repeated decisions in favor of the right to establish a bank do not weigh a straw with the Democratic party, and they reject the doctrine and the usurpation. I submit, with all possible resignation, to this solemn arraignment repeated so often by the Senator, and which he seemed to consider a kind of death stroke.

With respect to this question of jurisdiction, Mr. Madison said that the Congress of the Confederation, which exercised a similar power, did it without a shadow of authority. He examined the point, and decided that its exercise was unconstitutional. I think the Senator had better include him in his formal arraignment, as he has attacked me for following humbly in his footsteps.

As to the general question of jurisdiction, how does this question stand? One gentleman gets up and contends that Congress have the power, because they are sovereign; another, because they may make acquisitions, and then must govern them; a third, because they are owners, and so on, to the end of the chapter. There are, in fact, no less than twelve reasons which have been given in favor of this power; and under what kind of a Government is it that this authority is thus claimed? Under a Government of limited powers; of powers which cannot be executed unless you find them in the Constitution expressly or by necessary implication; yet we hear gentlemen saying here that the United States are sovereign, and therefore may govern the Territories. Put your finger, I repeat, on the clause of the Constitution which gives the power. That is the place to find it to the law and to the testimony. But you cannot find it there. You may be sovereign or subordinate, dependent or independent, and these considerations are not worth a cent in such an inquiry as this. The Constitution alone is your guide, and should be your rule. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] the other day committed the same error in maintaining that, because under certain circumstances, you may establish a government for a Territory, you may do everything; you may usurp jurisdiction over all their internal concerns. How easy does power seek to extend itself! for just so said the British Government to our fathers.

They declared "that his Majesty in Parliament has the right, by statute, to bind the colonies in all cases whatsoever." And what said the patri-archs of the Revolution to this tyrannical edict? "You have no such right. We grant you the right of regulating our exterior concerns; but when you come to our homes to touch our domestic concerns we deny your right, and will resist you." And they did. And I tell the Senator from Indiana, after all he has said, that Congress has never gone to that length. Congress has regulated the exterior relations of the Territories; and you will observe, that when you put this power on the only true foundation, the foundation on which Mr. Madison put the action of the Congress of the Confederation, as a matter of necessity arising under the circumstances, you are bound to go no further than the necessity requires. That is the true doctrine. Does necessity require you to regulate the domestic concerns of the Territories? No, sir; and the best evidence is, that you have never done so but in one instance. The only case of direct intermeddling with the internal concerns of a Territory by Congress has been in regard to the institution of slavery.

I do not speak of the outlines for their government. Men may well differ as to whether a Territory should have three or four judges, or how long they shall hold their terms of office, or shall be voters, or on many others similar questions. I willingly admit that men may differ as to how far you may go in the execution of your necessary power, or to what extent you shall be limited. I, perhaps, should differ from many on this question; but there is a point beyond which you cannot pass; beyond which you have no constitutional, no moral, no legal right to pass; and that is, when you enter the houses of the people of the Territories, and touch their domestic altars, and their firesides. There you have no right to go. You have no constitutional power to go there, and you are forbidden by the laws of God. This right of self-government is an inalienable right of the people, consecrated by the blood of our fathers, and hallowed by the affection of their sons. Sir, you cannot interfere with it, nor can anybody else. This is the error of the Senator from Indiana: That because some power is necessary, therefore, all power may be exercised. And his defense of this doctrine—that there is no danger of the power being abused—is contradicted by all human experience, and in the very face of all the efforts of the American people, to limit, by constitutions, the authority granted to their servants. He will find it difficult to make his constituents believe that unlimited power may safely be granted to any one.

Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate any longer upon this subject. The Senator from Indiana has evinced very bad temper, I must say. He said a great deal which, if he does not regret, his best friends will regret for him. I think my review of his former speech was a very fair one. If I were to prepare it now, perhaps I should not use every term I then employed. It may be, that supposing I was aimed at, as I yet suppose I was, that feeling may be apparent in some of my expressions. But be that as it may, everything I said had relation to the discussion and to the arguments only, nor was there anything in them which did not fairly arise out of the circumstances, or which should give offense to any one.

Mr. SUMNER obtained the floor, and on his motion the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 20, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of Friday was read.

CORRECTION OF JOURNAL.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I merely wish to say that the Journal of Friday is not made up in accordance with the facts as they occurred here. I got up and demanded a division of the House upon the question of adjourning till Monday. The Journal correctly states that when the motion to adjourn over was taken no quorum was present. And when it was subsequently taken, and there having been no ascertainment of the question whether there was a quorum present, I arose in my seat, and, addressing the Speaker pro tempore, [Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania,] demanded a division of the House upon the question, in order to ascertain whether there was a quorum, without which the House could not adjourn over. That fact does not appear upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state whether he was recognised by the Chair?

Mr. JONES. The yeas and nays were called for, and refused. Tellers were called for, and refused. I then called for a division of the House, that we might see whether a sufficient number was present to adjourn over. The gentleman from the Lexington district, Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE,] if I recollect right, asked the Chair what the question was. The Chair stated that I made a call for a division, and I think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. B.] told the Chair to put the question, and to put it quick. He did so, and decided that the yeas had it, and that it was too late to call for a division.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make a motion upon the subject?

Mr. JONES. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker was not in the chair at the time of the occurrence alluded to, and can only be governed by the records of the House before him.

Mr. JONES. The Journal shows who was in the chair at the time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make a motion to amend the Journal?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; I only wish to state the facts.

PRE-EMPTION PRIVILEGES IN CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Public

Lands was being called for reports before the House last adjourned, and the gentleman from California [Mr. LATHAM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred Senate bill No. 124, entitled "An act for the extension of the preemption privilege in California," have instructed me to report it back to the House, with an amendment, and a recommendation of its passage. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to say a word, in reporting this bill to the House, explanatory of its character. By the third proviso of the sixth section of an act passed March 3, 1853, the preemption privilege was extended in California to the unsurveyed lands, and for the period of one year. The same anomalous condition of the public lands in that State which authorized the granting of this privilege still exists. And the bill I now report, which passed the Senate and the Committee on Public Lands unanimously, merely asks for the extension of this right of preemption on the unsurveyed lands of California, for the period of two years from the 3d of March next. It will be some time yet before the public lands can be surveyed, and, of course, until the provisions of the preemption law of 1841 can be made applicable. I will also state that since the right of preemption was given on the unsurveyed lands in California, settlements and improvements have been made of a permanent character, and a population is there settling whose interests are identified with the soil, and who constitute the strength and power of that country.

I ask, sir, in behalf of my State, and in behalf of her energetic people, and in behalf of her future agricultural prosperity, that this House will now act upon this bill. The right of preemption on the unsurveyed lands ceases in that State on the third March next, and unless some provision, like the one contained in this bill, is made, all that confusion of claims and title will ensue which has too often resulted in bloodshed. When the House recollects that out of the 93,622,400 acres of land, as is estimated by the Surveyor General to be in that State, there are 52,000,000 acres of mineral lands, 19,000,000 acres that cannot be irrigated, and of course not cultivated, 2,629,000 acres of swamp land, leaving but about 20,000,000 acres of agricultural lands, between 10,000,000 and 11,000,000 of which are claimed under large Spanish grants, they can see the strongest reason why the General Government should use every reasonable means to facilitate permanent settlements in that country.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (interrupting.) I desire to inquire of the gentleman if his bill proposes the establishment of any new privilege other than the extension of the right already granted?

Mr. LATHAM. It only proposes the extension of rights already granted. It asks no appropriation of money, and establishes no new principle.

Mr. WASHBURN. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say I am in favor of the most liberal appropriations to California, and that I have no objection to the passage of the bill at this time.

Mr. LATHAM, (resuming.) In addition, Mr. Speaker, I will only add, that so remote is my State from the General Government, that it takes months for the people to get information of a law of this kind being passed by Congress, and the provisions of the third proviso of the sixth section of the law of the 3d of March, 1853, is now but generally known, when it is about to cease; I think the House will not hesitate to pass at once this law, which calls for no appropriation, the establishment of no new principle, and upon the passage of which depends, in a great degree, the prosperity and the development of the true wealth of my State. I therefore move that the bill be read a third time, and put upon its passage, and on that motion I call the previous question.

The bill was then read through, as follows, by the Clerk.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the 4th of September, 1841, granting preemption rights to settlers on the public lands, as modified and made applicable to the State of California, by the act of the 3d of March, 1853, shall be further modified, so far as such claims apply to lands subject to private entry, by granting to each settler in said State who is entitled to preemption under said laws, an extension of time for the com-menement of his or her settlement as the period within which proof of right and payment shall be made for the lands claimed as aforesaid; and the third proviso in the sixth section of the aforesaid act of the 3d of March, 1853, shall be so modified, as to extend said rights to settlements made prior to and within two years after the passage of this bill.

The following amendments, reported by the Committee on Public Lands, were then reported, as follows:

Strike out from the word "so" in the third line to the word "and" in the seventeenth line inclusive. Strike out from the word "shall" in the twentieth line to the word "rights" in the twenty-first line, and insert after the word "modified" in the ninth line the words "by extending the provisions of," so as to read:

That the provisions of the 4th of September, 1841, granting preemption rights to settlers on the public lands, as modified and made applicable to the State of California by the act of the 3d of March, 1853, shall be further modified, by extending the provisions of the third proviso in the sixth section of the aforesaid act of the 3d of March, 1853, to settlements made prior to and within two years after the passage of this act.

Mr. LATHAM. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question being first upon the adoption of the amendments, it was taken; and, upon a division, there were—ayes 71, noes not counted.

Mr. RICHARDSON demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. RICHARDSON and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 105, noes 16.

So the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and having been engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LATHAM. I move that the vote by which the bill passed be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The question was put, and the latter motion agreed to.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. I want to know what is the regular order of business? I call for the regular order, whatever it is.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is precisely what the House is now engaged in. The call of committees for reports has commenced, and further reports are in order from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. EWING. I rise to a privileged question. In view of the fact that the time allowed for debate in Committee of the Whole on the homestead bill is almost expired, I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I hope not; I hope the committees will be allowed to make their reports.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is not of such a privileged character as will permit him to take the floor from the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WARREN] for that purpose.

Mr. EWING. I tried to get the floor before it was awarded to the gentleman from Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Kentucky was not recognized by the Chair.

CHANGE OF THE BOUNTY LAND LAW.

Mr. WARREN. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back House bill (No. 56) proposing to change the bounty land laws, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

I am also instructed to report adversely upon twenty-two petitions from the State of Pennsylvania, asking for a like change in that law, with the recommendation that they be laid upon the table.

I also ask, in behalf of the committee, that a communication from the Secretary of the Interior upon the same subject may be considered as a part of their report; showing, as it does, the reasons which induced the committee to come to the conclusion they have, and that it be also laid upon the table, and printed.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to make a motion.

The SPEAKER. No motion is in order while the gentleman from Arkansas is upon the floor, and until the business before the House has been disposed of.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is it not in order to make a motion with reference to the business before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear any motion the gentleman has to make.

Mr. FLORENCE. If I understood the gentleman from Arkansas, he reported back the bill, which was introduced on my motion at an early part of the session, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. WARREN. That is the bill I have reported back.

Mr. FLORENCE. And also a communication from the Secretary of the Interior upon the same subject. I desire to debate the question, if it is in order to do so.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable, a motion being made to lay the report upon the table. The Chair announced that it would be so ordered. It is not so ordered, however, as opposition is made to the motion, and a vote of the House will be taken upon the question, but it is not debatable.

Mr. FLORENCE. Can I move to recommit the report? Is not that debatable?

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit will be in order when the motion to lay on the table has been disposed of; but that motion being highly privileged, cuts off the motion to recommit.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas will be good enough to withdraw the motion to lay on the table, and let it be an open question for the present. I take strong exception to the conclusion that the Secretary of the Interior arrives at in relation to the subject-matter, so far as I can understand it; and I desire to review that report, if I can have an opportunity of doing so, at some not very distant day.

Mr. DEAN. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas will withdraw his motion.

Mr. WARREN. I am perfectly willing to place this question in such a position that gentlemen may be heard. I do not care to press the motion to lay the report on the table.

Mr. DEAN. I would suggest that the report be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed.

Mr. WARREN. I withdraw the motion to lay the report on the table; and gentlemen can dispose of it as they please.

Mr. COBB. I wish to know if the gentleman withdraws the motion of his own will, or under the influence of those around him?

Mr. WARREN. I will give my reasons for it. I do it because I feel conscious that the committee have acted right in making the report, and will be able to sustain it; and I am willing that the subject shall be fully debated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the report is an adverse one. Is any motion made in regard to it?

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What is the subject of the report?

The SPEAKER. It is an adverse report on a bill referred to the Committee on Public Lands, "extending the provisions of the several laws granting bounty lands to the officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," and on sundry petitions on the same subject. The committee submit a communication from the Secretary of the Interior as their report, which will be read.

The Clerk read the communication, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, January 18, 1854.

SIR: On the 23d ultimo you inclosed to me "A bill extending the provisions of the several laws granting bounty lands to the officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," with the request that I would give my opinion as to the effect of the passage of the same, and the probable amount of lands that would be disposed of by virtue thereof. I now have the honor to return it, with the result of the examination and consideration which have been bestowed upon the subject.

The words "provisions of the several laws granting bounty lands to the officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," used in this bill, construed in their most comprehensive sense, would embrace all the bounty land laws ever passed; but I have supposed that it was not intended to revise and extend the laws which granted bounty land for revolutionary services, or those giving land to persons who enlisted for five years in the war of 1812, and that the real object of the bill was limited to the acts of February 11, 1847, September 28, 1850, and March 22, 1852.

I have further supposed that the terms "State troops called into service by State authority," as coupled with the qualification contained in the act of March 22, 1852, and as embracing only those whose services were recognized and paid for by the General Government subsequent to the 18th of September, 1812.

With this understanding of the object of the bill, I find that it makes provision for four classes of beneficiaries, viz:

First. All those persons who served in the war of 1812, the Mexican war, and the various Indian wars since 1790, in the capacity of teamsters, wagoners, warrant officers of the staff, artificers, and laborers of the ordnance corps.

Second. All the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, mariners, and marines, who were engaged in the naval, revenue, marine, gun-boat, or flotilla service, or in defense of the coast, or a part thereof, or who may have been taken captive by the enemy, and remained either in captivity or on parole, in any and all the wars referred to.

Third. The heirs-at-law of those persons who, having served in said wars, have died without receiving bounty land, and who have not left relatives who are entitled on account of their services under the provisions of either of the aforesaid acts.

Fourth. All those persons who were formerly widows of soldiers who served in those wars, and who have married and become, or who may become, widows again.

From the best data obtained, it is estimated that the number of effective men who were engaged in the various wars to which the bill under consideration applies, is about 608,117. It is supposed that teamsters, wagoners, warrant officers of the staff, artificers, and laborers of the ordnance corps, form about one tenth part of the effective military force. This would give, as embraced in the first class, 60,811. It is supposed that the number of persons embraced in the second class is not less than 50,000.

The whole number of warrants already issued to persons serving in these various wars, is 302,039, which, deducted from the entire military force engaged in them, will leave 306,078 persons to be provided for, and supposing that of this number 6,078 are provided for by existing laws, there will remain to be embraced by the third class about 300,000.

Of the fourth class it is supposed there may be about 1,000, but as the cases in which they would take are estimated in the third class, they would not increase the aggregate number of persons provided for by the bill.

Besides these several new classes of beneficiaries, this bill gives to all those persons who are entitled to, or who have received lands under existing laws, such additional quantity as will amount to 160 acres each.

The number of persons who have received warrants for eighty acres each, and who will consequently be entitled to an additional eighty acres, is about 55,000.

The number who have received warrants for forty acres, and who will be entitled to an additional one hundred and twenty acres each, is about 109,000.

Upon these hypotheses, the quantity of land which would be disposed of, were this bill to become a law, is as follows:

To class No. 1, containing 60,811 persons, at 160 acres each.....	9,729,760 acres.
To class No. 2, containing 50,000 persons, at 160 acres each.....	8,000,000 "
To class No. 3, (which also includes the number in class No. 4,) containing 300,000 persons, at 160 acres each.....	48,000,000 "
To 55,000 persons an additional quantity of 80 acres each.....	4,400,000 "
To 109,000 persons an additional quantity of 120 acres each.....	13,080,000 "

Making the total number of warrants to be issued 574,811, and the quantity of land required to satisfy them.....83,209,760 "

The execution of this law, so far as the third class of beneficiaries is concerned, will be attended with great difficulty. The examination of the claims will involve accurate knowledge of the laws of descent in the various States in the Union, and other localities, where the soldier may, by chance, have had his domicile at the time of his death. There must oftentimes be conflicting claims as to the right of inheritance, and the opportunities for the perpetration of frauds will be fearfully increased. The execution of the law will likewise require an immense amount of time and labor. The number of warrants issued under existing laws, during the last three years, is about 183,000, and at that rate, the issuing of those granted by this bill, with the present clerical force engaged in the execution of the existing bounty land laws, would require upwards of nine years, or more than triple the present force, during the present Administration.

The enhanced value of the public lands, consequent upon the increasing facilities by railroad and otherwise, for transporting their products to market, and the increasing population of the country, would, no doubt, cause these warrants to be located more rapidly than those heretofore issued; but, notwithstanding, it is estimated that it would require at least eight or ten years to absorb them. In the mean time, of course, the revenue derived from the sale of the public lands would be insignificant in amount.

This bill introduces several new principles into the bounty land system. It grants bounty land without respect to length of service; and, consequently, gives to those serving only one month the like quantity as to those serving throughout all the wars to which it is applicable. It gives land to laborers, and to the heirs-at-law of those who rendered military service.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. McCLELLAND, Secretary.

Hon. E. A. WARREN,
Of the Committee on Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

The reading of the report having been concluded—

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Speaker, I move to refer the report just read to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed, together with the letter of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. Speaker, while I was on the floor a moment ago, I said that I took exception to the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, so far as I understood it. I do not mean to say now, without knowing its contents sufficiently well, after hearing only a single reading of it here, that I will take issue on that letter or report. I do not mean to reflect upon the Secretary of the Interior, or do injustice to that intelligent and courteous member of the Cabinet of our distinguished Executive, inasmuch as it seems to me to be a very elaborate and impartially-considered document; and as that gentleman seems to have taken up the subject so clearly, that when his letter will have been printed, and I have read it, I may probably arrive at the same, or to a very nearly similar conclusion which the Secretary of the Interior has,—hence, Mr. Speaker, I repeat, I do not wish to be misunderstood in saying that I took exceptions to that letter, or to be charged with having any other motive than to wish an opportunity to have fully and clearly examined it, which I certainly desire to do, with a view only to arrive at the facts, so that full justice may be done to the Government, and be meted out to those who have petitioned for the passage of a law by Congress making such provision for the distribution of bounty lands, as is indicated in the bill which the committee have reported upon adversely. I candidly acknowledge that all the information communicated by the Secretary of the Interior I have yet received, upon this now very important subject, at least so far as the public lands are concerned, has been obtained here today, except a reference to it in the correspondence of one of our largely circulated newspapers in the city of Philadelphia—the Public Ledger—wherein it was stated that the Secretary of the Interior had informed the Committee on Public Lands that if the bill which I had the honor of introducing, and which was referred to the committee, should pass, it would require eighty-three millions of acres of the public lands, and would cost $120,000,000; that it would take all the clerical force of the General Land Office for the space of nine or ten consecutive years, besides causing endless litigation, and a train of other evils growing out of the passage of this bill. Now I also understand the Secretary of the Interior to say that the execution of this law so far as one class of the beneficiaries contemplated by it are concerned, will be attended with great difficulty; and that the examination of the claims will involve accurate knowledge of the laws of descent in the various States in the Union, and other localities, where the soldier may, by chance, have had his domicile at the time of his death; there must oftentimes be conflicting claims as to the right of inheritance, and the opportunities for the perpetration of frauds will be fearfully increased; the execution of the law will likewise require an immense amount of time and labor; the number of warrants issued under existing laws, during the last three years, is about one hundred and eighty-three thousand, and at that rate, the issuing of those granted by this bill, with the present clerical force engaged in the execution of the existing bounty land laws, would require upwards of nine years, or more than triple the present force, during the present Administration.

I further understand that the total number of warrants to be issued, if the bill becomes a law, will be 574,811, and the quantity of land required to satisfy them 83,209,760 acres; and from the best data obtained, it is estimated that the number of effective men who were engaged in the various wars to which the bill under consideration applies, is about 608,117. It is supposed that teamsters, wagoners, warrant officers of the staff, artificers, and laborers of the ordnance corps, form about one tenth part of the effective military force.

Upon these facts which have been elicited, the deductions of the Secretary are arrived at. Sir, I do not desire to bring down such a calamity and such consequences of the country as the Secretary of the Interior fears, or anticipates; but I desire, at least, to have a fair chance of reviewing this report. Thousands of persons residing in the State of Pennsylvania who were engaged in the war of 1812, have sent petitions to me, and to a number of my colleagues, and to members of this House from other States of our Confederacy, in reference to what they considered their claims to public lands for services in that and other wars of the Republic; and I felt, so far as I could understand the subject, that these people were entitled to consideration at the hands of Congress. I believed that those soldiers who served in the war of 1812, and in the Indian wars since 1790, were quite as much entitled to a hundred and sixty acres of the public lands as were those who served in the war with Mexico, and their petitions were entitled to the proper and fair consideration of Congress, from the fact that they are a very meritorious, patriotic, and intelligent, class of our citizens, who had made many sacrifices in taking up arms in defense of their country.

Besides, but recently, sir, on the 8th of January of the present year, a national convention of the soldiers of the war of 1812 was held in the city of Philadelphia, at which resolutions were passed petitioning Congress to pass a law such as has been contemplated. This very large body of men, composed of more than a thousand delegates, from twelve or more States of this Union, and from this District of Columbia, have had the proceedings of their convention printed, and, I presume, placed in the hands of every member of the present Congress; at least, I hope they have been, as it is important just now. I have received copies, one of which is in my desk, and from which I have obtained a few of the resolutions which were passed with great unanimity. Here they are:

Resolved, That we look back with much pleasure upon a contest with the mistress of the ocean, as she vauntingly called herself, with her boastful motto:

"The winds and waves are Britain's wide domain,
And not a sail but by permission spreads."

When we recall to mind the speech of a member of the British Parliament, upon the capture of two British ships, the Guerriere and Macedonian—made in the early part of the war—he says, that "indignation was a wholesome feeling, which ought to be cherished and maintained. It cannot be too deeply felt, that the sacred spell of invincibility of the British Navy was broken by those unfortunate captures. And however we must all wish the war to terminate, I hope I shall not be considered as sanguinary and unfeeling, when I express my devout wishes, that it may not be concluded before we have reestablished the character of our naval superiority, and smothered in victories the disasters which we have now to lament, and to which we are so little habituated."

Resolved, That while we take a retrospect of the valor and daring of our Navy, we can look with feelings of exultation and pride upon the splendid battles fought by our soldiers on land. Towards the close of the war, on the shores of the lakes, Brown, Pike, Scott, Macomb, Jesup, Miller, Croghan, McNeil, Harrison, Towson, Cass, Wool, Taylor, and a host of others, won undying fame; while in the southwest, Jackson, Coffee, Carroll, Butler, Armstrong, and their companions in arms, covered themselves with laurels. Nor can we forget with what high pleasure we received the intelligence of the manly and successful resistance of a sister city against an assault made by an incendiary army, that like Goths and Vandals, plundered the Presidential Mansion, and then destroyed it; burned the national archives of great value, and would doubtless have committed acts of equal atrocity upon the city they were then approaching, if its brave soldiers had not slain their leader in his march, and driven back his troops for shelter to their ships. So overwhelming were the victories of our war, that it has preserved peace even until now. It was in very deed a second war of independence. Is it, therefore, asking too much that those who participated in it should be properly cared for by the Republic?

Resolved, That as the persons who performed military duty in the war of 1812 and Indian wars, or the widows and heirs of those who are dead, are scattered over all parts of the Union, a grant to them will reach almost every family in the nation; children and grandchildren will be interested in such bounty of Government; consequently, such a provision could not fail to be as popular with the whole country as any act that could be passed by our National Legislature.

Resolved, That Congress ought to place the soldiers of the war of 1812 upon the same footing with those who served in Mexico, by considering them in service until paid off, as was the case with the volunteers who returned from Mexico, who were not deemed out of service till they received their pay from the General Government.

Resolved, That we specially thank the representatives of the different Legislatures who have forwarded their resolutions of approval in favor of the grant of one hundred and sixty acres of land by the National Legislature.

Resolved, That the Government of the United States should be just before it is generous, and that in our judgment it will be time enough for Congress, after it has given its bounty to those who served their country, to go in search of new recipients of its favor.

Resolved, That if Congress had given the defenders of their country in the war of 1812 forty acres of land, when their service was performed forty years ago, that grant would have been much more valuable than the grant of one hundred and sixty acres, now asked for by those who still remain of that gallant band, or their widows and children.

Resolved, That, inasmuch as the marines have received one hundred and sixty acres of land under the bounty land laws, each of the sailors who fought by the side of the marines in the same battles is entitled to a similar amount of land, and that Congress be requested to alter the bounty law act, so as to provide alike for those who served on water and those who served on land.

Resolved, That it be recommended to Congress to grant one hundred and sixty acres of land to those who were confined in the loathsome Dartmoor and other foreign prisons during the war of 1812; and, in case of their death, that their widows shall receive the said land; and where there is no widow, that the bounty shall go to the surviving children.

Resolved, That it also be asked of Congress to give one hundred and sixty acres of land to the few remaining men, and the widows and children of such as are dead, who were prisoners at Tripoli, and who were made to work daily as beasts of burden, under the brutal lash of their taskmasters, for two whole years.

For the purpose, therefore, that the whole matter may be fully examined, so that just conclusions may be arrived at, and nothing more, I move that the report just read, the bill, and the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, be printed; and that the whole be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ORR. I move the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If I understand the rights of the House, it has a right—if I move to lay the matter on the table—to carry out the report of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EWING. Is it now in order, Mr. Speaker, to make the motion which I desired to make a moment ago?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order. Both are privileged questions. The Chair decides that it is in order for the gentleman from Kentucky to make his motion.

Mr. EWING. Then, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that debate on the homestead bill is drawing to a close on this floor—it having been limited—and as the matter now before the House may be just as well entered into at any other time, I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FLORENCE. Oh, no; let us dispose of this matter first.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his motion for a moment—and I will renew it—so that I can ask the permission of the House, under the direction of the Committee on Territories, to set apart three days next week for the consideration of local territorial business?

Mr. ORR. No; let it not be so soon as next week.

Mr. EWING. I will withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit a resolution that Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of next week be set aside for the consideration of some local territorial business.

Mr. ORR. I hope a gentleman will put it off until two weeks from this week. There are reports yet to come from committees. It is earlier than the usual time set apart for that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state to the gentleman from South Carolina that it is my purpose, and the purpose of the Committee on Territories, to set apart three days next week, and then to ask for a week in the month of May, for the consideration of other Territorial business, which cannot be got through earlier.

I will state, also, with the permission of the House, that some local legislation is necessary for some of these Territories, in order to carry out some appropriations recommended here by the Department for their benefit, and which appropriations should be made at once, otherwise they will not be of avail to the Territories this season.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman if his proposition is to set aside these days to consider business connected with the organized Territories?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is.

Mr. JONES. And no other?

Mr. RICHARDSON. None other.

Mr. JONES. Then I unite with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR.] and ask that the gentleman from Illinois will postpone the time he asks for two weeks, in order that between this time and then we may dispose of the deficiency bill, which has been reported to this House.

Mr. JONES, of New York. Unless it is distinctly and explicitly stated by the gentleman from Illinois that he desires these days set apart for the consideration of business relating to the organized Territories, I object to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I move that the rules be suspended, in order to enable me to introduce a resolution, setting aside the seventh, eighth, and ninth days of March, for the purpose I have indicated.

Mr. JONES, of New York. I ask for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS of Alabama, and DEAN were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 32.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. DE WITT, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported, as correctly enrolled, bills of the following titles:

"An act to indemnify the State of Indiana for the failure of title to a township of land granted to said State on her admission into the Union in 1816."

"A resolution for supplying new members of the Senate and House of Representatives with such books, of a public character, as have been heretofore supplied."

"An act to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans."

Which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker.

Mr. DUNHAM. Before the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] is put, I would like to ask the unanimous consent of the House to have the papers in the case of John H. Hicks re-referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. That can be done at the Clerk's desk, without asking the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. DUNHAM. The case has been reported at this session, and I only desire to have the papers in the case recommended to the committee.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, it will be so ordered.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] proposes to set aside the 7th, 8th, and 9th of March, for the consideration of the local territorial business within the organized Territories, and that that business will be made the special order for those days.

The question was taken, and the motion agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In accordance with my promise to the gentleman from Kentucky, I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was put, and the motion agreed to.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. OLDS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill (No. 37) reported from the Committee on Agriculture, by Mr. DAWSON, "to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same for a certain specified period."

Upon which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NOBLE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. NOBLE addressed the committee on the subject of tonnage duties; and, in the course of his remarks, said, he could quote from thirteen of the messages of Presidents, either annual or special, or veto messages, in which there is almost an identity of sentiment with President Pierce on this topic. He alluded to these things simply to show that there was no necessary connection with what was put forth by President Pierce on the subject of internal improvement, warranting the legitimate inference that he is in favor of tonnage duties. As well might gentlemen charge that the distinguished predecessors of President Pierce were in favor of tonnage duties. When General Jackson, Madison, and Monroe placed their views before Congress, was there any one who sprung up and said that they were in favor of tonnage duties? There was no public man, living or dead, who ever said that these statesmen ever favored tonnage duties.

Notwithstanding the remarks of the eloquent gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KEITT,] Mr. Calhoun never favored the plan as laid out on the table, and as advocated by that gentleman. It was the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] who first brought forward a plan giving the consent of Congress to the States to levy indiscriminately tonnage duties on foreign industry and domestic commerce. To him is due the honor. If the plan has the merits which is claimed for it; if it is to be beneficial to the great national commerce on the western waters; if it is to forward and preserve this great interest, then he should be the last to oppose it. But he looked on the plan as unconstitutional and inexpedient, and as calculated to prove disastrous to the best interests of the West. These points he argued until the close of the hour to which he was limited in debate, insisting that such a plan could operate only on foreign commerce. As to domestic commerce, he showed that the plan was inexpedient, and would not yield a sufficient amount of money for the purposes designed, either on the northern lakes or the Mississippi, taking into consideration the right of inter-State commerce. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. EWING obtained the floor.

Mr. NOBLE. I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the committee to make a few more additional observations in conclusion.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. LETCHER. I object; we have had one speech from the North, and now let us have one from the South.

Mr. NOBLE. I only ask for a very few minutes.

A MEMBER. You can print your speech.

Mr. KEITT. I ask my friend from Kentucky to give way for one word of explanation.

Mr. EWING. How long do you want?

Mr. KEITT. Only for a moment. It is to correct a mistake made by the gentleman from Michigan, which is personal to myself, in relation to my remarks connecting Mr. Calhoun with the measure he had been discussing.

Mr. EWING. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEITT. I said that Mr. Calhoun was the first to announce the constitutionality and expediency of levying tonnage duties; but I did not connect his authority with any specific plan, or any details of any plan. The member from Missouri [Mr. OLIVER] invoked the delegation from South Carolina to reject the plan for levying tonnage duties, and rested his invocation upon the authority of Mr. Calhoun; and it was in connection with those remarks that I said Mr. Calhoun was the first to announce the doctrine of the constitutionality and expediency of tonnage duties. But I neither connected his authority with any specific plan, nor with any detailed plan, nor did I state the extent to which he had carried his views upon the constitutionality of the question.

Mr. NOBLE. I now ask the gentleman to allow me to make one remark in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. EWING. I should be very glad to accommodate the gentleman, but I cannot yield the floor further.

Mr. EWING then addressed the committee. He said that the name of Mr. Clay had been invoked here and elsewhere in support of the antiquated principle of the Missouri line. He wished briefly to show from the public records that so far from his being, as had been asserted, the author of this Missouri line, he had no connection whatever with it.

He read from the remarks of Mr. CLAY, in the debates of 1850, to show, that so far from his being the author of the Missouri line, it did not even originate in the House of Representatives, of which he was a member; that Mr. CLAY could not certainly tell whether he voted for it, as he was the Speaker at the time of its adoption; that it originated with Senator THOMAS, of Illinois, in the other branch of Congress; that it failed to accomplish its purpose; that the North, still opposing the admission of Missouri, the next year Mr. CLAY came here and found members, from all quarters of the Union, in the midst of great excitement, and found it necessary to offer the Missouri compromise, of which he was the author, and which accomplished the admission of Missouri into the Union, as a final settlement of the slavery question. Mr. E. also urged the inconsistency of the compromise of 1820, and that of 1850, and spoke in favor of the principles of the latter. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN obtained the floor.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If my colleague will give way, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. ALLEN. I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I then move that the committee rise.

The question was then taken; and, upon a division there were—ayes 41, noes not counted.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS of Alabama, and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 36.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee [Mr. OLDS] reported to the House that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 37, commonly called the homestead bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote taken this morning setting apart the seventh, eighth, and ninth days of March next for the consideration of Territorial business, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The question was put, and the latter motion agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in compliance with an act of Congress of August 20, 1842, and a resolution of the House of Representatives of January 13, 1846, transmitting a statement showing the names of the clerks and other persons employed in his Department during the year 1853, or any part thereof; the time each was actually employed; the sum paid each, and the residence of each at the time of appointment. Also, stating that it had not been found necessary during the year past to employ any extra clerks, nor was it anticipated that such a necessity would arise during the present year.

The communication was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

CHANGE OF THE BOUNTY LAND LAW AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. When the House went into committee this morning, the Committee on Public Lands had reported back a bill to change the bounty land laws, with a recommendation that it do not pass. A motion was made that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. A motion was then made that the bill and report be laid upon the table, and be printed. The question now before the House, therefore, is, "Shall the bill and report lie upon the table, and be printed?"

Mr. McMULLIN. Is it in order to move to refer the bill and the report to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. That motion is already pending; but a motion is made that the bill and the report lie upon the table and be printed, which has precedence of the motion to commit.

Mr. HAVEN. I would inquire if any member of the committee which reported this bill desires to have it re-referred to them?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. HAVEN. If they do not, then I hope that the motion to lay on the table will prevail.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Public Lands report adversely on the bill, and the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. WARREN], the gentleman making the report, moved that it lie upon the table, and be printed. He subsequently withdrew that motion, at the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE], who moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] then rose and moved to lay the bill and report upon the table, and that they be printed, and that is the first question before the body.

Mr. BISSELL. Is it a bill or a report?

The SPEAKER. A bill and a report.

Mr. BISSELL. I understand that the gentleman from Arkansas who made the report only desires to have the report printed.

Mr. WARREN. No, sir; I think it will be necessary to print the bill, in order to make the communication from the Secretary of the Interior intelligible.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the bill and report be laid upon the table and printed. That takes precedence of the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed.

Mr. FLORENCE. I call for tellers on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then put on Mr. JONES's motion, and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to lay the bill and report upon the table.

The question recurred on Mr. FLORENCE's motion, on which the previous question had been demanded.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. I do not understand the question. Is the demand for the previous question on the motion to refer the bill and report to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition before the House. The effect of the previous question will be to bring the House to a vote on the motion to refer. If the House refuses to refer the bill, the question will then recur on ordering it to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. TAYLOR. I hope it will be referred and printed.

Mr. DEAN. I now move that the bill and report be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. No action has been had since a similar motion was voted down. The motion is therefore not in order.

Mr. DEAN. The previous question has been demanded.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but the House has taken no action on the demand. When that is disposed of the motion of the gentleman will be in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I withdraw the call for tellers on the second.

The question was then put, and the previous question did not receive a second.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is it not now in order to take the question on referring the bill and report?

The SPEAKER. It is; and it would have been if the previous question had been seconded. That is now the pending question.

Mr. ROBBINS. I so understood it.

Mr. DEAN. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the House adjourned (at three o'clock) until to-morrow, at twelve, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 21, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore signed three enrolled bills of the following titles:

"An act to indemnify the State of Indiana for the failure of title to a township of land granted to said State on her admission into the Union in 1816;"

"A joint resolution for supplying new members of the Senate and House of Representatives with such books, of a public character, as have been heretofore supplied;" and

"An act to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans."

LOSS OF THE SAN FRANCISCO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Messrs. SHIELDS, JOHNSON, and JONES of Tennessee, a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill for the relief of the troops of the United States who were sufferers by the late calamity to the steamer San Francisco.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. HUNTER presented the petition of the heirs of Richard K. Meade, deceased, praying commutation pay; which was ordered to lie on the table, as a general bill has been reported which will embrace that case.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a memorial of sundry merchants of Philadelphia, praying that the provision of law by which the forfeiture of ships is incurred, without the fault of the owners, may be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Also, the memorial of H. Gold Rogers, late Chargé d'Affaires of the United States to Sardinia, praying to be allowed arrears of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, the memorial of A. Kintzing, late special examiner of drugs at Philadelphia, praying extra compensation for performing the duties of one of the assistant examiners at that port; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to present five petitions from different parts of the State of Delaware, signed by its most respectable citizens, praying that Congress, in the organization of the Territory of Nebraska, or any other Territory hereafter, will adhere to the principle of non-intervention as established in the legislation of 1850, so as to provide that slavery shall neither be legislated into, nor out of, any Territory by the authority of Congress. As the subject is now before the Senate, I move that the petitions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHASE. I beg leave to present a memorial of citizens of Cincinnati, praying that a grant of public lands may be made to the Cincinnati and Mackinaw Railroad Company. This petition is signed by a large number of the most respectable and influential citizens of that city. It states further, very clearly and distinctly, the public reasons which commend this enterprise to the favorable regards of the Senate. I beg leave to commend it very earnestly to the attention of the Committee on Public Lands.

It was so referred.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I present various communications which have been received at the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which, if they had been received in time, would have formed part of the annual report of that officer. I move, therefore, that they be printed with his annual report, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PEARCE presented the petition of Mary S. Maffit, of Cecil county, Maryland, praying indemnity for the destruction of a fishery belonging to her husband at Spesus Island, at the mouth of the Susquehanna river, by the British troops in 1812; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Public Buildings, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate of January 5, on the subject, reported a bill to authorize the extension and completion of the Treasury building, and also the construction of a building for the War, Navy, and Interior Departments; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of the representatives of Joseph Watson, deceased, praying compensation for services rendered by him as Indian agent, reported a bill for their relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. GWIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the Navy, reported a bill to authorize the construction of six steam frigates, and for other purposes; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. GWIN gave notice that he should ask the Senate to take up that bill to-morrow morning, as it was one of pressing importance.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Isaac Cook and others, reported it back without amendment, and recommended its passage.

He also submitted a report on the subject of the bill; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of the executors of the late Lieutenant John E. Bispham, reported it back without amendment, and recommended its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill to authorize the construction of a line of telegraph from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean, reported it back without amendment, accompanied by a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the heirs and representatives of Colonel George Gibson, praying five years' commutation pay, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it lie on the table, as the object of the memorial is embraced in a general bill now pending.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bill, memorials, &c., asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Pensions:

Bill for the relief of Sophia Kirby.

Petition of Anne Royall, widow of Captain William Royall.

Memorial of Thomas Foster.

Documents relating to the claim of the heirs of Uriah Jones.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the petition of Richard Fields, and the memorial of William M. Ryer, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the heirs of Gustavus B. Harner have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. STUART, it was Ordered, That the petition of David B. Sears be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. STUART, it was Ordered, That the documents relating to the claim of Sylvanus Culver, heir of John Pearson, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. PEARCE offered the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, occasioned by the expiration of the term of the Hon. R. M. Charlton, be filled by the President of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT appointed Mr. DOUGLAS to fill the vacancy.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTH-DAY.

On the motion of Mr. BAYARD, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

PRE-EMPTION IN CALIFORNIA.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McKEAN, its Chief Clerk, announcing that it had passed the bill of the Senate for the extension of the preemption privilege in the State of California, with certain amendments, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The bill, as it passed the Senate, was as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the act of the 4th of September, 1841, granting preemption rights to settlers on the public lands, as modified and made applicable to the State of California, by the act of the 3d of March, 1853, shall be further modified, so far as such claims apply to lands subject to private entry by granting to each settler in said State, who is entitled to preemption under said laws, an extension of time for the term of two years after the commencement of his or her settlement as the period within which proof of right and payment shall be made for the lands claimed as aforesaid, and the third proviso in the sixth section of the aforesaid act of the 3d of March, 1853, shall be so modified as to extend said rights to settlements made prior to and within two years after the passage of this act."

The House amended it so as to make it read:

"That the provisions of the act of the 4th of September, 1841, granting preemption rights to settlers on the public lands, as modified and made applicable to the State of California by the act of the 3d of March, 1853, shall be further modified, by extending the provisions of the third proviso in the sixth section of the aforesaid act of the 3d of March, 1853, to settlements made prior to and within two years after the passage of this act."

On the motion of Mr. GWIN, the amendment made by the House of Representatives was concurred in.

INDIGENT INSANE.

On motion by Mr. FOOT, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill making a grant of public lands to the several States and Territories of the Union, for the benefit of indigent insane persons.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, the Committee on Public Lands reported an amendment to this bill, in the form of a substitute for the original bill, which was introduced by myself, and referred to that committee; and to that amendment or substitute there is now pending an amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PERRY,] who is not now in his seat.

Mr. President, this bill, with but slight modification, has been pending before Congress for the last five or six years, and has passed each House by decisive majorities at different terms, though unfortunately not at the same term in concurrence. The object of the bill and its provisions are doubtless well understood by most, if not all the members of the Senate. It has been very fully and carefully considered by your Committee on Public Lands, and we think it well guarded in all its provisions. It can hardly be deemed necessary, therefore, to enter upon any extended discussion at this time, with a view to enforce its claim upon the favorable consideration of the Senate.

By the last census, it appears there are over thirty thousand persons in the United States laboring under the most fearful and terrible of all afflictions, mental alienation or insanity; a very large proportion of whom are in circumstances of indigence and want, destitute alike of the ordinary physical comforts of life, and of that remedial care and treatment which are afforded only at well endowed hospitals, devoted exclusively to that purpose, and which all observation and experience show to be indispensable to their restoration.

The amelioration of the condition of this large and increasing class of our citizens, suffering under the most direful calamity which can befall a human being; to restore them, so far as it may be done, to reason, to usefulness, and to happiness, is no secondary object of public interest, or of national concern. The subject is one which appeals not to our sympathies only, but it addresses itself emphatically to our regard as legislators for the public weal. It seems hardly possible to conceive of any other, or more practicable mode, than the measure proposed by this bill, by which the Federal Government, not transcending its constitutional powers, can more effectually contribute to the accomplishment of this most beneficent and most desirable object.

The bill proposes a grant of ten millions of acres from your immense public domain for this object, to be apportioned among all the States, new and old, according to a prescribed and equitable ratio, in sections and parts of section, after it shall have been surveyed. The States in which there are public lands of the value of $1 25 per acre are to have their distributive shares selected from such lands. The States in which there are no public lands of that value are to receive the amount of their distributive shares in acres in land scrip, to be sold by the States at a price not less than one dollar per acre. No State to which scrip is to be issued is authorized to locate it in any other State or Territory; but their assignees may locate their scrip upon any of the unappropriated lands of the United States which shall then be subject to private entry at $1 25 per acre.

This provision will prevent the location of this scrip upon any of the public lands along the lines of proposed railroads, whose minimum value shall have been fixed at the duplicate price, or at any price above $1 25 per acre. The expenses of these proceedings are to be borne by the several States respectively. The moneys realized from the sale of the lands and from the sale of the scrip are to be invested in the United States stocks, or other stocks yielding not less than five per cent. upon their par value; and this is to constitute a perpetual fund, the interest of which shall be applied to making provision for, and to the support and maintenance of the indigent insane in some public hospital or institution devoted exclusively to their care and treatment, and having full corps of officers, physicians, and attendants attached to them. The previous assent of the States to the grant, with all its provisions and conditions, is to be signified by legislative enactments. If any portion of the fund shall be lost, or if it shall be diminished from any accident or cause whatever, the State must make up such loss or diminution, and keep the fund entire and inviolable.

These are the principal features of the bill. The object is a good one. It is, indeed, an object of growing and national importance. The measure proposed by the bill is not circumscribed, nor local, nor partial in its operation, like very many of your grants; but, on the contrary, it is general and equitable, and as universal in its operation and influence as the miseries it proposes to relieve. It passes clear of all the objections to merely local and partial grants. It comes clearly within the limits of your constitutional power upon general principles, and has the authority of precedents almost without number. Indeed, the precedents, many of them, go far beyond this proposition, and which, from their local and partial character, were obnoxious to objections of which this case stands clear. Objects of humanity and charity, both at home and abroad, have not unfrequently claimed the attention and consideration of Congress, and have shared the bounty of the Federal Government in different forms. Without stopping to comment upon them, I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to several acts in which the principle and the power we ask to be exercised and applied in this case have been fully recognized by Congress.

In 1819 Congress granted a township of land for the support of an asylum for the deaf and dumb in Hartford, Connecticut. In 1826 they granted another township of land for the support of a similar institution at Danville, Kentucky; and in 1812 Congress appropriated $50,000, to be expended in the purchase of provisions to be sent to the people of Venezuela, who had suffered from the great earthquake; and in 1815 they granted a tract of land in the Territory of Missouri, called the "New Madrid grants," for the benefit of such persons as had suffered by earthquakes. In 1827 Congress voted $20,000 to the city of Alexandria, for the relief of persons who had suffered by the fire which had consumed a considerable portion of the town; and in 1847 Congress authorized the employment of the United States ships Macedonian and Jamestown to transport provisions for the famishing poor of Ireland and Scotland. These were all objects of charity, of benevolence, and humanity. They were objects local and temporary in their character, and, in two instances, among a foreign people. Yet the Congress of the United States answered to the calls of human suffering, and in bestowing these gratuities, while you inflicted no blow upon the Constitution, you struck a responsive chord in the American heart.

In 1831 Congress granted a tract of land to the trustees of Shawneetown, Illinois, for the purpose of graduating and paving the river bank within the limits of that town; and at another time a similar grant was made to Tuscarawas county, Ohio, for the improvement of streets and alleys. But I need not multiply instances of this sort. Special grants, in almost unlimited numbers, have been made for purposes of local improvement; for educational purposes; for sites for court-houses; for churches and cemeteries, and the like.

Of a similar character was the large grant in 1841 of half a million acres to each of the States in which the public lands are situated, for purposes of internal improvement. Your whole system of annuities, your pension and bounty land system, is but a system of beneficent and charitable gratuities, and founded upon no consideration springing from any contract for service. Your statute-books abound with acts making grants of lands and money for particular and local objects; for local and specific improvements; for local institutions within the States; for the support of schools, academies, colleges, and universities, to say nothing of your annual appropriations for your numerous marine and military hospitals.

In addition to all this, there are now bills upon your table by which it is proposed to invite the landless of our own country, and of other countries, to go and take possession, each man, of a hundred and sixty acres of your public domain, without money and without price. In the fullness of your liberality to all other claims, you are now asked to bestow this comparatively small pittance for the relief of those who are not only destitute, but are mentally and physically unable to avail themselves of your proffered boon upon that condition—who have not the ability to go and personally occupy your lands. The only mode in which they can be benefited by the bounty of the Government through its public lands, is in the manner proposed by this bill. Why shall we hesitate to pass it? Humanity, public policy, and impartial justice alike demand the adoption of the measure. Pass the bill, and the sentiment of the country will respond to it as one of the most just and beneficent acts of your legislation. Pass this bill, and it will accomplish more substantial and lasting good—it will alleviate more suffering and sorrow; yes, sir, it will illumine, with the rays of hope, more dark and desolate places of anguish and despair, than an equal appropriation of your public lands in any other manner, or for any other purpose.

It is no argument against this proposition to tell us that it is the duty and the proper business of the States to provide for and to take care of their indigent insane. We do not propose to take from them that duty, but the rather to encourage and aid them in the discharge of it. And with the multiplied examples and precedents before us, it is quite too late to make a serious question of the power of Congress to grant such aid. If Congress may give lands to the States to aid them in building roads, and canals, and railways; to support schools, and academies, and colleges; to improve streets, and alleys, and river banks, in particular localities; if it may give sites for court-houses, and churches, and cemeteries to particular towns, or counties, or parishes; if it may grant annuities, and pensions, and bounty lands to particular individuals, or classes of individuals—the very terms of which imply a gift, or bounty, and independent of any contract obligations; if it may give money and employ its ships to furnish provisions to the sufferers from earthquake, or from fire or famine, in foreign lands, as well as in our own; if it may give lands for the benefit of local asylums in Connecticut or Kentucky; if it may give lands, as you propose to do, to all the destitute among those who are vigorous and robust enough to go and take possession of and occupy them—if we may do all this, why, in the name of common justice, and of common humanity, may we not grant lands, in equitable proportions, to all the States, embracing the new as well as the old, to aid them in making suitable provisions for the proper care and treatment of the thirty thousand of our fellow-beings, who are in a more helpless and deplorable condition than any other class upon whom your bounty has ever been bestowed?

If it be said that Government receives a consideration for these land grants, in the enhanced value of its remaining lands, by the increased settlements and improvements, the argument applies with equal force in the present case. You are furnishing another means, an additional agency to encourage and promote settlements, and thereby to create an increased demand, and to give a greater value and more ready sale for your other lands. The exercise of the power claimed in this case comes within the rule of the most strict construction, that the Federal Government, as the trustee of the public lands, may dispose of them only in such manner as a proprietor would do in the exercise of a sound discretion.

Mr. President, if I may be allowed to express the opinion, this is the only measure which is likely to command the favorable action of Congress, by which the old States will receive directly any share or benefit from the public domain, which is the common property of all the States. I am not complaining of injustice to the non-landholding States; but with the record of its acts before me, I feel authorized to say that Congress has dealt liberally, to say the least, with the land States in the way of grants to them. The grants to the new States and Territories, for various purposes, amounted in the aggregate, on the 30th of June last, to a fraction short of one hundred and thirty millions of acres. I hope the policy of the Government will always be characterized by a spirit of liberality towards them; but, at the same time, that it will not be forgetful of a proper regard to what is just and due to the old States of this Union.

Now, when the new States are asking the votes of the representatives of the old States, for grants of other millions of acres of this common domain, to aid them in the construction of various lines of railroad and for other purposes, is it a vain or unreasonable expectation on our part, that the representatives from the new States will characterize their action by a spirit of justice and liberality, in cheerfully according to us the small portion of this common fund which is called for by the provisions of this bill, for an object so commendable and worthy, and in which they themselves are to enjoy an equal participation? "They who ask justice must do justice," is a maxim of policy as well as of morality, even in legislation. I am not prepared to believe that honorable Senators from the new States will assume the position of demanding all for themselves and denying everything to us. It gives me pleasure, indeed, to bear my testimony to the very kindly and generous disposition of those Senators from the new States upon the Committee on Public Lands, towards this beneficent measure.

Mr. President, if it were needful, or if it were possible, to invest the proposition before us with any additional interest aside from its intrinsic merit, it is found in the consideration of its origin. It comes commended to our attention and our regard in the memorial of an accomplished and gifted lady, the prime and energy of whose years have been devoted to the study and amelioration of the condition of this most unfortunate and neglected class of people. She has visited in person nearly every State in this Union, and made herself acquainted with the condition and personal history of more than twenty-five thousand of this class of persons, most of whom were found in a lamentable state of destitution and neglect. Fitted by rare endowments to have attained popular eminence and applause in the higher and more inviting departments of life; to have moved among the more attractive and admired scenes of its proudest and gayest circles, her days and years, and an ample private fortune have been expended in seeking out and alleviating the condition of those whom the world beside had forsaken. With the vigilance and devotion of a patron saint, she has sought out the stricken maniac in jail, and in poor-houses; in private cells, in garrets, and in dark dens; often in rags and in chains, and administered to their physical wants, and poured the accents of inspiring hope and consolation into their dark and troubled spirits. Like an angel of mercy, her visitation by day and by night have been among the abodes where poverty and wretchedness and wild delirium dwell. This, sir, is but a feeble tribute to the purity and disinterestedness of motive, to the excellence and energy of purpose, to the moral heroism and true nobility of character of her whose prayer is before you in her memorial for the aid of the Government in behalf of suffering humanity. Look at the picture which that memorial presents; look at your abundant means; look at what you have done, and are daily doing, for others; then let those who can, reject the prayer of that petition.

A word or two now, Mr. President, in reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PETTIT,] which proposes to limit the appropriation exclusively to the States in which the public lands lie. The proposed amendment is incompatible with the main object of the bill, and inconsistent with all its provisions. It is an adversary proposition, and as such, it may be considered as coming within the parliamentary rules of legitimate opposition to the bill, with a view to defeat its passage. If the Senate agree to the amendment, it defeats the bill; if they reject it, the vote may be taken as an indication of the judgment of the Senate in favor of the bill. I am quite willing, therefore, that the issue should be made upon the proposed amendment, and that the fate of the bill be tested by that vote.

The time having arrived for taking up the special order, on motion, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I am under obligations to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] who is entitled to the floor, for allowing me to address the Senate for a few minutes this morning, and I will encroach on his time as little as possible. It was so late last evening when I submitted my remarks, and I was so unwilling to delay the Senate, that I omitted one or two important points which I desired to notice. I shall now do it. But as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PERCIV] is not in his seat, I shall make no personal allusion to him, but shall confine myself strictly to the subjects I propose to consider.

Mr. President, for some years we have heard a great deal said about what are called the fundamental articles of compact by which governments for the territory northwest of the Ohio were originally instituted, and a good many erroneous impressions have prevailed concerning them. What were they? Having lived under territorial government in that region during many years of my life, the history of the organization of these political communities is perfectly familiar to me. The Congress of the old Confederation, in 1787, passed a law establishing the Northwestern Territory. It was styled an ordinance, and many have supposed that it derived peculiar solemnity from the use of that term. But it is a mistake. Be it ordained, &c., was the formula of enactment before the Constitution, and this ordinance had no more validity than the usual acts of the old Congress. It has been supposed, too, that the whole of this act constituted a compact. That is an equal error. Much the larger portion of it is occupied with the necessary details establishing a government, and for the appointment of its officers, and prescribing the mode of its administration. Five sections or articles of it are declared to be forever binding upon the people and States of the Union then existing, and upon the people and States to be formed in the northwestern region, and to be irrevocable but by common consent.

Now, sir, what is a compact? I have just adverted to the Dictionary, to the old and standard English lexicographer, to ascertain its meaning, and here it is: "A compact is a contract, an accord, an agreement between two or more to do or forbear something." Now, sir, in applying this definition to the case before us, let us inquire who were the "two or more" parties or persons by whom this contract was made? It will be hard to find them. The law was passed, as I have said, by the Congress of the old Confederation; and there never was, in fact, any other party to this compact, nor is there any pretext for it. What did they undertake to do? They undertook to establish five articles, containing various provisions of more or less importance, affecting the rights and interests of the people then occupying, or who might in all time to come occupy, the region over which the ordinance extended. And they declared that they should never be altered except in the mode pointed out. And will any man seriously contend that that is a compact? What other party was there to it? There were some thousands of people then living in that country, not one of whom heard of this contract which was forever to bind them until years and years after its promulgation. It is an insult to common sense to say that they and their posterity are bound by such a one-sided instrument as that. The French settlements upon the Wabash, in the Illinois country, at and in the region around Detroit, at Michilimackinac, at Green Bay, at Prairie du Chien, contained a large population; and, besides these, there were not a few American citizens scattered through the country, and no question was ever put to them whether they approved or disapproved this covenant thenceforth to bind them.

Besides, if there had not been a single man in those regions, how could a compact be established which was forever to operate upon the people and States thereafter to exist there, when no provision was made for submitting it to their assent under any circumstances, or in any future time? It is evident, sir, that it is idle to talk of the obligatory nature of a compact thus declared to be such by one party, without the existence of any other party at the time, and without any arrangement for procuring its concurrence when such party should come into existence. This ordinance is destitute of the first essence of mutual obligation.

But, sir, independent of the fatal objection of the want of parties, there was another equally fatal, and that was the want of power. Nothing is more certain than that the Congress of the Confederation had not the slightest authority to establish territorial governments; and there is no man, who will turn to the articles of confederation and examine them, who will have the least doubt upon the subject.

Mr. Madison said, in speaking upon this subject, "all this has been done;" that is, governments have been organized, &c., "without the least color of constitutional authority." And Mr. Adams said "that the ordinance of 1787 had been passed by the old Congress of the Confederation without authority from the States," &c.

Then there were neither parties to this so-called compact, nor power to establish it. And yet we are called upon, with a confidence that seems to defy argument or inquiry, to pronounce these five articles irrevocable and binding now and at all times hereafter upon the people north of the Ohio. What were they, these fundamental enactments? They contained various provisions very proper in themselves, but just such provisions as every political community enjoying the rights of self-government should be left to regulate for themselves. They provided for judicial proceedings according to the common-law, for the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, right of trial by jury, and for other objects of a similar nature connected with the administration of justice. Now, will any man venture to say that the people of the States north of the Ohio are forever precluded, in the progress of time and improvement, from substituting some other law for the old English common-law? I hope not, for I hold it in no great respect. Cannot the writ of habeas corpus be changed, and some other mode adopted for the security of human liberty? And so with respect to the other provisions in relation to this subject. No right feeling man, with his just proportion of State pride, State justice, indeed, can contend that the people of his State are always to be marked with this badge of inferiority, and must ask the permission of the old States to make changes in their institutions which they may deem essential to their prosperity.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] told us the other day—proved to us, indeed,—that his State had recognized the existence of slavery, notwithstanding its eternal interdiction in the ordinance of 1787. And I never heard, till recently, that the power of the other northwestern States to do the same thing was doubted or denied. If they cannot, by their conventions, regulate the condition of slavery as they please, they have not a just political equality in the Union. I say political equality, for that is a very different question from the power to seize the property of the United States, which is sought to be made a test of equality.

But look at another circumstance. One of these fundamental articles of compact provided that there should be three States, at least, formed out of the Northwestern Territory, with permission to Congress to make two other States, at their discretion, being five in the whole. Now, what is the fact? You exhausted your power under this article when you established Wisconsin, for that made the fifth State north of the Ohio. And yet you have gone on and established another Territory, Minnesota, occupying a large portion of this very region, and with an eventual right of admission into the Union; thus making a sixth State in the Northwest. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Berrien, I think it was, one of the most respectable lawyers and statesmen that ever sat in this body, when the Minnesota bill was up for consideration, said the objection had been made in committee, but that four out of five of the members thought it was entitled to no weight; and so thought the Senate, for the bill was passed, and passed, too, with a full knowledge of the matter. And thus the irrevocable articles of compact were repealed. The Senator from Indiana stated that some court had decided that this compact was forever binding. I cannot say it is not, sir, but I doubt whether his information is correct. The court may have had before them some question connected with the jurisdiction over the navigable waters north of the Ohio, which, by the articles of cession of Virginia, were declared to be forever free and common to all the citizens of the United States. The validity of this act of cession no one can doubt. It was a formal agreement, executed by the State of Virginia and the United States, and by virtue of it the General Government acquired the territory north of the Ohio river. Undoubtedly a court might well assert its binding nature. But this is a very different question from these articles of compact, which were all on one side.

There is a mistake pervading the argument of the Senator from Indiana, and which is common to those who hold the opinion he does. So far as regards the practical operation of the ordinance of 1787, the establishment, in other words, of territorial governments, no one can dispute that the object was effected. Necessity required it, and necessity justified it, and so far it had its validity. But the inviolability and perpetual obligation of these fundamental articles rest on very different grounds, and it is a great mistake to confound them.

Now, sir, I have a few words to say on the subject of the power of Congress to establish governments for the Territories. And I introduce the matter, much less with a hope of throwing any new light upon it myself, for I do not expect to do so, than for the purpose of asking the attention of the Senate to the opinion of one of the most able and learned judges of this land, who adorns the seat he occupies, and who supports the general doctrine I have maintained upon this subject. The article to which I refer was published in the Intelligencer some few years ago, and a most able and satisfactory one it is. I brought it to the attention of the Senate two or three years since; but as there may be some who have not seen it, and as it bears directly upon the issues before us, I have thought I should perform an acceptable service by thus directing attention to it, and by quoting a part of it. I was authorized to mention the name of the author, and I do so with pleasure. It is Judge McLean. I certainly feel much gratification that the views I have taken are supported, almost to the letter, by the opinion of this eminent judge, upon the particular point of a want of jurisdiction in Congress to legislate upon the domestic concerns of the Territories. He draws the distinction which our fathers drew between the power to establish colonial or territorial governments, and to prescribe their outlines, and the power to interfere with and control their domestic concerns; to invade their firesides, and to prescribe for them the duties connected with the relation of husband and wife, of parent and child, of master and servant, and of the other family conditions, which constitute almost all that is valuable to man in a state of society. This difference between external organization and internal government was the very foundation of our revolutionary struggle. The British Government could not, or would not, understand it. After studying the matter, however, for between seven and eight years, Lord North finally comprehended its bearing; but the price of the lesson was the loss of the Colonies.

Let me ask you, where do you get your power to govern the Territories? Put your finger upon the clause conferring it, if you can. The power seems to have been taken by the Government of the Constitution from the Government of the Confederation without examination, and for some years no inquiry was instituted into its true foundation. After awhile, however, the subject came up for practical consideration; and it appearing to be absolutely necessary that a justification should be found for this authority, a search was instituted for the discovery. The first clause selected was that which provides that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and regulate the territory or other property of the United States." It was impossible, however, that such a provision should be entirely satisfactory. It was not a basis on which to erect the superstructure of a Government; and I think it has been generally abandoned. It seems to me that no just rule of construction, of common sense, indeed, can justify the pretension that the power to dispose of the public land, ex vi termini, confers complete political jurisdiction, embracing all the concerns of life; or, in other words, because Congress have the power to sell the land, therefore they have the power which has been claimed to sell the people into slavery. And, besides, the principle will not meet the circumstances of the case. Political jurisdiction, the power of government, has been exercised over extensive regions, which were not the "land or territory" of the United States—over a large portion of the State of Ohio, the country between the Little Miami and Sciota rivers, and over the district reserved by Connecticut, and running one hundred and twenty miles west of the Pennsylvania line; over seven eighths of the State of Tennessee, much of Louisiana, and a good deal of other States. If Congress get the power of establishing governments from this power to regulate the public land, it is certain they can establish no government where they own no land. Some other foundation, therefore, of the power must be sought. I repeat, where is it? Search for it, from one end of your Constitution to the other, and you will search in vain. Some four years since, in some remarks to the Senate, I went into this subject fully, and have no disposition now to reinvestigate it.

It is a little curious to ascertain the different reasons which have been given why Congress have this power. I will count them upon my fingers:

1. Is this power to sell.
2. The war and treaty-making power.
3. The right to admit new States.
4. The right to sell the public lands.
5. The right of ownership.
6. The right or duty of settlement.
7. The right of sovereignty.
8. The nature of government.
9. Nationality.
10. The principles of agency and trust.
11. The obligation to carry into effect the engagements of the old Confederation.
12. A sort of tacit confirmation by the present Constitution of the assumption of this power.

There is the round dozen, Mr. President, and I think that it would be difficult to find a stronger argument against the exercise of this power than this very diversity of opinion respecting its origin. Eight plain words would have given the power beyond doubt and beyond controversy—Congress shall have power to govern the Territories. Until now, sir, we have been taught to believe that the men who formed the Constitution of the United States were remarkable for their intellect and intelligence, and that that instrument was remarkable for the clearness and precision of its language. And, in the face of these characteristic traits, we are asked to believe that, instead of a clear provision for the exercise of the momentous power of instituting governments over freemen, we must search it and find it in some one or other of the clauses to which I have referred, and which have not the most distant relation to the matter. Latterly, it has been contended by some, with a good deal of confidence, that this authority is derived from the treaty-making power; and I suppose that this opinion has most advocates at this day. It is unfortunate, sir, for its adoption, that, in order to sustain it, we must resort to two implications from one grant of power. You have the right to make treaties, and, as an implication, you have the right of acquisition.

The Constitution stops with one implied power, but here you must have another, and claim the authority to govern as an incident to the right of acquisition, which is itself an incident of the treaty-making power. As to the regulation and disposition of property when acquired, that is expressly provided for in the Constitution. But there is another fatal objection to this assumption. It does not meet the exigencies of the case any more than does the clause for selling the public land. Eight Territories have been formed within the original limits of the United States, five northwest of the Ohio, and three south of it. The region covered by these Territories does not come within the treaty-making power of the Constitution, and consequently no incident affecting it can be derived from the treaty-making authority. It makes part of our original territory not ceded by England, for we did not ask her to make any cession to us. We claimed the whole country as our own, and we kept it as our own, and all England did was to recognize our right to it. Then, sir, it is clear that the authority to establish the northwestern Territories and the Territories of Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama, never came to Congress through the treaty-making power. We are again baffled in our investigations.

And now, sir, for the views of Judge McLean:

"The true construction of the Constitution is, that implied powers can only be exercised in carrying into effect a specific power, and this implication is limited to such measures as shall be appropriate to the object. That is an admitted and safe rule of construction. It is believed to be the only one which has been sanctioned by statesmen and jurists. Powers exercised beyond this are not derived from the Constitution, but must depend upon an unlimited discretion, and this is despotism.

Though the Senator from Indiana says there is no danger.

"—Now, there is no specific power in the Constitution which authorizes the organization of a territorial government. Such a power was given in relation to the District of Columbia, and it was equally necessary in regard to the other Territories. But if this power be implied from the specific power given to regulate the disposition of the public lands, it must, under the above rule, be limited to means suitable to the end in view. If Congress go beyond this in the organization of a territorial government, they act without limitation, and may establish a monarchy. Admit that they may organize a government which shall protect the lands purchased, and provide for the administration of justice among the settlers, it does by no means follow that they may establish slavery. This is a relation which must be created by the local sovereignty. It is a municipal regulation of limited extent, and necessarily of an equally limited origin. It is a domestic relation over which the Federal Government can exercise no control."

No point can be clearer than that the distinction here drawn between the power to establish a government for a country, and the power to intermeddle with, and to direct and control its domestic relations, is one founded in nature, and fortified by our whole history, from the earliest period to this day.

What does Mr. Madison say as to the foundation of this power? He placed its exercise under the old Confederation upon the true ground—the ground of necessity. "The public interest," he said in the Federalist; "the necessity of the case imposed on them the task of overleaping their constitutional authority;" and he adds that he imputes no blame to Congress, because they could not have done otherwise. And some such idea must have occurred to Judge Story, and to Judge Marshall, when they used the language quoted yesterday by the Senator from Indiana. "This necessity of the case," or "inevitable consequence," was in their view one of the grounds of justification for the action of Congress upon this subject, and the adoption of the Constitution. "Perhaps," says Judge Marshall, "the power of governing a Territory may result necessarily, from the fact that is not within the jurisdiction of any particular State, and is within the power of the United States."

Now, sir, I repeat what I said yesterday, that any man who knew Judge Marshall, that eminent and able jurist, with as clear an intellect as perhaps ever fell to the lot of any one, and whose opinions upon all subjects were clearly formed and clearly expressed, must be satisfied that he hesitated upon this subject, and that his hesitation resulted from the difficulty—impossibility, indeed—of tracing this power fairly to the Constitution. He knew that the Territories must be governed, and that the incipient measures must be taken by Congress. His frame of mind is sufficiently evinced by his saying, that "perhaps the power of governing a Territory may result," &c. May, and perhaps, mark the doubt that rested on his mind; for it was rare that any equivocation remained with respect to his opinions. "Whichever," he continued, "may be the source whence the power is derived, the possession of it is unquestioned." The possession, indeed! It is not that we are in search of, but the rightful possession.

To be sure, Congress have exercised the power, but we want to know whence came the authority; and it is certainly no satisfactory answer to a man making the inquiry to be told that "the possession of it is unquestioned." The judge who said that, when he looked to possession as the foundation of the right, must have failed to find the latter in the Constitution. It has but one foundation, sir, search as you will, and that is the necessity of the case which justifies the action of a Government in circumstances not provided for, and necessary to be met in the interests of the country.

Tendering my thanks to the Senator from Massachusetts, and tendering them to the Senate for their indulgence, I here quit the subject.

Mr. SUMNER then proceeded to address the Senate in opposition to the bill. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. TOOMBS obtained the floor.

The further consideration of the subject was postponed until to-morrow; and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 21, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The question first in order is on the motion to lay on the table the bill extending the provisions of the several laws granting bounty lands to the officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States, and to have printed the accompanying report.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WARREN. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to make a personal explanation in reference to the bill now under consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is it the unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman from Arkansas shall be heard on the matter to which he alludes?

There was no objection.

Mr. WARREN. I find, by reference to the morning paper, that the provisions of this bill, as well as the opinion of the committee touching it, have been misunderstood. The committee has been made, by the reporters, to oppose any modification of the bounty land law. That committee has now before it propositions to modify that law, and will report bill or bills to effect that object to some extent.

The bill reported back on yesterday proposes to modify the bounty land law so as to give to each officer and soldier who served in any war of the United States, without regard to the time of service, whether twelve days or twelve months, one hundred and sixty acres of land. The committee thought it unequal, and reported adversely on it, after thorough investigation. They did not intend to indicate, however, that they were opposed to any modification of the bounty land law. They found, on examination, that if the provisions of the bill under consideration became law, that almost half of the public lands still remaining in the Union would be disposed of, and that it would require ten years for the Department to carry them into execution. It was therefore that they authorized me to report adversely to the bill.

We are not opposed to a change of the bounty land law. We disclaim anything of the kind. We are in favor of a certain modification of that law, and shall so report to the House. We have only decided on the proposition then before us, which was to give to every officer and soldier, without regard to the time or the war in which he may have served, one hundred and sixty acres of land, thereby placing the officer or soldier who only served ten days on the same footing with the one who served months and years.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

Mr. PRESTON, in pursuance of previous notice, introduced, by unanimous consent, a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals:

"A bill to enlarge the Louisville and Portland canal, and provide for its control and management, and to make said canal free to navigation and commerce."

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the rules be suspended; and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DISNEY. I trust that motion may not prevail.

Mr. HAMILTON. I demand tellers on the motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Alabama, and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 47.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. OLDS in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose yesterday it had under consideration, by special order, House bill No. 37, known as the homestead bill; on which question the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN then addressed the House, declaring himself in favor of the bill for establishing territorial governments in Nebraska and Kansas, and giving his reasons for supporting it. His speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. GROW obtained the floor, and said: As a number of gentlemen desire to speak upon this question, and as the debate is to close at three o'clock to-day, I will, with the consent of the committee, yield the floor now, and make my remarks during the hour allotted to my colleague, [Mr. DAWSON,] the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, who reported this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. We had better adhere to the rule.

Mr. COX. I object to any such arrangement.

Mr. GROW. I hope there will be no objection to my suggestion.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes; I object to it.

Mr. COX. I object to any contract or arrangement for the disposal of the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs leave to say to the committee, and to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GROW,] that objection being made to the proposed arrangement, he would like to assign the floor to some gentleman who wishes to speak in opposition to the homestead bill, which has not yet been much discussed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose there is no one here opposed to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DENT] proposes to speak in opposition to the bill, and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield the floor now, he can still have forty-five minutes when the gentleman from Georgia concludes.

Mr. GROW. If that be the gentleman's object, I shall yield the floor to him.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, representing, as I do, in part, one of the sovereign States of the Union, I feel it to be my duty not to let this homestead bill pass without stating my objections to it. I have waited, with great patience, in the hope that some other gentleman from Georgia would secure the floor, and do more justice to this subject than I can hope to do. Being entirely a new member, and unaccustomed to the proceedings of legislative bodies, I have felt at a loss to know how to proceed to obtain the floor to speak in opposition to the bill. I have desired that this bill should be opposed by some one from Georgia, because the people of that State are opposed to it. I have no notes, and my remarks on the present occasion must be rather disjointed; but I propose to enter my protest against the pending proposition for the disposition of the public lands now before this committee. I am opposed to the homestead bill for various reasons. It is unjust and unequal. It proposes to give that which belongs to the sovereign States and people of this Confederacy to a set of individuals, who, perhaps, are as little worthy to receive it as any other class on the continent. If I remember the language of the bill, it, in effect, really invites the pauper population of Europe to come and take possession of our public lands.

Mr. DAWSON. I beg leave to correct the gentleman in that respect. There is nothing in the bill which holds out inducements to the population of Europe. Its provisions are exclusively confined to those who are now citizens and residents of the States and Territories of the United States.

Mr. DENT. A friend has just handed me a copy of the bill, and I find the following to be its language:

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any individual now a resident of any one of the States or Territories, and not a citizen of the United States, but, at the time of making such application for the benefit of this act, shall have filed a declaration of intention as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, and shall become a citizen of the same before the issuance of the patent, as made and provided for in this act, shall be placed upon an equal footing with the native-born citizen of the United States."

There is no limitation in the bill. Its operation is to be perpetual, and as soon as the pauper population of Europe are informed that in this country, to which they are naturally disposed to come, such a law has been passed by the American Congress, our shores will be lined with millions of them.

Mr. DAWSON. I only interrupt the gentleman to turn his attention to the language of the bill. He seems to have overlooked the words "now resident." The provisions of the bill are exclusively confined to those who are now citizens, or now residents of the States or Territories.

Mr. DENT. Very well; then ten years hence—for this bill makes no limitation as to the length of time it is to be in force—those emigrants who come here from Europe within the next five years will then be citizens of the United States, and consequently entitled to the benefits of this homestead law.

Mr. DAWSON. Not at all. The gentleman from Georgia labors under a great misapprehension as to the effect of the bill.

Mr. DENT. Very well; if I be mistaken, I am willing to be corrected by the gentleman from Pennsylvania—

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, (interrupting.) I desire to state a few words in reference to this matter. I suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania certainly does not mean to confine the operation of this bill to those persons who are now in the United States; because everybody knows that the principle to be adopted, that the same arguments which would carry this bill in favor of those who are citizens of the United States to-day, would also be carried out in favor of those who come here to-morrow. The principle embodied here would, if settled, apply as well to those who come hereafter as those who are here at present.

Mr. DAWSON. The only answer that I have to make to this objection is, that there is no provision in the bill which confers its benefits on any other than those who are now citizens or residents of the United States. As to what the Congress of the United States may hereafter do on the subject is a matter for Congress itself to decide.

Mr. DENT. I do not recognize the right of any gentleman on this floor to interrupt me while I am addressing the committee; and I wish to be distinctly understood that it is no want of courtesy on my part, when I object to these interruptions. Still, if I make any erroneous statement, I am willing to be corrected. But I am speaking extemporaneously, without notes, and therefore do not wish to be interrupted.

In rising at this time, Mr. Chairman, I wish it simply to go before the House and the country, that there is at least one representative on this floor from the sovereign State of Georgia who is opposed to the distribution—the disposition that is now attempted to be made—of the public lands; not only in reference to this homestead bill, but your great Pacific railroad enterprise, your railroad grants; and, in a word, to every measure that is now pending before this House to dispose of the public lands, except to that one which proposes to relieve the soldiers who fought and bled to acquire these territories; who served their country when she was in danger; who stood by her in the hours of trouble.

I understand the principles which prevail in some of the committee rooms. I understand the feeling of this House which prompts members to refuse justice to those who, by the best right, are entitled to these lands, while they are ready to give them to the pauper population of Europe, and to that class of men who are too lazy to work for the land necessary to provide themselves a home.

But, it is proposed to give away the land to the great railroad companies; it is proposed in this republican country to build up an aristocracy of wealth, by taking away that which is common to us all, and giving it to a few companies. Sir, I object to the whole of this unjust and unequal system. The public lands are the common property of all the sovereign States, and should not thus be alienated. The Constitution of the United States—if, from my reading, I recollect it aright—says, "that Congress shall have the power to dispose of the public lands, and to make all needful rules and regulations in reference thereto." But, in the same clause, it goes on to say, "that Congress shall do no act which shall be prejudicial to the United States, or to any State of the Union."

Now, sir, if you take the public lands, and divide them up between new States, with a view that they may then give them to railroad companies, do you not do an act which is unjust—which militates against the interests of some of the States of the Union? What, then, is to become of the rights which the old States have to the public domain? Would you, sir, if you were a parent, having thirty-one children, divide your vast estate between the youngest twelve, and cut off from a share in it those who had helped you to make your fortune, and to accumulate it? Would you, I say, give all your property to the twelve youngest children, and deprive the rest of your family of that which you had acquired by their cooperation?

That is precisely the argument brought in here. Gentlemen argue that by giving to these railroad companies this amount of public land, you thus enrich the whole country. I object to it. I object to the doctrine advocated upon this floor, that Congress owns, or that the Government is the proprietor of, the public domain. It is not the proprietor, it is but the agent, the common agent of the sovereign States, and as such, can exercise only certain delegated powers which have been given to it. Further than that it cannot go.

What would you think of a parent who should make such a disposition of his estate? What would you say of a guardian who should give to twelve of his wards the whole estate, leaving the nineteen penniless upon the world, and then say he has made the whole family rich? You would take him up and put him into a lunatic asylum. Justice is the parent of peace.

Gentlemen representing the old thirteen States, and indeed any State in which the public lands do not lie, do themselves and their States great injustice to allow a set of gentlemen to come in upon this floor and make a kind of log-rolling business of these matters. The homestead bill is advocated by some, and grants to railroads by others. I understand that something like a hundred bills, of this latter character, are now pending before both branches of Congress. The original land system of this country is good. It has worked well, and my doctrine is to let well enough alone. If you proceed to give lands to some roads, to some States, and to some companies, upon the same principle you may proceed to give the balance to other companies and to other States, which will be soon knocking at your door, asking for land. And if you continue thus to give away, in a short time you will have disposed of the whole public domain of the country.

Sir, the public lands are the wealth of this nation. I have always been opposed to the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. Being a Democrat, I stand with the Democratic party. I understand that the doctrine of the Democratic party is that we must hold on to the public domain, and not dispose of it; neither to divide it between the States nor the proceeds of the sale thereof. That was the original Democratic doctrine, and I see no reason why it is not good doctrine to-day.

If, sir, we proceed to give away the public domain, we deprive the Treasury of the money which would naturally flow into it from the proceeds of the sale of such public lands. But it is said that these lands do not yield anything to the country. I understand, if I recollect right, that the President of the United States in his late message informs us that nearly fifty-four millions of net proceeds from their disposition have been deposited in the National Treasury. That amount of money has gone to support the Army, to support the Navy, and to carry on the great machinery of the General Government. That much less, then, was required to be levied and raised by a tariff.

My doctrine has been, and the demand of my people has been, free trade. We want to keep the public lands, to be sold as the people demand them for settlement. We want the proceeds thereof to go into the public Treasury, and thus do away the necessity of having a protective tariff, or bring our tariff to a low standard. That is what the people of this country want. The great body of the American people want free trade. They want the world as a market, in which to sell the products of their soil.

Keep your public lands; let them be sold as the wants of the people require, whether they be foreigners or citizens. I am glad to see the people of other countries who have no homes in the Old World come and take possession of lands here under the laws and Constitution of the country. We have in our possession a vast public domain, and I am glad to see them settle upon it, and cultivate it. Justice is the parent of peace, and he that does not take care of his own household is worse than an infidel.

We should first take care of our own people. First of all we should take care of those patriotic men who made this the "land of the free and the home of the brave," and those who stood so gallantly by the flag of the country in the second war of independence—the war of 1812—some of whom have never received an acre of land for their services. There are instances were men who volunteered, or were drafted, marched to the rendezvous, entered into the service of their country, actually engaged in service twenty-nine days, but who have been excluded from any benefit under the celebrated law of September 28, 1850. Pay your debts with your public lands. You owe a debt of honor to the old soldiers. Pay it with the public lands, so far as they can liquidate any portion of it. First and foremost, above all things connected with the public lands, I hold that the soldiers of the war of 1812 should be paid. You give the soldier who served thirty days in the war of 1812 forty acres of land, while you give a man who served in the Mexican war less than a month, if he was honorably discharged, one hundred and sixty acres. When the country becomes powerful, and is abundantly supplied with munitions of war to fight a half-civilized puny race of men, you give those soldiers who served less than a month one hundred and sixty acres of land, while those who served in the war of 1812, when the country was weak and feeble, and when we were contending with a great and powerful nation, that prided itself upon being mistress of the seas, you give but forty acres of land. Proposition after proposition have been before different committees of this House, and have been introduced into the House, for the relief of these men; but they have found but few friends.

I have been a silent member of the House, yet a constant observer, and I find that the great idea now is, that all the various railroad bills and the homestead Buncombe bills are included under one general arrangement, by which if you tickle me I will agree to tickle you. I have seen enough to know that some of the great railroad interests of this country have the Legislatures of several of our sovereign States almost in their breeches pockets. I hope such is not the case in this House, and that no extraneous, outside influences of this character have been brought to bear upon us here; but that we will legislate upon this matter of the public lands as becomes American statesmen. Your public lands should be held sacred.

Gentlemen argue, that by giving railroads alternate sections of land they increase the value of the lands remaining unsold, and that the Government does not lose anything by the operation.

I hold that all the railroads which it is necessary to have built—all the great lines of railroad—will be built by private enterprise. If I am correct in making this assertion, then let these private companies go on and build their railroads, and let the Government sell all their lands at $2 50 an acre; or, in other words, if it is to be a speculation upon the part of the Government—if the Government is to make money by giving away one half the land, and selling the other half at $2 50 per acre—if these railroads are worth so much, it would be better for the Government to build the roads out of its own funds, and then sell all the lands for $2 50 per acre.

But, sir, it is not the policy of this country to put the price of our public lands at $2 50 per acre. A humane and generous policy has always characterized the course of this Government with reference to the disposition of the public domain. It has been our policy to give these lands to poor people cheap. A dollar and a quarter an acre is a low price, and with that price the settler is content.

Your preemption laws have been dictated by a humane policy. Under them the poor man who takes possession of a quarter section of land in the deep wilds of the far West, and has not the money to pay for it, is protected in his right to the title, and time is given him to make the money from the proceeds of his farm. This is the true policy of Government, and to change it is, in my opinion, wrong.

If you pass this homestead bill, and give a portion of your public domain away to settlers, and the balance to the various railroads, reserving a little for the great Pacific, in a short time you will find that you have killed the goose that laid the golden egg. It will all be gone.

Gentlemen talk about keeping this land out of the hands of speculators. Why, sir, that is out of the question. Humane as it may be to give the poor man this land, yet if you compel him to live upon it five years, no Georgian would thank you for the gift. No, sir, they are too proud—too high-spirited to accept the gift with any such reservation or restriction. If you will give it to him without condition, he will be obliged to you for it, and will accept it, provided all his countrymen share alike with him; but no true American citizen would thank you for the gift of one hundred and sixty acres of wild land, if you had dictated to him terms by which you would compel him to live upon it for five years. By the terms of this bill, if the settler absents himself for six months, on account of sickness, or from any cause, he loses his right to the land.

Sir, this bill is wrong in principle. The Constitution of the United States does not authorize Congress so to dispose of the public lands. Congress may, and it is its duty, to dispose of the public lands, but it must do so in an impartial manner. We are all interested in their disposition. The people of every State, from Maine to Georgia, from California to Virginia, are all equally interested. The sovereign States of this Union are, each and every one of them, interested in this matter.

I am willing to make some alterations in our present laws. This bill, even, might be so perfected, and put in such a shape as to meet my approbation; but I have no expectation that such changes will be made as will induce me to vote for it.

I may vote for giving these lands for the construction of the several railroads for which they are asked, but before I shall do so, there must be something done to make the benefit applicable to all sections of the country. There must be some compromise made. Compromises have come to be very fashionable at this day; I am not, however, much of a compromise man. I believe in administering the Government according to the plain letter and intent of the Constitution. But if compromises are to be made, I ask for such a compromise in reference to these lands as will give the old States a fair share to divide a portion of this common property of us all. Let those gentlemen, therefore, who want the votes of the Georgia delegation for this measure—I am not authorized to speak for the whole State of Georgia, but I may speak for the people I represent, and I think in this matter I speak the sentiments of a large majority of the people of the whole State—I say, let those gentlemen prepare a plan by which the old States, and the citizens of the old States, may be benefited as well as the new States, if they wish to get our votes. It is impossible for me to recollect the precise amount, but a very large amount of land—a hundred and thirty millions of acres perhaps—has already been given away to about fourteen of the States of this Union. A large amount of land has thus been disposed of.

I wish it to be distinctly understood, that I never will vote a single dollar for the construction of a Pacific railroad; nor do I believe that any States-right man can vote a single dollar out of the public Treasury for that purpose. It is not the policy of this Government to own a railroad, and we have no right to take the people's money to build a railroad. You may argue that it is a national work; I assert that it is sectional; for wherever you build the road the people of that section will derive the main benefit from it, and the balance of the country will receive no direct benefit. I repeat, that it is not the policy of this Government to build a Pacific railroad. It is the policy of this Government to survey the routes and mountain passes, and to open all possible avenues to our enterprising citizens. It is the policy of this Government to encourage manufactures and commerce. But it is the duty of this Government, in dealing out the public domain, to do it upon principles of stern justice and equality. Sir, let this homestead bill be changed. Let the representatives of those States that want land for railroad purposes come to those of us from the old States, and make a fair proposition to us. Much as I have been opposed to the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, yet if they are to be disposed of in that way, I desire to have them divided upon principles of justice and equality. I am opposed to all these measures; but I am in favor of an amendment of the bounty land law of September 28, 1850; and I give notice to the House that I shall myself introduce such an amendment, unless I see one that suits me introduced by some other gentleman. I have known claims which called aloud for justice stifled in committees.

There are the soldiers of the war of 1790, who fought our Indian foes; and there are the soldiers of the wars of 1835, and '36, all of whom ought to be provided for.

I speak now of the volunteers, of the men who have done as we Georgians used to do; we used to work eight days while our neighbors fought, and then fight eight days while our neighbors worked. Sir, the people that I represent were rocked in the cradle of war. The people of Georgia, and South Carolina, and Tennessee had for years to defend our frontier against a hostile foe. Not a regular soldier ever made a track on our soil, unless it was when President Adams sent General Gaines with his regiment to awe the Georgians into submission on account of some treaty difficulties; and if he had not left the State quietly and quick, he would have been eaten up for a breakfast spell. [Laughter.] Sir, we complain of the injustice that is done us by this scramble to divide the public lands between a few States and incorporated companies. An aristocracy of wealth will be built up in this country fast enough, without any aid from the Government.

In this view, I will candidly acknowledge that the homestead bill has more merit about it than the railroad bills. But there is too much Buncombe about it, and too little justice and equality. The bill as it now stands encourages idleness. It proposes to give lands to those who are too lazy to work; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dawson] seems to be well aware of that, for he would compel them to live five years on the land before he would grant them the fee-simple to it. They are placed in a situation where they are compelled to work or die. So little confidence is placed in their virtue, intelligence, and patriotism that it is proposed the Government shall be their express guardian for five years.

Mr. Chairman, the remarks which I have made have been very desultory. I am not accustomed to public speaking. I am nothing but a plain farmer, and have never been educated for a public speaker. I am not one who could be expected to tread the flowery paths of eloquence. When I rose I expected to make a few remarks only. I would not have attempted it, but that I wanted, so far as Georgia was concerned, to let it be understood there was one man here who opposed this measure, and who believed he did so with the approbation of his constituents. I am, and always have been, a railroad man. I have shown that by my words and deeds. I have encouraged the building of railroads in my own State. I have contributed from my own pocket for the survey of routes for roads, and have even gone as a pioneer into the wilderness; but I do not own one dollar's worth of railroad stock, and never expect to. I am glad to see railroads building. I look on them as a bond of Union between these States. They bring the men of the North and the South, the East and the West, into contact. By their means the men of the West are brought with dispatch to the sea-board.

Georgia has extended her railroads from the sea-board to the valleys of the West. Her roads are now to be put in connection with the valley of the Mississippi, with all the enterprises of the Northwest, and with the roads to be built to the Pacific ocean. I am in favor of seeing a road built from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific ocean by private enterprise, and I believe that it will be built. Such is the spirit of the age that you could not prevent it if you would, and you ought not to prevent it if you could. You ought to give the right of way. Give all the aid and comfort you can; but give no money and no land. Let it be built on its own merits. Let those who take it in hand do as men do in other enterprises—let them employ their own capital. That is my doctrine. Very soon our Georgia roads will be extended through Alabama and Tennessee, and put in connection with Kentucky and Ohio. Very soon, indeed, we shall be able to go from the cities of my State to Chicago and the far distant West in forty-eight or fifty hours. I am glad to see it. You cannot check the spirit of the age, and you ought not to do it if you could.

It is our duty to legislate in a just and equal manner. I desire that the public land shall be disposed of as it has been in bygone days. First and foremost I want to see every soldier who has a just claim on his country paid in land. Nothing is more gratifying to a man that has stood by his country's flag, than to know that he has served a country willing to give him a homestead. Land is more properly given to a soldier than money. If I had my way, I would go to your pension office and strike out all pensions requiring payment in money, and substitute payment in land. I would give these soldiers as much of the public land as would make them and their posterity an independent home.

After we have paid the soldier we all ought to stand on equal footing. No bill ought to be proposed here that has class legislation about it. No act of this free Republic ought to bear on its face discrimination between the rich and the poor. We ought to make our laws equal and just. We ought to encourage our people to be enterprising by placing them on a common level in respect to the public domain, which was obtained by our common blood and by our common treasure. We have, by our blood, labor, and treasure, purchased all the land and the territory belonging to us all; and, in the distribution of this land, the citizens of the whole States and of the Territories ought to be consulted.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I return my thanks to the committee for the courtesy and kindness with which they have listened to my extended remarks. I had no intention of trespassing on their time to-day, and therefore I had not prepared myself with notes; indeed, I did not know that I should ever be able to get the floor to speak on the subject; and I was not aware that I could obtain it now, until two minutes before I rose to address you. But, lest I might never have another opportunity of addressing the committee on the subject, I was disposed to give them a small sprinkling of a speech, and hope they have got enough of it to make them pause and consider well before they act on the important questions concerning the disposition of the public lands.

Mr. GROW said the best disposition which can be made of the public lands is in the manner proposed in the bill now pending. The gentleman who had just taken his seat objected to the bill, on the ground that an invitation would be extended to the paupers of the Old World to come hither, and partake of its generous provisions. He would ask the gentleman, and every other who opposes the bill, whether it is not better, as the population of the Old World will find a home here, to fasten them to an interest stronger than the oath of allegiance?

But few men desert the land of their fathers and the home of their childhood from choice. Most of them are driven hither by dire necessity. These men, he repeated, must and will come. Would it not be better to make these men good citizens, instead of having them a curse to themselves and the cities in which they may locate?

He stated various reasons why the bill should be passed, and contended that its effect would not only be to increase the wealth of the country, but to expand the blessings of country and of home, and strengthen the defenses of the Union. He argued that the public land should no longer be a source of revenue to the Government. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to indulge in any remarks upon this question; and, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DENT] said, "I am without notes," though I do not know that that makes much difference. But I really desire to call the attention of the committee very briefly to a few of the objections to this bill which are obvious to my mind, and which, I trust, will be considered as entitled to some consideration.

In the first place, I wish it to be understood that I totally deny the right or power of this Government to give away the common property of the Union. There is no proposition so clear to my mind as that there is no right or power on the part of this Government to make a gratuitous donation of any part of the public property to a portion of the people of this Union. I do not intend to dwell upon this branch of the subject, but I ask gentlemen by what process of reasoning they come to the conclusion that this Government has a right to give land to the poor man or to the rich man, and at the same time has no right to give money out of the public Treasury? There are now twenty-odd millions of dollars in the Treasury. Have we a right to give away that money to those who want it? No one will pretend that we have, and yet you undertake, by this bill, to give millions of acres of the public domain to those who choose to occupy it.

But that is not all. This bill proposes to give to foreigners just arrived in the country the right to go and settle on these lands. The foreigner who lands in New York to-day, would have the same right that an American citizen would have, to go and take possession of a portion of the public lands. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DAWSON,] who introduced this bill, when that objection was made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. DENT,] said that the benefits of the bill were intended to be confined to those now in the country. I put it to his candor, if the principle of the bill does not equally include all who may hereafter arrive?

Mr. DAWSON. Not at all. The gentleman appeals to me, and I will answer him at once, if he desires it.

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman will have an opportunity of answering me, and I beg him to do it. The Irishman or German who arrived to-day would have the right; the Irishman or German who arrived to-morrow would not have the right. Upon what principle of discrimination can the gentleman make the distinction which is involved? I cannot, for the life of me, see it.

But the bill is most manifestly unjust in other respects. It actually gives to the wealthy portion of the people of this country the same right that it gives to the poor. When I heard gentlemen speak of the great benefits which the bill was to confer upon the poor and the destitute, I supposed, of course, that its provisions were confined to them. But not so; the wealthiest portion of the people of our country would have the same right, under this bill, to go and occupy one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands as the humblest and poorest. I should like to know on what principle that is fair? I cannot see it.

Again: Look at the operation of this bill. I know that it is a great bill for the West; and I do not blame western gentlemen if they can reconcile their conscience to the constitutional objection for voting for it. A man in the West, with four hardy sons, if this bill becomes a law, takes the benefit of its provisions, and perhaps locates on the very land around the school-house for which he intended laying out his money. Under the bill the whole public land will be occupied by western men. Everybody sees the operation of it. There is not a gentleman from the West who does not know that to be its immediate operation. Take my district: I represent the adjoining town of Alexandria. What chance have my constituents to locate land around your school-houses in the new settlements of the West, when the sons, the hardy sons of the actual settlers, are ready to pounce on it? Long before any that I represent, or any represented by eastern men, can reach there, the valuable portion of the land will have been located by those who are there, and who have none. But, whether they have land or not, it makes no difference; for a man with ten thousand acres has the right to locate one hundred and sixty acres alongside of the poorest man. Is that just and equal? I ask this committee whether it can perpetrate such an outrage?

That is not all. The operation of this bill should be just and equal. We have millions of mechanics throughout the eastern, and, to some extent, throughout the southern portion of this Union, engaged in the various branches of industrial pursuits. What chance have they to get homesteads? I put the question. I go to Pennsylvania—men who are engaged in the iron business; I go to the workshops of the East—those for the construction of machinery; I go to the town of Alexandria, where there are a number of workshops, and I ask what chance have those mechanics to enjoy the benefits of this bill? They are told that they may pull up their stakes and go to the West. But they cannot prosecute their trade out there. They cannot squat on one hundred and sixty acres each and set up machine-shops. No, sir; their very occupation shuts them out from the enjoyment of this property, though it may be that every Saturday night, when they receive their pay, the current actual family obligations demand the appropriation of every cent of it. Is there equality in this? No; it is a gross, outrageous inequality; and I am only astonished to see so many men here engaged in advocating this bill, disregarding the constitutional objection, when its necessary operation is so evidently unjust.

But this bill has most extraordinary features. It actually provides that the property thus acquired shall not be responsible for debt. A man may incur obligations, but you cannot get hold of him. Not even that; you cannot subject it to the tax-gatherer. The very tax that is assessed on these very lands cannot be collected. The committee will readily see this objection.

Another thing: There are, as it is well known, a very large portion of those who reside in the Atlantic States, poor, and live from hand to mouth, and yet who live well. How are they to get to the West, and where the public land is? The wealthy will easily be able to send out a number of persons to occupy these sections under arrangement, by which they will accumulate in their hands a large portion of them. A wealthy man can make an arrangement with a certain class of the poor people, and have it signed, sealed, and delivered, so that he will accumulate in his hand a large amount of the public land. Yet, sir, this bill provides in no respect against that. We know the fact that these arrangements have been made, and will be made again; and, under this bill, they will operate to a very great and mischievous extent.

But I here take occasion to say—and I shall thus conclude my remarks—that it is the most extraordinary thing I have ever known that the provisions of this bill—drawn as they are, and embracing the principles they do—should be forced on to final action before this House, while there are hundreds and thousands of the soldiers who served in the war of 1812, and in the Indian wars, who are denied the provisions which they seek, and which, it seems to me, ought to be accorded to them.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, regarded the homestead bill as second in importance to no other bill. He was in favor of it, not because by giving up a part of the public domain to be occupied the remainder will be more valuable to the Government than all of it was before the occupation; nor was he in favor of it for any of the more current and popular reasons for it, but he was in favor of the bill because he was in favor of what he interpreted to be the admission that Government does not own the land, and that the landless do own it.

He hoped that this bill would get the favor and vote of this committee, and yet he could not hope that his reasons for it would meet the approbation of the majority of this committee; but he did hope the committee would tolerate him for his reasons. He then proceeded to argue that the lands belong to the landless, and that land monopoly has reduced the great mass of mankind to abject poverty. [See Appendix for speech.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time has now arrived fixed by the House for the termination of the debate upon this bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DAWSON,] who reported it, is now entitled to the floor for one hour, if he desires to occupy it.

Mr. SMITH. Of course I should like more time to continue my remarks, if it be the pleasure of the committee to grant it. I am, however, entirely at their disposal.

Mr. DAVIS, of Rhode Island. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. COX. I hope not. The House has decided that all debate shall close at three o'clock, and I trust that its order will be strictly executed.

Mr. HUGHES. I would ask if the gentleman from New York cannot proceed by unanimous consent.

A MEMBER. I object.

Mr. EWING. I would suggest that we might have the unanimous consent of the House to accomplish more than simply to give one gentleman an opportunity of speaking. I believe there are quite a number of us who would like to speak, and with a view of extending the time allowed for debate upon this bill, I would suggest that we go into the House for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind gentlemen that debate is closed, and that it is not in the power of the committee to extend it. The Chair would also suggest, that it will be impossible to accomplish such a purpose by going into the House. A motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the resolution closing debate was adopted, and the motion laid upon the table, placing it out of the power of the House to extend the debate.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is it not competent for the committee to lay aside this bill for the present, and take up some other bill upon the Calendar, upon which the debate may proceed?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The resolution of the House fixes the time when the debate shall close, and then prescribes that the committee shall then proceed to vote upon such amendments as are pending, or may be offered to the bill, and shall report the same to the House. The order is positive, and the committee can proceed to the consideration of no other business until it has been executed.

Mr. FLORENCE. I was under the impression that the committee had the power to lay aside this bill and take up another.

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. COBB desired to obtain the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already announced to the committee that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COBB. I am aware of that, but if the gentleman does not wish to avail himself of his privilege, I should be glad to occupy a portion of his time.

A MEMBER. You can not do that.

Mr. DAWSON. Instead of availing myself of my privilege and right to make another hour speech, I shall confine myself exclusively to replying, as briefly as possible, to the objections which have been made to the bill now under consideration.

In the first place, I will notice the objections which have been brought forward by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Governor SMITH.] He objects to the passage of this bill, because he considers it a violation of the Constitution of the United States. I had hoped that I had met that objection satisfactorily in my opening speech upon this subject; but whether I succeeded in satisfying the gentleman from Virginia or not, to obviate all difficulty touching any constitutional question which may be involved, I will read in full the provision contained in the third section, fourth article, of the Constitution, to which I merely referred in my opening speech. The language is as follows:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

I think the power which this bill asserts is there clearly set forth in plain and positive language. But I will turn the attention of the gentleman from Virginia, and of the committee, to the exercise of that power by the Congress of the United States, which may be found by reference to the act, (United States Laws, volume 1, page 583, old edition,) by which four hundred acres of land were granted by Congress to each of the French and Canadian inhabitants who were settlers in Illinois.

To the act of March 3, 1791, by which five thousand four hundred acres were granted to the inhabitants of Vincennes.

To Statutes at Large, volume 1, page 442, by which twenty-four thousand acres of the public land were granted to the French inhabitants of Gallipolis.

To United States Statutes at Large, volume 1, page 257, by which one hundred thousand acres of land were granted to the Ohio Company of Associates, for each male person not less than eighteen years of age, being an actual settler.

I will also refer the honorable gentleman to the recent act of Congress of the 27th of February, 1850, by which donations of the public lands in the Territory of Oregon were made to actual settlers, varying in quantity from one hundred and sixty to six hundred and forty acres to each person. I never heard the constitutionality of that act called in question. Virginia herself, by a liberal policy, has made numerous and extensive grants of her lands for a mere nominal consideration, with a view to settlement and improvement.

But all doubt as to the constitutional power of Congress to make grants of the public domain to individuals, with a view to settlement and cultivation, vanishes on referring to the fact that Congress, by numerous acts, has granted to individuals, for military service, 24,841,979 acres, and for the construction of canals, railroads, internal improvements, and the improvement of navigable streams, 18,553,700 acres. Hence I think it a very late day for the gentleman from Virginia to interpose constitutional objections.

Another objection which the gentleman makes to the bill is, that it is not confined, in its provisions, to those who have no land. Why, I am surprised that an objection of that kind should be made. For my part, I utterly repudiate all restrictions or anything that may approximate to agrarianism in the disposition of the public lands. In all my speeches and remarks upon this question, I have endeavored to strip it of every objection of such a character. One of the great controlling considerations with me is to make the public domain productive, to secure its settlement, to increase the agricultural productions of the country, and, consequently, to increase the aggregate of the national wealth; to enlarge the basis of our commercial interests, to add to the national revenue, to build up our cities, to extend our commercial marine, so that the ocean shall be whitened with the sails of our commerce; to make us prosperous at home, and to people our broad country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Hence, the language of this bill has been carefully selected, so that its provisions may be extended to all. I would extend the privileges, which it proposes to confer, to every man, no matter how much property he may possess, if he is willing to abandon that property to make a settlement in the wilderness, to reclaim the waste and wet lands, to fell the forest, to make roads, to build towns, villages, churches, and school-houses, and to make it productive and prosperous.

Another objection which the gentleman opposes to this measure is, that a large portion of the population of this country is engaged in mechanical pursuits, and therefore that they cannot avail themselves of the privileges of this bill. Why, sir, it was never contemplated that this bill should force any one from his natural pursuit. It must be left entirely to the judgment of each man, and to the advantages it may promise him. Many of the mechanics of the New England States, and of the States situated on the sea-board, have already abandoned their mechanical pursuits, and have settled in the West. If others wish to do the same, they will have the privilege under this bill. If, on the other hand, they prefer to remain in the land of their birth, around those old court-houses, where civilization is positively retrograding, where population is comparatively diminishing, where energy is being exhausted, as it were—if they prefer to remain there, in that condition of things, why we of the West will offer no objection. We, who take pride in our noble streams; we, who gather energy from the magnificence and extent of our forests and prairies, from our smiling villages and cultivated fields, and the hum of industry that everywhere characterizes the onward march of the western people—for in the great valley of the Mississippi all is life, energy, and action; the rivers are covered with the most extensive commercial marine on the face of the globe, while the cities are the busy theaters of commercial industry—we will not then complain if you refuse to emigrate; we will not invade your domain, but we will permit you to enjoy it to the fullest extent.

Another objection which the gentleman has urged against this bill, and urged with vehemence, that is evidence of his sincerity and candor, is that the land granted by it will be forever exempt from taxation and from sale for debt. I regret that the honorable gentleman from Virginia did not examine the provisions of the bill with his usual care and ability, before he made that objection.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I did not say that it would be exempt forever.

Mr. DAWSON. Then for how long?

Mr. SMITH. The term provided for in the bill is five years.

Mr. DAWSON. Yes, sir, five years. Is there any objection to that? That is, as long as the title remains in the Government. If you strike that out, it will be a bill for the benefit of creditors, and not a homestead bill.

Mr. SMITH. Yet allow me for a moment, I will state, though the bill itself seems to contemplate an exemption for five years, that really it is so drawn as to make the exemption forever. If the gentleman will read it, he will see that the sentence is awkward, and bears that construction.

Mr. DAWSON. In order that there may be no difficulty about the language of the bill I shall read it. It is as follows:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all land acquired under the provisions of this act, shall, in no event, become liable to the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor."

"Prior to the issuing of the patent therefor." That exempts debts incurred prior to the issuing of the patent.

Mr. SMITH. Certainly; the land is not to be responsible for debts incurred prior to the issuing of a patent, and it is never to be responsible. It is to be in mortmain forever.

Mr. DAWSON. That is for the old debts?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWSON. That is what I want. It is an important and valuable provision; and I shall maintain it to the last.

Mr. SMITH. The land itself may be the seat of a town, and the man who owns it may be worth millions, and yet it cannot be responsible for debt.

Mr. DAWSON. That is supposing a remote improbability. The liability for debts contracted after the issuing of the patent commences at once; hence they will not go into mortmain for ever, as the gentleman supposes. It surprises me to hear that objection from a gentleman who resides in the Old Dominion, the mother of States and statesmen. I would ask him whether the lands in Virginia can be sold for debt?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. DAWSON. Since when?

Mr. SMITH. Ever since I can remember, in one way or the other.

Mr. DAWSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say, that, under the law of Virginia, the fee-simple in land can be sold for debt?

Mr. SMITH. Most assuredly.

Mr. DAWSON. How long has that been the case?

Mr. SMITH. Ever since I remember, and I am getting a little older than I like to remember. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWSON. That is new law to me.

Mr. SMITH. But it happens to be so. We in Virginia have always attached a value to land which we did not to chattels.

Mr. DAWSON. So do we in Pennsylvania. [Laughter.] It is a higher order of security. It is more reliable and more valuable; but I will not consume the time of the committee further. I live in a district of country bordering on Virginia, and once claimed by her, which, by the running of Mason and Dixon's line straight instead of crooked, secured to Pennsylvania, and lost to Virginia, a district of country as valuable as any upon the face of the globe of the same extent; and I never heard of that law before. On the contrary, all my knowledge, from observation and reading, has been that the fee-simple in lands there could not always and absolutely be sold for debt.

In Virginia, as I am informed, land could not be sold, at least until very recently, by ordinary process of law. You had then a process called elegit, by which you could have an equal half of a debtor's land rented out until a debt was paid by the rents. But you had no legal process, properly so called, by which you could have the land of a debtor sold for debt. It is true that where fraudulent conveyances were made, or other circumstances existed which would give jurisdiction to a court of equity, such court might, in order to do equity in other respects, decree a sale of the land, and that the creditor be paid out of the proceeds, but you could not, in a simple case of debt, by order of process of law, sell the lands of the debtor.

I take it then, Mr. Chairman, that I have met all the objections which have been urged by the gentleman from Virginia. Having done that, and there being with me nothing for display, nothing for exhibition, I shall resume my seat, satisfied with the bill, and the true national policy it contemplates.

Mr. HENN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. OLDS) reported to the House that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the Union generally, and especially House bill No. 37—being the homestead bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STRAUB. Is it now in order to offer an amendment to the homestead bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill is not now before the House; it is still before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, consequently, it is not now in order to move an amendment to it.

Mr. GREEN, from the Committee on Enrolled

Bills, reported back, as correctly enrolled, bills of the following titles:

"Joint resolution authorizing supplementary contract for certain marble for the Capitol extension;" and

"An act for the relief of John O. Means."

Which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker.

Mr. DISNEY. I remark that there are several bills upon the Speaker's table, which ought to be referred. I therefore move that we proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, (interrupting.) There is an act before the House, which should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I therefore move to proceed to the regular order of business.

THE BOUNTY LAND BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands the regular order of business, which is the pending motion to lay on the table the following bill, and accompanying report and letter from the Secretary of the Interior:

"A bill extending the provisions of the several laws granting lands to the officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States."

Mr. BISSELL. I would announce, that if the motion to lay the bill on the table do not prevail, I will move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, which is the proper reference.

The SPEAKER. A motion is pending, made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

A MEMBER. Was not there a demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the gentleman from South Carolina called for the previous question, but he afterwards withdrew the demand.

Mr. ORR. I renew the motion to lay the bill and report upon the table.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. FLORENCE. Were not the yeas and nays asked for, and refused before on this question?

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays were refused upon another proposition yesterday—upon the first proposition, which was to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ROBBINS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ROBBINS and VAIL were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—yeas 56, noes 72.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FLORENCE. The question now recurs upon my motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a privileged question. I move that when this House adjourn it adjourn to meet on Thursday next. To-morrow being the 22d of February, I do not think this House ought to be in session.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will it be in order to move to amend the motion by inserting "that the Clerk be requested, at twelve o'clock to-morrow, to read from the desk Washington's Farewell Address?"

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order.

The question was then put; and there were, on a division—yeas 113, noes 34.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] that the bill and accompanying report be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that they be printed. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BISSELL] moves also that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAMILTON. I demand the previous question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask if the demand for the previous question is not pending; was it not made previous to my making a motion to lay the bill upon the table?

The SPEAKER. Action has been had upon the bill since the motion of the gentleman was made.

The demand for the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was then taken upon Mr. FLORENCE's motion; and there were—yeas 103, noes not counted.

So the bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire simply to suggest to the House, as we have agreed to adjourn over until Thursday, whether it would not be well to clear the Speaker's table?

Mr. WHEELER. I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by Mr. MACHEN, its Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate insist upon their second amendment, disagreed to by the House, to the bill of the House, (No. 135,) entitled "An act for the relief of the United States troops who were sufferers by the recent disaster to the steamship San Francisco," ask a conference with the House on the said disagreeing vote, and have appointed Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. JAMES C. JONES, the managers of the said conference, on their part.

Also, that they had passed a joint resolution of this House, (No. 15,) authorizing a supplemental contract for certain marble for the Capitol extension, without amendment.

Also, that they had passed a bill of the Senate, (No. 217,) entitled "An act appointing commissioners to ascertain certain facts relative to private land claims in the Territory of Michigan."]

Mr. DE WITT, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported, as correctly enrolled, a bill of the following title, which received the signature of the Speaker:

"An act for the extension of the preëmption privilege in the State of California."

Mr. WHEELER. I now renew the motion that the House adjourn.

The question was put; and, upon a division, there were—yeas 67, nays 64.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask for tellers upon the question.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to, and, at half-past three o'clock, the House adjourned until Thursday next.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 23, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of Tuesday was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the credentials of Hon. WILLIAM PITT FESSENDEN, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Maine, a Senator from that State, for the term of six years from the 4th of March last; which were read; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. FESSENDEN, he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS presented the credentials of Hon. STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, elected a Senator from Illinois for six years from the 4th of March last; which had not been received when Mr. DOUGLAS was sworn in on the 4th of March. They were read, and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Department of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 14th instant, in relation to the hospital for the insane of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Navy Department, transmitting eighty copies of the Navy Register for the use of the Senate; which was ordered to lie on the table.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I have a petition to present, which is but the forerunner of many others. It asks the interposition of this Government with foreign Powers, where such interposition is required, in order to secure to American citizens abroad the enjoyment of religious worship while living, and a place of sepulture, and the rights of Christian burial when dead. And strange is it that such demands are rendered necessary by the arrogance of earthly presumption, in this day of knowledge and searching inquiry. But so it is; and public opinion in this country is awakening to the interest of this question; and it is time that our voice should be heard and heeded.

The freedom of religious worship is a subject which belongs to the kingdom of God, and not to the kingdom of man; and no human ruler can interfere with it without equal injustice and presumption. Of course we claim no right to interpose between other Governments and their own people, except, indeed, the right of judgment and of condemnation, common to all countries not crushed by the foot of the oppressor, when such acts of revolting tyranny occur as to shock the feelings of mankind. But when American citizens are the sufferers, it is the undeniable duty of this Government to take all such measures as are justified by the laws of nations, to insure their protection and the exercise of right which ought to be wholly without the scope of political institutions, as they are without just authority.

I propose, sir, at some convenient time, when the Senate is less engaged than at present, to move the reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, of the excellent report made last session upon similar petitions, by a most estimable member [Mr. Underwood] now no longer among us; and upon that occasion I shall ask to be heard in relation to this general subject. Independent of the momentous principles involved in it, and which, of themselves, furnish a sufficient motive for examination, I have another, which is personal to myself. It will probably be recollected by some of the Senators that I submitted a few remarks to this body when the question was first before us.

Our proceedings, and particularly my share of them, were reviewed with some severity by Archbishop Hughes in a letter signed by himself, and published in the papers after our adjournment. I do not object at all to that course, though certainly I must have been greatly misunderstood, judging by some of the sentiments imputed to me. Now, sir, I propose, not so much to review the review as to redeem myself from misapprehension, and to reassert and maintain my true views. And while I shall execute this task with all the respect due to the personal character and to the high position of this distinguished prelate, I shall do it with the freedom which belongs equally to the subject and to my own position as a member of this great depository of so much of the national power. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. SHIELDS. I present the petition of Ithiel S. Richardson, the inventor and patentee of what is called the atmospheric telegraph. He is desirous that a select committee should be formed to investigate this invention; and if they approve of it, he asks a small appropriation to make an experiment between here and Baltimore. He says that $5,000 will enable him to construct this telegraph for ten miles. It will convey packages, mails, or any other matter necessary to be conveyed, at a speed exceeding five hundred miles an hour, and will convey a weight exceeding five thousand pounds. He states that if it succeeds for ten miles, he will expect an appropriation to enable him to take it on to Baltimore. The whole amount of the appropriation which he now asks, is that which would be sufficient to make the trial for ten miles, and that will be only $5,000. I move that a select committee be appointed to investigate the character and nature of this invention; the committee to consist of five members, and to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS presented the petition of Cornelius Coffey, late a private in the United States Army, praying to be allowed bounty land; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of Thomas Bassuet, praying the aid of Congress to enable him to test by experiments his theory of meteorology. The petitioner states that if his discovery had been known at the time of the loss of the San Francisco it might have been applied so as to prevent the loss of that vessel. The petition was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a petition of citizens of Calumet, Illinois, praying the removal of the bar from the mouth of Calumet river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of Arabella Riley, widow of Major General Bennet Riley, of the Army, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, five petitions of widows of officers of the Army who have died in the service since the war with Mexico, most of them of disease contracted during the war, praying to be allowed half pay for five years; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EVERETT. I have been requested to present the memorial of inhabitants of Nantucket, praying the erection of a breakwater, for the purpose of deepening the water in the harbor at that place. They represent that that harbor is the only place of refuge for a distance of one hundred miles; and that, through the sound between that island and the main land, there pass every year, by probable computation, not less than forty thousand vessels; and that, as there are but seven feet depth of water upon the bar, it is impossible for vessels of any size, in stress of weather, to take refuge in that place.

They state in this petition that on the afternoon preceding the assembling of the town meeting at which this memorial was unanimously adopted, sixty-eight vessels passed the light-boat in the sound bound for the east. At eleven o'clock on the same evening a gale came on, and only fourteen were near enough to get back to Martha's Vineyard, which is a safe port, and most of those that could not retreat were driven upon the shore, and several entire crews perished in the storm. It was probably in consequence of that event that the meeting was held at which this memorial was unanimously adopted. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVERETT presented the petition of George Harlow and others, owners of the schooner Argo, of Plymouth, Massachusetts, praying that they may be allowed the usual bounty on their vessel; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PEARCE presented the memorial of General Nathan Towson, for himself, David R. Whitely, and other members of Captain Towson's artillery, in the war of 1812, praying to be paid for the capture of the British ship Caledonia; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the petition of the heirs of Mountjoy Bayly, a captain in the Maryland line in the war of the Revolution, asking to be allowed interest on commutation; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. FOOT presented a remonstrance of citizens of Clarendon, Vermont, against the abrogation of the Missouri compromise; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MALLORY presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce and citizens of Appalachicola, praying an appropriation for the erection of a marine hospital at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORTON presented the memorial of Jasper Strong and George Terrill, praying authority to construct a railroad from the Perdido river to the Bay of Pensacola, near the town of Warrington, Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the presented a petition of citizens of West Florida, praying the establishment of a new land district in Florida, west of the Chattahoochee river; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the memorial of Joseph Tatnall, junior, a purser in the Navy, praying to be indemnified for losses sustained while purser of the United States ship Dale, on the coast of Africa; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the memorial of Manuel Hernandez, praying a tract of land equivalent to one purchased by him, the title to which was confirmed by the commissioners of land claims in Florida, but the land subsequently sold by the United States to another person; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. COOPER presented the petition of James

A. Glanding, praying a pension on account of a wound received in the defense of Baltimore in 1814; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petitions of Phoebe Hascall, of New York, late widow of Sidney Smith, a captain in the United States Navy, praying a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the following petitions, &c., protesting against a violation of the Missouri compromise, which were ordered to lie on the table:

Two petitions of inhabitants of the State of Michigan;

Proceedings of a meeting of citizens of Rochester, New York;

Proceedings of a meeting of mechanics and others, citizens of New York;

Three petitions of citizens of the State of New York;

Petition of fifty-five of the legal voters of Evans, Erie county, New York;

Petition of fifty-seven of the legal voters of Evans, Erie county, New York; and Petition of fifty-six of the legal voters of Erie county, New York.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented two petitions of citizens of the United States, praying the repair of the wharves and piers at Marcus Hook, in the Delaware river; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, fifty-four petitions of citizens of Philadelphia, praying that the United States Mint may not be removed from that city; which were reported to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, presented a memorial of a convention of the Baptists of West Tennessee, praying the adoption of measures to secure religious toleration to American citizens in foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DAWSON presented the memorial of William Harris, praying to be allowed pay for the term of five years which he served in the war of 1812, as sergeant in the eighth regiment of United States infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BAYARD presented two petitions of citizens of the State of Delaware, praying that in the organization of Nebraska, or any other Territory, by law, the principle of non-intervention by Congress in the institution of slavery, either in the States or Territories, as recognized in the compromise legislation of 1850, may be adhered to; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHASE presented the following petitions against the passage of any bill now, or at any future period, to introduce slavery into Nebraska; which were ordered to lie on the table:

Petition of Samuel Burwell and others, citizens of Berlin, Holmes county, Ohio;

Petition of 49 citizens of Stark county, Ohio;

Petition of William T. Reese and others, citizens of Guernsey and Noble counties, Ohio;

Resolutions of a public meeting of the citizens of Delaware, Ohio;

Petition of Benjamin Sale and others, citizens of Stark, Carroll, and Columbiana counties, Ohio;

Petition of D. M. Moore and others, citizens of Greenfield, Highland county, Ohio;

Petition of P. Dow and others, citizens of Pennsylvania;

Petition of citizens of Washington county, Pennsylvania;

Petition of John A. English and numerous citizens of Pennsylvania;

Petition of William Marot and numerous citizens of Pennsylvania;

Petition of E. Bemiz and others, citizens of Washington county, Pennsylvania; and Petition of 64 citizens of Wayne Centre, Illinois.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented four petitions of citizens of Iowa, praying that a grant of land may be made to aid in the construction of the Fort Madison, West Point, Keosauqua, and Bloomfield railroad; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of John P. Gaines in behalf of persons residing in the Territory of Oregon who are entitled to bounty land, respecting the location thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That the petition of David Felker be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Richard Chany be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, in order to be presented in the House of Representatives.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition of John E. Martin be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. PETTIT, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill authorizing a patent to be issued to Peter Poncin for certain lands therein named, reported it back without amendment, together with a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas S. Russell, praying compensation for services performed in the Seminole Indian war, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Asbury Dickens, praying to be allowed the difference between the pay of a chief clerk in the Treasury and State Departments, and that of the heads of those Departments, during the time he performed the duties of the heads of those Departments, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred the documents relating to the claim of John Metcalf, praying remuneration for property lost during the last war with Great Britain, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills from the House of Representatives, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed:

"Bill for the relief of Benjamin Rowe;"

"Bill for the relief of John Hamilton;"

"Bill for the relief of Parmelia Slavin, late the wife of John Blue, deceased;" and

"Bill for the relief of Alton Nelson."

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the memorials of Jeremiah Simmons and Joseph Penley, two of the Dartmoor prisoners during the last war with Great Britain, praying pensions, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ADAMS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of John R. Jefferson, of Mississippi, praying compensation for carrying the mail, and damages for the annulment of his contract by the Postmaster General, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the heirs of John Burnham, praying remuneration for losses sustained by the capture of the ship Hope by an Algerine cruiser, in 1793, submitted an adverse report thereon.

PORT OF ENTRY AT KEOKUK.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making Keokuk, in Iowa, a port of entry and delivery.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am instructed, by the Committee on Public Lands, to report a bill for the relief of settlers on land reserved for railroad purposes. I ask that the bill may now be read through, and put upon its passage. It is a matter of some urgency. It is necessary for the public interest, and to secure private rights. I therefore ask the Senate to consider the bill at once.

The bill was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to allow settlers on the public lands, (which have been or may be withdrawn from

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 30.

market in consequence of proposed railroads,) who had settled thereon, prior to the withdrawal, the right of preëmption, at the ordinary minimum price, to the lands settled and cultivated by them; with a provision that they shall prove their rights, according to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior; and shall pay for their lands before the day which may be fixed by the President's proclamation for their restoration to market.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is for the public interest that the bill should pass at once; and I will explain the circumstances which render it necessary. The lands which have been granted to two or three of the States for railroad purposes are now withdrawn from the market, but the title is yet in the United States, and we still have power to legislate with regard to them. Prospectively, the United States have parted with them; they have been withdrawn from the market for the purpose of protecting the interests of the grants which have been made to the States themselves; and under these circumstances no action can be taken by those who are actual settlers upon the lands.

There is a provision in the preëmption law which requires thirty days' notice to be given by any one, who is an actual settler on the public lands, and designs to claim a preëmption right. These reservations having come in unexpectedly, before they have given that notice, they are cut off from the benefits of the general preëmption law. The same thing may occur with respect to railroad grants, which may be made hereafter, if any shall be made. The reservation having taken effect before the thirty days' notice has been given, the settlers are cut off and cannot now come forward, enter their land, and pay the money into the Treasury of the United States and secure their own rights.

The object of this bill is to enable them, notwithstanding that reservation—where they are bona fide settlers, and where they shall conform to the rules which may be laid down to secure truthful and fair action in the premises by the Secretary of the Interior—to come in and enter those lands. It is for the interest of the Government of the United States that this should be done. It is for the protection of a class of people who are not generally well read, or well informed, and who were not aware that they were cut off by the provision requiring thirty days' notice, and who did not anticipate that the reservations would act so hardly upon them.

It is consistent with the feelings of the people of the States themselves where these grants have been made for railroad purposes. If it takes off from anybody it is from the railroad grantees—from the States which have received railroad grants, and it gives the land to those who were entitled to it before, in obedience to other laws.

If this bill be not passed at once, and either of the States to whom grants have already been made should perfect the terms upon which they are to receive the lands before these parties can secure their preëmption, the consequence will be that the preëmptors will be cut off entirely, and the States will get the lands. The settlers will lose the land, and the Government of the United States will lose the money, which otherwise would have been put into the Treasury. The bill is just and right, and I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to ask that it be passed at once.

No amendment being proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. PEARCE, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to direct the reëxamination of the accounts between the United States and the State of Maryland; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

TELEGRAPH TO THE PACIFIC.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I reported some days ago a bill from the Committee on Territories to authorize the construction of a telegraphic line from some point on the Pacific to some point on the Mississippi. I am now directed by that committee to move the printing of five thousand additional copies of the bill and report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART in the chair.) The motion goes to the Committee on Printing.

Subsequently, Mr. HAMLIN, from the committee, reported in favor of printing the additional number, and the report was concurred in.

LONDON EXHIBITION.

Mr. PEARCE. The Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States, requesting some action of Congress in relation to the volumes and medals illustrative of the exhibition in London, in 1851, have instructed me to report "a joint resolution accepting certain volumes and medals presented by her Britannic Majesty's Government to the United States." I am also instructed by the committee to ask that it be considered at this time.

The joint resolution was read twice by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Government of the United States to accept the volumes and medals, and that they be placed in the library of Congress; and further, that a copy of the resolution be communicated to the British Government, in such a manner as the President of the United States may see proper.

Mr. PEARCE. There are five of those volumes. Four of them contain the awards of the juries, and one the report of the commissioners. There are three volumes of illustrated catalogues, and one of medals. The whole form a beautiful and useful series of works illustrative of the objects of utility and art which were in that remarkable exhibition. They were presented by the British Government, through their minister here, in an official communication to our Government on the subject. This was done in a spirit of international courtesy which should be reciprocated. It is deemed proper, therefore, that Congress should accept them in the form now proposed. I think there can be no objection to the passage of the resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. PEARCE, it was Ordered, That the message of the President, and the accompanying documents, be printed.

PATENT OFFICE CONTRACT.

Mr. COOPER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to lay before the Senate the report of the examination and measurement made of the work and materials furnished by contract for the construction of the wing of the Patent Office, as ordered by the act of August, 1852, together with a statement showing the amount of payments made on account of said contract since the passage of said act.

MANUSCRIPT CENSUS RETURNS.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution for its consideration at this time.

Unanimous consent was given, and the joint resolution was read a first time. It is as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the late superintending clerk of the census be permitted to use such of the manuscripts now in the census office, as by him may be deemed necessary for the preparation of his work on the manufactures of the United States; and for their safe keeping and return the Secretary of the Interior may require such security as in his judgment may be deemed proper.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I wish to state in a few words the object of the joint resolution. This gentleman is about preparing a work on the manufactures and mechanic arts of the United States. In the preparation of that work he desires to use certain unused portions of the census returns. Nearly all the census returns have been printed. There were some, however, taken which were not published, and this gentleman wishes to use them. He will give security for their safe return; and, besides that, he proposes to give a consideration. He proposes for the use of the papers, on the completion of the work, to give a copy to each of the Departments of the Government, and to furnish copies to all the members of Congress, and to each State library in the Union. If these returns are not published, but continue to lie in the office, of course they can be of no use. This proposition will make them useful to the public. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I should prefer that the resolution should go over.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think the Superintendent of the Census Bureau ought to be consulted before we adopt the proposition, because some of the files of that bureau may be essentially necessary to be retained there.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I think the resolution contains every provision that may be necessary. It is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, in whose Department this bureau is.

Mr. SHIELDS. I suggest that it should be left to the Superintendent of the Census.

Mr. HAMLIN. It seems to me that this is somewhat novel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator that the consideration of the joint resolution at this time is objected to by the Senator from Alabama, and therefore it cannot now be considered.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I withdraw the objection, if the Senator from Maine desires to proceed.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will suggest to the Senator from Alabama that it would be desirable to refer the resolution to the Committee on Printing. The Senator knows that that committee has the subject now before them.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I have no objection to that direction.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I have no objection. Let it go to the committee.

The joint resolution was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

THE SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. SHIELDS. I had intended this morning to call up the joint resolution reported from the select committee in relation to the rescuers of the troops, passengers, and crew on board the steamship San Francisco, but, as I fear it would interfere with my honorable friend from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] who has the floor this morning to address the Senate upon another question, I will defer it until to-morrow morning. I hope the Senator from California [Mr. GWIN] will then be prepared to permit it to be called up.

Mr. GWIN. To-morrow is private bill day, and I suppose it cannot be taken up then; but I do not desire it to be delayed on my account. There is, however, certain information which I wish to lay before the Senate, containing the views of the minority of the committee on the subject. I will hereafter present a statement in regard to it.

TERRITORY OF NEBRASKA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill to organize the Territory of Nebraska.

Mr. TOOMBS addressed the Senate for upwards of an hour and a half in favor of the bill. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. HUNTER obtained the floor.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator from Virginia will give way. It is now too late in the day to commence a speech, and there is a bill before the Senate providing for the increase of the steam vessels of the Navy, which I wish to have acted upon immediately. I therefore move, if the Senator from Virginia consents, that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. HUNTER. I am willing to yield.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

STEAM FRIGATES.

Mr. GWIN. I now move that the Senate take up for consideration the bill to authorize the construction of six steam frigates, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be constructed for the United States Navy, at as early a day as practicable, consistently with a due regard for economy and efficiency, six first-class steam frigates, to be provided with screw propellers, and properly armed and equipped for service; the vessels and machinery to be built by contract, or in the Government navy-yards, as the Secretary of the Navy may think most advisable for the public interest, and to appropriate $3,000,000, to be expended under his direction, for the purpose mentioned, and for altering, completing, and launching the frigates Santee, at Kittery, and Sabine, at New York.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I may state that this bill has met with the approval of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the other House, and has been reported to that body, but has lain there for two months without being taken up for consideration. It is in exact accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, and, I believe, meets with the concurrence of the whole Senate. I have not heard any opposition to it. It is a matter of pressing importance, and should be acted on now. The Secretary states that if the bill becomes a law, he wishes to begin immediately with the construction of the vessels.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read a third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 23, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of Tuesday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated the regular order of business to be the call of committees for reports.

MISSOURI COMPROMISE.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a communication which I have received this morning. I ask that it may be read for information.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following communication, for information:

NEW YORK, February 20, 1854.

SIR: On behalf of several thousand working-men and other citizens of this city, who assembled in mass meeting on Saturday evening, 18th instant, to express their sentiments in regard to the repeal of the Missouri compromise, I have the honor to address to you a report of their proceedings on that occasion, and to request you, in pursuance of the last resolution contained therein, to present these proceedings to the House of Representatives, at the earliest convenient opportunity, that that honorable body may be officially advised of the sentiments of the working-men of the city of New York on the momentous question now pending before Congress and agitating the country.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH P. SIMPSON, President.

Mr. WHEELER. I now ask that the proceedings of the meeting may be read.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I believe the old rule of the House provided that any member who desired to present a memorial should state briefly its contents, and then have it referred. If the gentleman from New York will follow this course, I am willing that the business of the House shall be waived for that purpose, although against the rule recently adopted; but if he proposes to have it read at length I shall object, and call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina calls for the regular order of business. Reports are in order from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have no objection to the reference of the memorial. What I objected to was its reading.

Mr. WHEELER. I will state that the communication I have presented is the proceedings of a meeting of the working-men of the city of New York, protesting against the repeal of the Missouri compromise. I ask that it be referred to the proper committee.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I do not see the propriety of presenting the proceedings of private meetings in the city of New York, or in any other portion of the Union, in open House. The rule provides that they may be presented and referred at the Clerk's desk, and I ask that the rule may be adhered to.

The SPEAKER. The communication can only be received and referred by unanimous consent. Objection is made, and it cannot therefore be received.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I ask that the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SOLLERS,] who sits near me, in consequence of the indisposition under which he is suffering, may be allowed to sit with his hat on.

There was no objection, and the proposition was assented to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER presented to the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of June 14, 1848, a transcript of the Army Register for the year ending June 30, 1853, which was laid upon the table.

Mr. ELLISON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a petition, and have it referred.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object, and insist upon the regular order of business.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER then proceeded to the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WARREN. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back the memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, asking for a law granting one hundred and sixty acres of land to soldiers of the various wars, without regard to the time of service, and ask that the same do lie upon the table.

I will simply remark that this petition is upon the same subject which was before the House two or three days ago, and having been disposed of by the House, I make this motion with reference to it.

Mr. FLORENCE. Previous to making any motion, I desire to ask a single question. The bill introduced by myself some time since, granting bounty lands to the soldiers who had been engaged in the military service of the United States, was the other day, by the action of the House, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I desire to know whether the various memorials and papers then accompanying that bill will also be referred to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. They were not; they were laid upon the table.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I have no objection to the reference which the gentleman from Arkansas now proposes.

The memorial was accordingly ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. WARREN also, from the same committee, reported back House bill (No. 74) "granting the right of way, and making a grant of land, to the State of Arkansas, to aid in the construction of a railroad from a point on the southwest boundary of the State of Missouri, in a line from Springfield, Missouri, to Bentonville, Arkansas, via Bentonville, Fayetteville, Van Buren, and Fort Smith, to the southern boundary north of the Red River Raft, to be denominated the Western Border railroad," with an amendment, in the form of a substitute; which, with the amendment, was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, made the order of the day for tomorrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Michigan, from the same committee, reported a bill for the establishment of a land office in the Lower Peninsula of Michigan; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask that the bill may be put upon its passage.

The bill was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed. It seems to me that the chief object of the bill is to provide for somebody who wants an office in the State of Michigan. I think there are enough of them provided for already, without providing for others hastily, and without investigation.

Mr. STEVENS. I will merely say, in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, that his supposition is erroneous, and that the bill is not designed to give an appointment to anybody. The object is to meet the public interests in that part of the State of Michigan. The report of the Commissioner of Public Lands will satisfy any candid and ingenuous man that such is the fact.

Mr. LETCHER. It seems to me that this is a matter of no great moment any way, as the public lands are now going. Gentlemen from the West claim the whole of the public lands; and, I presume, from the intimations which have been made upon this floor, that, sooner or later, they will have the power to assert that claim. Then why put the Government to this additional expense, especially when there has been no opportunity to investigate the bill, or to know anything about the necessity for its passage?

Mr. STEVENS. It is proposed to locate this office at the northern end of the lower peninsula of the State of Michigan. There is now no land office within two hundred miles of that spot, with the exception of the one at the Sault Ste. Marie, which it is very difficult to reach. The other two land offices in this district are at least two hundred miles away from the section of country intended to be benefited by this location, and can only be reached at certain seasons of the year, in consequence of the lakes being frozen up and navigation discontinued; and, at any time, it is attended with a great deal of expense for a man desiring to locate lands to reach those offices. I know an instance of a man who went through the Straits of Mackinaw to locate a forty acre lot at the land office at Flint, and on arriving there he found that the lot had been located by another party. He thus incurred an expense equal to the price of the land. If there is any spot in the State of Michigan, or in the United States, where a land office would be beneficial, it is this very place that I am now talking about, and where I wish to have the office located.

The question was then put on Mr. LETCHER's motion; and, on a division, there were—ayes 46.

Mr. LETCHER. I demand tellers on the motion.

Mr. HAVEN. I listened with great attention, for the purpose of possessing myself with the features of the bill, but I was unable to do so. Now, I am quite willing and desirous to accommodate the gentleman from Michigan, if there be nothing objectionable in the bill. I am quite satisfied that the gentlemen in this part of the Hall cannot vote understandingly unless the bill be again read. I did not hear the explanation of the gentleman from Michigan, though I listened with attention.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be again read.

Mr. DISNEY. I apprehend that there is hardly a gentleman in the House who will hesitate to vote for the bill, after a few moments' consideration of the facts of the case. They are few, and may be briefly stated. It is simply proposed to provide for the location and establishment of a land office at the extreme northern point of the lower peninsula of Michigan—that region of the State where there is a large quantity of the public land. Many people have to go one hundred and two hundred miles south to find a land office. Now, the only question involved is, whether the Government will create this additional land office, in view of the great convenience thereby to be afforded to the people of that remote region of country, and exempt them from traveling some two hundred miles to locate small tracts of land. That is all about it. I repeat that I am satisfied, from the very nature of the case, that there is not a gentleman on this floor who would hesitate to vote for the bill, on being acquainted with the facts. There is nothing in the bill but provision for the location and establishment of a land office at that remote portion of the State of Michigan.

Mr. WENTWORTH. It is said around me that the bill makes a land grant.

Mr. DISNEY. No, sir; it only provides for the establishment of a land office.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Let the bill be read, so that we may know exactly what are its provisions. The bill was again read through.

Mr. HAVEN. I believe that we in this part of the House now understand the bill. It is for the location and establishment of a land office in a new and remote country; and if the bill comes from the Committee on Public Lands and meets with their approbation, as I understand it does, I hope it will pass.

Mr. MORGAN. I would ask the gentleman from Michigan how many land offices there are now in that State; and how near the nearest of them is to that proposed to be established by this bill?

Mr. STEVENS. There are only five land offices in the State of Michigan. One of them is located in the city of Detroit, one at Kalamazoo, one at Ionia, one at Flint, in Genesee county, and one at Sault Ste. Marie; making, in all, five land offices in the State. In the northern part of the State there is no office, and the nearest one to that proposed to be located is that at Sault Ste. Marie, which is over a hundred miles distant.

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to know whether the bill proposes to abolish—

The SPEAKER, (interrupting.) The gentleman from New York [Mr. MORGAN] has the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Virginia to propose his question.

Mr. LETCHER. The question I desire to ask from the gentleman from Michigan is, whether we cannot abolish some of the old land offices when this new one is created; whether there is any sort of necessity to keep them all open there?

Mr. DISNEY. If the gentleman from Virginia would reflect a moment he would remember that there is a law on the statute-book which provides for the discontinuance of a land office in a district where the amount of public lands in that district is less than a hundred thousand acres. There can be no office unless that or a larger amount of public lands is in the district. The Committee on Public Lands have considered the whole matter in this bill, and it is to be supposed they have done so with fairness, as they understand all the facts.

Mr. WENTWORTH said the passage of this bill would assist very much to break up one of the greatest abuses existing under the General Government. The lands in that region were very much in demand for their timber, and, for want of a land office there, the people were too much in the habit of taking the timber without buying the land; which they would be the last to do if there was a land office there. People went to the timber country and made their selections; and, having done so, they dared not leave them to be gone several weeks to enter them.

The establishment of this office would do much towards doing away with our present system of keeping up what is called "the timber agency." Men are sent out there to prevent timber stealing. But they do not do any such thing. Their friends, and those who pay tribute to them, steal all they please. Others are allowed to steal and get the lumber to the vessel. Then the agents seize it, sell it, and put the money in their own pockets; and if the depredator complains, these agents persecute the depredators to penury and want in our United States courts.

These agents have collected hundreds of thousands of dollars, but they have never paid one dollar into the Treasury; and they are now prosecuting honest men in our courts, merely because they—having mistaken section lines, after having given up all their lumber and paid damages—have sent me vouchers to show the Secretary of the Interior, to prove that, while they were sent out to keep men from stealing lumber, they themselves are stealing money; or, what is the same thing, taking money and not paying it into the Treasury.

I am for getting rid of these agents. They have imposed upon the Government long enough. They have oppressed western lumber men long enough. And, as one of the best means thereof, I hope this office will be established. I therefore move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Tellers have been demanded on the proposition to refer the bill.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to be printed; which question was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The House divided; and the question was decided in the affirmative—89 rising in support of it.

The bill having been engrossed, it was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. DISNEY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the memorial and papers of William Darby, be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

LANDS FOR RAILROADS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. DISNEY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report to the House, Senate bill No. 149, "granting a portion of the public land to the State of Wisconsin, to aid in the construction of a railroad and a branch road in that State," with an amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the House by its title.

The amendment reported by the committee was to add at the close of section first, the following:

Provided, That no land on either side of said road, south of Janesville, shall be granted to the State of Wisconsin by virtue of any provision of this act.

Mr. DISNEY. It seems to be desirable that this bill should be put upon its passage. Perhaps, in that view, it may not be amiss to say a word or two, and but a word or two, in relation to it.

This bill provides for the grant of land in the State of Wisconsin for the purpose of constructing two railroads, one from the southern boundary of the State, running northerly by way of Janesville, in Rock county, and Fon du Lac, on Lake Winnebago, to such point on Lake Superior as may be designated under the authority of that State; and for the construction of a branch road from Janesville, by way of Madison, to the St. Croix river, near the falls thereof, in said State.

From Janesville south there is a road being constructed which connects that town with Chicago, and thence, by existing railroads, with other portions of the Union. The bill, as it came from the Senate, extends this grant down to the southern boundary of the State. But as a portion of the road between Chicago and the town of Janesville is, in fact, substantially constructed, or being constructed, and the means provided therefor, we thought it not politic, upon the part of the Government, to aid in the construction of that part of the road; hence the committee have recommended the amendment which has been read, which is to strike out so much thereof as refers to lands which lie south of the town of Janesville.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a question of order. Does the Speaker decide that when a bill has been sent to us from the Senate, and is read a first and second time for the purpose of reference, and afterwards it is reported back, it must not be again read a first, second, and third time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the bill received its first and second reading, under the rules of the House, before its reference, and the question is now upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. MILLSON. I did not understand the Chair to decide that it was read when referred to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does so decide; and that it is now before this body, upon ordering it to a third reading. The question, however, is first upon the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I wish to inquire whether a motion to commit this bill to the Committee of the Whole House would not have priority?

Mr. DISNEY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. Then I make that motion.

Mr. DISNEY. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] does not yield the floor for the purpose of any such motion.

Mr. SMITH. I thought the gentleman said that such a motion had priority?

Mr. DISNEY. I did say so; but the gentleman cannot make the motion while I occupy the floor.

I was about proceeding to state, Mr. Speaker, that those two roads were intended to place the central and northern parts of the State in direct communication with the Atlantic States of the Union. They traverse a portion of the State which now constitutes a part of the public domain, upon which there are vast tracts of public lands not now alienated from the General Government, but still remaining in its possession and ownership. The amount of land which would be granted by the provisions of this act is about two millions and a half of acres. Viewing the bill as the committee have considered it, all I may be allowed to state to the House is, that my advocacy of railroads is limited to those cases, and those only, where individual proprietors, owning the same lands with the Federal Government, through which it was proposed to construct said roads, would deem it a matter of pecuniary advantage and sound policy to have them constructed.

I make this remark in order to get behind all questions of constitutional objection. The committee decided, and it has been conceded by every one who has given any attention to this matter, that the General Government, as the owner of this public domain, has the right to make such disposition of it as shall enhance its general value, under that general clause of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations in regard to the Territories of the Union. This view of the question has been sanctioned by our present Executive, and the advantages to result from it have been set forth in the report of the Secretary of the Interior, during the present session of Congress, and sustained, too, by the opinions of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his reference to the past experience and the results which have ensued from similar grants. Besides all this, even Mr. Calhoun himself has heretofore avowed and sustained this very doctrine; and, with the permission of the House, in order that they may understand precisely the views of the committee in regard to the position we occupy as to the pending bill, and all similar bills, I now beg leave to call their attention to a passage from the report made by Mr. Calhoun, in 1846:

"Your committee will next proceed to consider that portion of the memorial which relates to the communication by railroads between the valley of the Mississippi and the southern Atlantic States. They regard works of the kind as belonging to internal improvements, (that is, improvements within the body of the States,) and, as such, are, in their opinion, not embraced in the power to regulate commerce. But they are, nevertheless, of the opinion that where such roads, or other works of internal improvements, may pass through public lands, the United States may contribute to their construction, in their character of proprietors, to the extent that they may be enhanced in price thereby. This has usually been done by ceding alternate sections on the projected line of such works; and it is believed that no mode of contributing, more fair or better calculated to guard against abuses, can be devised. That Congress has a right to make such contributions, where there is reasonable ground to believe that the public lands will be enhanced in proportion, under its right to dispose of the 'territory and other public property of the United States,' your committee cannot doubt. In making this assertion they hold to the rule of strict construction, and that this power, like all the other powers of the Government, is a trust power, and, as such, is strictly limited by the nature and object of the trust. In this case the rule requires that the lands, and other public property of the United States, should be disposed of to the best advantage; and where that can be done by contributing a portion to works which would make the residue equally or more valuable than the whole would be without it, as is supposed, they hold it would be strictly within the rule. Your committee go further. They are of the opinion, not only that Congress has the right to contribute to the extent stated, in such cases, but that it is in duty bound to do so, as the representative of a part of the proprietors of the land to be benefited. It would be neither just nor fair for it to stand by and realize the advantage they would derive from the work without contributing a due proportion towards its construction. It would be still less justifiable to refuse to contribute, if its effects should be to defeat a work, the construction of which, while it would enhance the value of the land belonging to the public, and that of individual proprietors, would promote the prosperity of the country generally."

In all this I fully concur, as I remarked a moment ago. I take occasion, however, to say, that in the course of the present session of Congress I shall show, in a report which I shall present in connection with another bill, what I hold to be a strictly constitutional rule with regard to the power of the Government in the disposition of its public lands. I repeat, sir, that I only make these remarks now in order to show the members of the House that, in reference to the pending bill, there is no question of constitutional law involved. It is simply a practical question, addressing itself to the good sense of the gentlemen of the House. It is simply a question whether they will make such donations of the public lands as will enhance the value of the public domain, carrying along with it all those auxiliary considerations of the great general benefit it will confer, and the immense pecuniary benefit it will bring to the State of Wisconsin in this particular case.

There can be no doubt that the donation of these lands to aid in the construction of the railroads for which they are to be given will have the effect, not only to enhance the value of the lands in the State of Wisconsin, but, as I have said, it will bring to the Government ready purchasers for the land which it reserves for itself, and settlers for the land; thus the Government will be greatly the gainer by the proposed grants; and its effects upon the Atlantic cities will be obvious to every one. As I have said, it brings directly in contact the Atlantic ports of the Union with the resources which may be developed by the consequent improvement and settlement of central and northern Wisconsin. With these remarks, I leave the matter in the hands of the House.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I should be very glad if the House would, just for one moment, give their attention to this subject. I understand that this bill has been but just reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. It is a Senate bill, passed by that body, received here, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. It was this morning reported back by that committee to the House.

Mr. SMITH. So I understand it. It has been referred to a committee of this House, and only just now reported back with an amendment. It has never before been laid upon our tables.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] has yielded the floor altogether?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio did conclude his speech, and took his seat. The gentleman from Virginia is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES. Then I hope the gentleman from Virginia will, before he concludes his remarks, move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMITH. That is just what I propose to do.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask my colleague to yield me the floor, to enable me to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. DISNEY] a question.

Mr. SMITH yielded the floor for that purpose.

Mr. LETCHER. I understand there are, in all, some two hundred bills of this character, proposing to donate the public lands in quantities from half a million to two or three millions at a time.

I desire to make this suggestion to the gentleman, which I hope will be acceptable to him—that we should take all these bills together, and consider and discuss them fairly, when we shall have had an opportunity to examine them all. What objection can the committee have to that?

Mr. DISNEY. I do not understand the gentleman's point.

Mr. LETCHER. I will repeat my suggestion. I understand that there are some two or three hundred of these bills at this end of the Capitol, or at the other, or at the two combined, and that they propose to donate from five hundred thousand to two or three millions of acres each for the purposes of these improvements. Now, my inquiry of the gentleman is this: Why cannot all of these bills be reported at one time, and directed to be printed, so that we may have an opportunity to investigate them, and some time fixed for their consideration and discussion in this House?

Mr. DISNEY. The very idea which the gentleman from Virginia suggests was one of the very first ideas that suggested itself to the Committee on Public Lands with reference to these bills. We were animated by a most anxious solicitude to have as many of them before us as we possibly could before we came to any decision on the subject; but they came in in such numbers that we found it utterly impossible to adopt any such idea as that suggested by the gentleman.

There is one idea involved, rather than expressed, in the remarks of the gentleman, which I desire to notice. He speaks of the multitude of these bills, and the amount of land involved in each. Well, now permit me to state to the gentleman that he need not entertain any very great alarm or apprehension as to the extent to which the Committee on Public Lands of this House will go in that regard. I am not authorized to make any such declaration; but upon a full view of the present state of the facts, having reference to all the bills now before the committee, and which will probably be presented, I think I shall not err a great deal when I say that the committee will not probably report to this House bills embracing lands to a greater amount than fifteen or twenty millions of acres in the whole; and that will only give to each of these States an amount equal to that which has been granted to the State of Illinois.

Mr. LETCHER. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands suggests that I need not be at all alarmed at the idea that the committee are going very far in disposing of the public lands, for that he thinks the probability is that they will not grant more than fifteen or twenty millions at a time.

Mr. DISNEY. In the whole.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, sir, they have begun, in this bill, with two millions and a half acres. It will not take long to make up fifteen or twenty millions at that rate.

Mr. DISNEY. That may be.

Mr. LETCHER. There are now two or three hundred of these bills before the committees of the two Houses, and others are being daily presented; and I should like to know what proportion of the public lands they embrace. My suggestion to the chairman of the committee grew out of the fact that I wanted to see all these bills together, in order to ascertain whether there are public lands enough to supply all these grants.

Mr. SMITH, (resuming.) I think the House will, at least, admit that I have granted very liberal indulgence to the gentlemen who have interrupted me. I rise now merely for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the real importance of this question. Will the House act deliberately upon the question before it? Will they seriously and intelligibly consider the bills reported for their adoption?

The bill is one from the Senate; and, as I remarked before, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which reported it back with amendments. The bill, then, now for the first time on our table, is to be definitely acted upon. I ask this House—I ask every member on this floor—if they are able to act intelligibly on the bill? Do they know its features? Have they any more information on the subject than that afforded by the chairman of the committee who reported it? Have they been able to look over the printed bill which has been laid on our desks? And, in the name of common sense, will this body of Representatives of the people act on such an important question, involving such serious principles, without being intelligibly informed of what it is doing? Yet we are called on to do it; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] gets up here gravely, and with his usual intelligent manner, and seems to consider, as a matter of course, that the bill will be passed. I think that this House ought not to countenance such a proceeding.

If we go on in this way, as my colleague over the way remarked, we shall not have land enough to satisfy the demands made on it. We have the homestead bill, which is to satisfy the wants of half a million a year. It is difficult to tell what amount of land will be required for that purpose. We have another bill to satisfy the soldiers who have been engaged in the public defense in the war of 1812, and the various Indian wars. We are informed by the Secretary of the Interior, that to carry out the provisions of that bill, some eighty-three millions of acres of the public domain must be disposed of. If you give all the railroads the land which they ask, these objects of your bounty, involved in the bills to which I have referred, will have nothing but the cuttings of the public domain. But the question, I again say, is this: Will this House act on this bill without opportunity being afforded members to thoroughly investigate and properly understand it? Believing that it will not, I now move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DOWDELL. I am a friend to the railroad system; but if this bill be now forced to its passage, I shall be compelled to vote against it. I want these matters investigated. There is but one rule to be applied in the disposition of this matter; and that is, we are to act the part of a wise trustee; and the road that does not come within the line of that policy ought not to be patronized. How, then, are we to determine without investigation?—and how can we investigate unless the bill be sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that we may all have an opportunity of understanding the facts?

This system, at best, is unequal in its operation. The public domain has been acquired by the common treasure of the whole Union; and while I hail from the State in which a great portion of the land is public land, I am unwilling to give my support to any policy which would operate unjustly to the older States of the Union.

I am for equality—it is democratic. It is contrary to all democratic principles to make any distinction in the disposition of these public lands. The granting of alternate sections to railroads proceeds on the principle that the remaining land will be enhanced, and thereby that the Treasury of the Government will receive no detriment.

Now, sir, let these grants for roads be investigated. Let every bill be thoroughly examined; and I again say, if this one be now forced to its passage, that I shall be constrained to vote against it. I have introduced a bill for a like purpose; it has been carried on the Calendar, and is now before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I am willing that it shall be investigated; and if it should turn out that it comes not within this line of policy, I am willing to see it defeated. I shall not vote for any measure which would do injustice to the old States of this Union. I must be satisfied that the remaining lands shall be enhanced in value, and that the Treasury of the United States shall receive no detriment. I am opposed to this policy, and there are other friends of mine in this House who are also opposed to it, and who will vote against this measure if it be put directly on its passage. I therefore move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and on that I ask the previous question.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion for the previous question already pending, made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. DISNEY. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw his call for the previous question, to enable me to make a statement.

Mr. DOWDELL. I will do so, if the gentleman from Ohio will renew it.

Mr. DISNEY. Of course I will.

The SPEAKER. Is the demand for the previous question withdrawn?

Mr. DOWDELL. I have consented to withdraw it on the ground that it be renewed by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COBB obtained the floor.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to make a statement, Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama, not having spoken, has a right to the floor; and if he insists upon it, the Chair must so decide, under the rule.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I regret that my colleague, [Mr. DOWDELL,] who, I am perfectly satisfied, is determined to do what he believes to be right, has not investigated the case to his entire satisfaction, so as to enable him to determine whether he will vote against it, or for it, on its merits.

A MEMBER. There has not yet been time to investigate it fully.

Mr. COBB. It has been a question before Congress for several sessions. I have been, from the commencement of this Congress, disposed to refer everything to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or to the Committee of the Whole House, as the case might be. I advocated that policy at an early day of the session; and I thought that it was generally adopted. But since action was taken on the question then, I have seen bill after bill reported here, and put upon its passage. I believed, sir, that that was the fixed determination of the House.

It is due to my constituents, to this House, and to myself, to say that when I reported a bill proposing to grant to the State of Alabama lands for the purpose of constructing a railroad therein, I embraced in that report my colleague's bill. He then urged upon me to procure it a final and favorable report, believing the principle of it correct. I am satisfied that the gentleman then investigated this very measure, now under discussion, as thoroughly as he has investigated his own, and which investigation enabled him to arrive at the conclusion that it was correct. And I am satisfied that, when he has considered it, he will not hesitate for a moment to support this measure with his whole heart, and with that ability which distinguishes him. I believed, sir, as I said before, that it was a determined and fixed policy of the House to refer all bills; and from this consideration, I did not insist that the bill providing for grants of lands to the State of Alabama should be then considered, but be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. Speaker, my opinion is to-day, that if this policy of putting bills on their passage immediately be pursued, the bill to which I have referred has gone where it will never again be resurrected. But shall I do injustice to the applicants in this case, because, perhaps, those cases in which I was interested have been injuriously affected by the action of the House—its previous determination to have all questions referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I am not one, Mr. Speaker, who is disposed to oppose a just measure, because I failed to secure justice in regard to a case equally meritorious, in which I was interested.

Do justice to all mankind, and trust to their liberality to do justice to you. I am going to vote for this measure. I am going to vote that it shall be considered now, and considered fairly and properly. If there are gentlemen upon this floor who have not maturely considered the matter, I am perfectly willing that the consideration of it may be postponed for a very short time, for the purpose of enabling them to satisfy themselves of its particular bearings.

I have so considered it as to satisfy myself of its justness; and I believe that the provisions of this bill embrace the principles, merely, involved in all the grants heretofore made to the various States, since we have commenced this system of making grants for railroads. Why do I say that? A large portion of these roads provided for in this bill—as I could exhibit to you, if I had a map before me—runs through a portion of the public lands remote from settlements, and which are not yet brought into market. The lands through which these roads pass, and which will not be taken up by the roads, will be increased in price to two dollars and a half per acre. The Government will sell the lands contiguous to the roads at that price, and, consequently, will be benefited thereby; whereas, in all probability, other lands, which lie near some of the roads, to aid in the construction of which we have made grants, will not be worth two dollars and a half an acre, and cannot be sold by the Government for that sum. Therefore, I believe all the reasons which have supported the grants we have made to other roads, will more effectively apply to this than to them.

The result will be a benefit to the General Government; and I am going to support this policy with all my heart and strength. But, sir, while I do this, I am determined, by any action of mine, not to avoid the State of Alabama—my own adopted State. Her bills are upon the Calendar; and if they are to sleep there, while this House determines to pass the bills for Wisconsin and other States, as reported by the committee, let it be so; but I shall appeal, in due time, to this House to do justice to all the States.

Illinois, under grants made a few years ago, received two millions five hundred thousand acres of the public domain. It has been the policy of the Committee on Public Lands thus far—and I trust they will endeavor to carry it out—to bring the other States up to an equality with Illinois, and to make two millions five hundred thousand acres of land the maximum amount which they will grant to other States.

If this policy is adopted, though we may not have, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] says, enough land to meet the three hundred bills, as he says—

Mr. LETCHER, (interrupting.) How many are there, then?

Mr. COBB. Not one third as many as the gentleman said. I say, if we carry out the principle which we have determined upon, and give to every State, including all she has heretofore received, the amount of two millions five hundred thousand acres of land, to put them on an equality with Illinois, we shall only do justice to them all. What is there in this course that gentlemen need be so much alarmed at? We are determined that no State, including what she has heretofore received, shall in any event receive over two millions five hundred thousand acres, and we intend to confine every one of them to that amount.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman from Alabama permit me to address a question to him? How does the gentleman propose to enforce his rule? Suppose the present Committee on Public Lands limit this year the grants to two millions and five hundred thousand acres; I ask, would they not come back here next Congress and advocate another grant?

Mr. COBB. So far as I am myself concerned, perhaps I might do so, if I believed it would promote the interests of the General Government, not only if the individual States receiving these millions of acres, but the old States, that during former days took it all to themselves, and that are now refusing to make to their younger sisters similar grants of the public lands.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I do not intend to enter into the consideration of the policy involved in the measure now before the House, but I desire to repeat what I have said heretofore upon various occasions, as to the propriety or impropriety of putting bills upon their passage, when they come from committees. I must confess that I cannot see the evils which many gentlemen seem to see in such a course of proceeding upon the part of the House. I do not intend to impugn the motives of those gentlemen who take the ground that this bill, and similar bills, ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I do say, that the effect of such a course of policy is to throw all those measures into a vortex, from which they will never be relieved. Everybody knows that the great mass of business upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union never will be reached, and never can be disposed of.

But suppose you make this bill a special order in Committee of the Whole? What will be the course of things then? Suppose you appropriate a week for its discussion, and you will either have a debate upon the Nebraska question, or have a discussion among my good friends, the Hards and Softs of New York; or you will have a discussion as regards the whole policy of the Government, and this will all take place upon this particular bill, if it shall be made the special order in Committee of the Whole. I do not see the necessity for any postponement of this question. Should it be postponed? The question is a mere simple one; the policy of appropriating lands for railroad purposes in different States has been discussed over and over again. It has been investigated; and gentlemen upon all sides of the House have doubtless made up their minds upon the question of the constitutionality and good policy of making grants of land for the purpose of constructing railroads; so that I do not see that it requires much time upon the part of any gentleman of this House to consider that question.

Then another question is raised as to the propriety of the location of this road. I suppose that a speech or two of an hour's length upon the part of gentlemen who understand the question, would enlighten the whole House in regard to it, and enable them to make up their minds; and I suppose, after a debate of two or three hours, confined to the real point involved in the bill, that the House would be just as well prepared to vote upon the question as if we were to debate it a week. Entertaining that opinion, I hope that we shall now take action upon the bill; and I shall vote for or against it, as gentlemen will satisfy me that it is right or wrong. I do not see that anything is gained by postponing action upon this bill and referring it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. We should lose time by that course, and I doubt whether the House would be benefited or further enlightened by any debate which might take place there. There is no rule requiring that this bill, or that any other bill, unless it contains an appropriation of money, should go to the Committee of the Whole. We violate no rule of the House or of propriety by taking action upon the bill now. I understand that the gentleman who reported the bill desires to bring the debate to an immediate close.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee how it is possible that a person who has not read the bill, or looked into the amendments, as reported, can act intelligibly upon the question now before us?

Mr. STANTON. I think that the bill has been lying upon our tables for two or three days.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. I call the attention of the House to the following section of the bill:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of by said State only in the manner following, that is to say, that a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty (120) sections, and included within a continuous length of twenty miles of said road or branch, may be sold; and when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any twenty continuous miles of said road or branch is completed, then another like quantity of land hereby granted may be sold; and so from time to time until said road and branch are completed; and if said road or branch road is not completed within ten years, no further sales shall be made, and the land unsold shall revert to the United States."

Now, if this be a pattern for all the bills of this character which are to be brought in here; if we are to authorize the State in which the land is granted, to dispose of one hundred and twenty sections of land, and then abandon the project altogether and build no railroad, I cannot vote for such a bill. If the bill be amended so as to obviate this objection, however, so far as I can now see, I will vote for it.

Mr. STANTON. I am not now discussing the merits of the bill, nor do I now propose to express any opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of its particular provisions. I have heretofore voted for many of these railroad bills, and I know of no reason why I should not continue to vote for them. I will not say whether this bill is judicious in all its respects or not; that is not the question we are to decide. I am opposed to the proposition to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I do not believe we gain anything in the investigation of these bills by postponing that investigation, unless it is in peculiar cases. I do not believe that we work any injury or mischief by considering these cases when they first come up. I believe that you will double the amount of useless work and unprofitable discussion by sending this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The same things will be brought up over and over again; you will have over again all the discussion that we have had this morning, and a great deal more that will not be pertinent to the bill, and the effect, in my judgment, will be, in all probability, to defeat the bill.

A MEMBER. It ought to be defeated.

Mr. STANTON. It may be that it ought to be defeated, but after sufficient intelligent investigation of it. The House may as well defeat it now as at any other time, if that is to be its fate.

Mr. DISNEY rose to obtain the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, also rose at the same time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio having spoken once upon the subject, the Chair awards the floor to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DISNEY. I do not desire to make an argument, but I merely wish to remind the Chair that I have not spoken upon the motion now pending to commit the bill. I will, however, ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield me the floor to make one or two statements, and first to inform the House that the form and provisions of this bill are designed by the Committee on Public Lands as a model, which will be observed and applied to every bill which they introduce into the House, proposing to donate alternate sections of the public lands to aid in the construction of railroads. The Senate Committee on Public Lands have also agreed to the same form; and all the bills of this character which are introduced into both Houses will, therefore, conform in their provisions precisely to the one now under consideration.

Another fact which I desire to state is, that if the House refer these bills to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take their places upon the Calendar, it is perfectly obvious that they will never be reached in their order, and would not if the House were to continue in session for twelve months.

Mr. LETCHER, (Mr. JONES still holding the floor.) Will the gentleman allow me to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. JONES. I would, if the question did not have to be followed by an answer.

Mr. LETCHER. Only a single moment. I desire to know of the gentleman from Ohio if these railroad companies have been chartered by the Legislature of Wisconsin?

Mr. DISNEY. They have.

Mr. LETCHER. I understand that the object is to make the appropriation of land, and then get the Legislature to grant a charter. I suppose from that fact that the road never would be made at all unless Congress furnish the means.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to reply to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman will have a whole hour to reply.

Mr. DISNEY. I only wish to reply to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Virginia. He asks if the roads have been chartered. I am advised that they have been, but the gentleman will remember that this is not a grant to companies; it is a grant of lands to a State for a particular purpose.

Mr. JONES. I cannot give way for debate; I must claim the floor.

Mr. FULLER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. JONES. No, sir, I cannot. My position with regard to these bills making grants of lands for railroad purposes is known. My general position with regard to the putting of bills upon their passage when reported from the committees is also known. I think that, as a general rule, when bills are reported here from committees, they should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or to a Committee of the Whole House, so that each and every member of this House may have an opportunity, not only of examining and understanding the bills, but of proposing such amendments to them as he may think right.

I concede that there are bills so clearly and manifestly right in themselves, containing, perhaps, but a solitary proposition, that when they are reported here, the House may properly, by unanimous consent, put them upon their passage. But, in the case of a bill of this sort, involving a grant of hundreds of thousands, if not millions of dollars' worth of property, and involving, too, principles of the very highest importance, I suppose all will agree with me that it is next to a moral impossibility that a committee of nine gentlemen, five of whom compose a majority and quorum of the committee, can prepare a bill of this sort which, in all its features, will meet with the approbation and sanction of a majority of this House.

I am opposed to the general principles and features of this bill, yet if it is to pass, there are provisions in it which I wish to have altered and amended; but a motion has been made to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and consequently no proposition to amend it is in order.

One of the provisions of the bill, which I wish to see amended, is the second section, which provides that the sections or parts of sections of land which, by this grant, shall remain to the United States, within six miles on each side of the road or branch road, shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of public lands when sold, nor shall said land become subject to private entry until it shall have been first offered at public sale at the increased price.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I would inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee if he will vote for the bill if that section is amended?

Mr. JONES. I will tell the gentleman whether I will vote for the bill or not when I am called upon to give my vote. Now, however much I may be opposed to the bill in its general features, I am, if possible, more opposed to the principle which that section proposes to establish than I am to the principal object and design of the bill. What is the effect of this second section? It is to give each alternate section of this public land, and then to double the price of what remains, in order that the Treasury of the United States shall not suffer loss by the donation. Suppose we give three quarters out of each section, and then provide that the remaining quarter shall not be sold for less than five dollars per acre? We would give the road three times as much land as is proposed by the bill; and when we had sold the remaining quarter at five dollars per acre, your Treasury would be just as full, just as rich as if we had sold the entire body of the land at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. But what is the effect? It is to tax the settlers. It is to tax the cultivators of the soil within six miles of the line of the road for the benefit of its company. It is to make the cultivators of this land pay the amount of money which shall be necessary to construct the road for the benefit of a few corporators who own stock in it.

But, said the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] who reported this bill, it does not propose to give land to the company. Neither did the Illinois bill propose to give land to the company; but what was done by that State? What did the Legislature of that State do when this Government had given it the land lying along the lines of its railroads? Did they sell those lands, and invest the proceeds in the stock of roads for the benefit of the State? Did they require that this land should be invested for the benefit of the people? My understanding is that they gave the land to the company who were to construct the road. I have seen it stated, but I do not know how true it may be, that some $350,000 worth of stock had been sent to the family of one gentleman, who was a stockholder of that road. Perhaps he had not paid as many dollars for that stock.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Illinois. The stock was unpaid stock.

Mr. JONES. I saw it stated, also, that they are selling the alternate sections which were given to the gentleman's State, and by that State to a company, for prices which will construct the road and leave a surplus. I do not know how that may be, however.

Mr. RICHARDSON. With the gentleman's permission, I will make a single suggestion. If the company are selling their lands at these high prices, which I presume is true, the actual settlers, who paid two dollars and fifty cents per acre for their land, and which the gentleman from Tennessee seems to think a great hardship, are enabled to sell it at the same high price.

I desire to call the gentleman's attention to another thing. The State of Illinois did not grant the land to the company absolutely without consideration. They received each year, as a consideration for that grant, so much of the proceeds of the work—

Mr. DISNEY, (interrupting.) Seven per cent.

Mr. JONES. What is the amount?

Mr. DISNEY. Seven per cent. of the gross proceeds of the work.

Mr. JONES. Seven per cent. Well, Mr. Speaker, suppose the sale of this land produces money enough to construct the road, if the State had the proceeds, and had invested it in the stock herself, it seems to me that, instead of getting seven per cent., the dividend declared by the company, she would have got five, six, seven, eight, or ten per cent. profit, which might have been made, and would have been made on the entire investment in the work.

Mr. DISNEY. Will the gentleman from Tennessee allow me to read for his information, and for that of the committee, an extract from the report?

Mr. WENTWORTH. I would remind the gentleman that the State could not have done so at the time, having had to break down—

Mr. JONES. Well, I suppose, if she had got the money out of these lands, she could have broken up again.

Mr. DISNEY. If the gentleman from Tennessee will permit me, I will read an extract from the report of the commissioner, with reference to the expense and operations of the railroad. It is as follows:

"To afford these settlers an opportunity of making selections, the lands along the proposed route of the road were, for a short period, withdrawn from the market, most of them being of little value to the States where they are, or to the General Government, until the grants were made, and till it was ascertained that the road would be constructed; and they were then bought up with avidity, and are now considered as the most choice and valuable."

The commissioner goes on with his statement:

"During the half year ending the 31st December, 1850, the quantity of land sold and located within the district traversed by the road was 342,000 acres; and the alternate sections which were reserved to the United States were released from the reservations and brought into market in the months of July, August, and September; and during that and the next succeeding quarter, 1,274,000 acres were sold—an increase over the corresponding half year next preceding the construction of the road of over 932,000 acres—which the General Government sold in addition, in consequence of the location of the road and of the grant."

Mr. JONES. That may be all very true, and I doubt not it is; but who was it that purchased these lands? Does the gentleman [Mr. DISNEY] pretend, or will any other gentleman pretend, that these lands were sold by their former occupants, by those persons who intended to settle on them, and to cultivate them?

These lands, sir, were, I presume, sold to persons who bought them on speculation; and it would not alter the fact—as I understand it—that this increased price, under this section, is a tax upon those who shall settle on these lands, who shall cultivate them; and that the benefit thereof shall inure to the capitalists who hold stock in the road. I am told, sir, however, that—

Mr. RICHARDSON, (interrupting.) Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. JONES. I have no objection, sir, to allow him to correct me, if I am in error.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would state to the gentleman from Tennessee that my understanding about that matter is this, that nine tenths of these lands which were sold by the General Government at these enhanced prices went into the hands of the actual settlers. The town sites, the depôts, and such places as these, passed into the hands of the speculators; but the balance passed into the hands of the occupants themselves, of those who are either settled there now or intend to settle there.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, if the land is bought by the actual settlers at this rate of two and a half dollars per acre, I ask the gentleman from Illinois if this additional one dollar and a quarter is not paid by these settlers for the acre of land because the road runs alongside of it?

He is required to pay four hundred dollars for the one quarter section because you have given the quarter section adjoining his to the railroad. If you had not done that he could have purchased his quarter section for two hundred dollars. Now, sir, suppose you let the Government sell all the land for one dollar and a quarter per acre, and then, when these lands are sold, let the men owning them pay the additional two hundred dollars in stock to a railroad company, then their land will be worth two dollars and a half per acre—

Mr. McMULLIN, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMULLIN. I do not understand that the House has determined to consider and dispose of this bill at the present time. I suggest, most respectfully—

Mr. JONES. I did not yield to allow the gentleman to make a speech. I supposed he merely desired to ask a question.

Mr. McMULLIN. Very well.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, if the Government would sell all these lands at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents, and then, when the owners shall believe that it is their interest to locate and construct a railroad through their country, and that it would enhance the value of their lands, let them, in the exercise of their rights and their discretion, contribute this two hundred dollars per section in addition to the price paid for the land, and invest that in railroad stocks; they would then have their land, and have two hundred dollars invested in stock, upon which they would receive the interest or dividends which would accrue from the operation of the road.

I am told by my friend from Illinois [Mr. RICHARDSON] that this was not an absolute grant by the State of Illinois, to that company, of the immense grant of land given to that State, but that the company is required to pay to the State seven per cent. upon the gross proceeds of that road. I do not know what these lands will sell for; but suppose for about $5,000,000; and suppose that would be sufficient to construct that road. Suppose, further, that the gross proceeds of that should be ten per cent., it would amount to $500,000. Upon that, the State of Illinois would receive seven per cent., instead of getting the entire lands, and the entire gross proceeds, less the amount to defray the expenses of the road during that time.

Now, sir, as I said before, as much as I am opposed to the general principle of giving away these lands, I am more opposed, if possible, to increasing the sections reserved by the Government, and doubling the price thereon. I ask my friends from Illinois, [Mr. RICHARDSON,] from Wisconsin, [Mr. EASTMAN,] from Iowa, [Mr. HENN,] and my friends from every other new

State in which public lands are situated, how they can reconcile their consistency in supporting this principle with their support of that other principle for which they have been contending for years and years, and in the support of which I have aided them, and in which I am now ready to go with them? I allude to the principle of graduating the price of the public lands. How can they reconcile the principle of the graduation of the price of the public lands with this principle of doubling the price of the sections retained by the Government?

There is, sir, another feature in this bill which I think should be amended. The bill provides—

"That the said railroad and branch shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll and other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States."

Just after the word "troops," I should like to have inserted the words "and the mails of the United States." I think that if this Government give the land out of which the means for constructing railroads can be realized, that it is but just and proper that these railroads should, at least, carry the mails as well as the troops, and such other property as the Government may require, free of charge in all time to come.

Mr. EASTMAN. I will cite the gentleman from Tennessee to the fifth section.

Mr. JONES. I have looked at the fifth section, and it is not exactly what I think it ought to be. If the amendment I have proposed was inserted, I should then move to strike out the fifth section, which reads as follows:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the United States mail shall be transported over said railroad and branch road, under the direction of the Post Office Department, at such price as Congress may by law direct: Provided, That until such price is fixed by law the Postmaster General shall have the power to determine the same."

Now that provision contemplates that the prices must be fixed by Congress upon this particular road; and until they fix such prices, the Postmaster General is to determine what shall be paid this company for carrying the mails upon it. As I said before, I desire to see this section stricken out, and a provision inserted in the third section providing for the transportation of the mails free of cost, as the troops and other property of the United States are transported. It was not my intention, when I got the floor, to enter into a discussion of the merits of this bill. I do not feel myself competent to do so at this time; but I feel it due to myself that I should make a few remarks touching the proposed passage of this bill without reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The commencement of this policy kept this House from considering all other business, except railroad grants, for about six months of the first session of the last Congress. If it be adopted again at this session, I know not when we shall get through them. How many railroad bills the Committee on Public Lands may have I know not; but we must take them as they present them. They cannot be amended in this House. You see from the situation of this one that they can be passed under the operation of the previous question, after short explanatory speeches by the gentlemen who reported them. I do not know how many bills my friend from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] may have ready for action when this one shall be successfully disposed of here. I know that some have been reported, and have gone to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. But pass this one, and how easy it will be for the friends of these various propositions—even those which have been reported and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—to get up other bills in the committee, something different, but immaterially so, from those already reported and referred, bring them in here, and pass them upon the report of the committee without opportunity for discussion, and without opportunity for amendment, or proposition even for amendment.

I think sound policy requires of the House that, if we intend to give all the business a fair chance, we should refer these bills to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Why, it is the general impression here now, that when bills are referred to the Committee of the Whole they are lost.

Mr. DEAN, (interrupting.) I rise to a privileged question. With a view of moving to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. JONES. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that motion, and I will finish what I have to say in a minute.

Mr. DEAN. Does the gentleman intend to move the previous question before he takes his seat?

Mr. JONES. I do not think I shall; but I will not occupy more than a minute more with my remarks. I merely wish to state that every bill in the Committee of the Whole is in the hands of a majority of that committee. The rule is as plain as anything can make it; when you go into Committee of the Whole, and the Calendar comes up for consideration, if any member desires to pass by the first bill which is called up in its order by the chairman, he moves that it be passed over. The majority may direct that it shall be passed over, and the next bill comes up, which the majority may also pass over, and so on, until they come to the one they wish to reach, and which the majority are disposed to take up. The only exceptions to this rule are general appropriation bills, and bills for raising troops, &c., in time of war. Happily, we have none of this latter class at this time; and I see no difficulty in getting at these bills in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, whenever the majority may be disposed to take them up.

Mr. SKELTON obtained the floor.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot take the floor from the gentleman from New Jersey for that purpose.

Mr. DEAN. I suppose the morning hour has expired, and that it is in order to move to proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. DEAN. I make the motion, then; and I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was put; and, upon a division, 44 rose in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair) announced that the motion was not carried.

Mr. DEAN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. DEAN and VAIL appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes not counted.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table; and, being put, it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. SKELTON, (resuming.) When the bill now under consideration was first presented by the Committee on Public Lands, I was anxious that it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but perceiving that there is a disposition on the part of the House, or at least on the part of the friends of the bill, to urge its immediate passage, and discussion having taken place, I feel constrained, on this occasion, to offer a few remarks in opposition to appropriations of this kind. I thought at first of raising a question of order upon this bill; but that question having been heretofore raised and decided adversely, I will state the reason why I believe it ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The bill contains an appropriation of public lands. The rules of the House require that all bills containing appropriations, shall go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The decision of the House, heretofore made, is that appropriations of public lands are not appropriations of money, and therefore do not come under that rule. Now, I believe that distinction not to be valid.

But I have another objection to the bill. It contains an appropriation of lands to aid in the construction of internal improvements. I believe that lands are the same as money; indeed I believe that they are much more valuable than money. When we expend the public treasure of the country and exhaust the amount in the hands of the United States Treasurer, the loss rests with the amount of money expended; but when we appropriate and dispose of all the lands of the United States, it exhausts the supplies, and we have no means of returning to the people of the United States that inheritance which is more valuable than anything which has ever descended to the American people save liberty itself. If the view which I take be correct, these appropriations are unconstitutional. I do not propose, however, on this occasion, to enter into a discussion of the constitutional question. Such discussions have degenerated to such a condition that the House is neither willing to listen or attach weight to them.

[Here a message was received from the Senate, by the hand of Mr. MACHEN, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles, and requesting its concurrence therein:

S. 228. "An act for the relief of settlers on lands reserved for railroad purposes;" and

S. R. 12. "A resolution accepting certain volumes and medals presented by her Britannic Majesty's Government to the United States."]

Mr. SKELTON, (resuming.) I was about to remark, that the distinction between the money and the land of the United States was in favor of the latter. I will say here, that I would sooner appropriate money out of the public Treasury for the construction of these roads than I would appropriate the public land. When that land is exhausted, we have no other; and the effect of that exhaustion will be felt in the country for hundreds of generations to come. For what purpose is the public land intrusted to the care of the representatives of the people? Is it not, sir, that it should be cultivated? that it should be settled? that it should yield sustenance for our kind, and likewise, that it should be productive of health, of commerce, of trade to the whole country?

This Government is in its infancy. The policy about to be adopted, whether correct or otherwise, will be felt for generations yet to come. Look back at the history of our country. Look at the brief period which has elapsed since the first settlements were made on this land. Look at the rapid strides which civilization, agriculture, and the arts are making toward the Pacific ocean. Consider that the child is now born who will see this country, if its progress in prosperity be as great in the future as it has been heretofore, covered with a population of 200,000,000. Is it of no consequence, then, whether this land go into the hands of corporations or that of the actual settler? I might dwell on this point at length; but I do not propose to make any extended remarks at this time. All I desire is, simply to call the attention of honorable members to the result of this action on the future prosperity of the Union. I object to these appropriations because they are unjust; and any injustice done by the Congress is an injury to the country.

Our institutions and our Government must rest on the eternal and immutable principles of justice. If we want to sap the foundations of liberty, destroy the morals of the people, and the happiness of our common kind, then overlook the demands of justice, and your object is accomplished. It is unjust to the older States to appropriate these lands for internal improvements in the new States. We claim a common inheritance in these lands. I might dwell on that point; but I shall pass it by saying that it is unjust to the new States, it is unjust to the States where the land is located, and, if anything, more unjust to them than the older States. What will be the effect, this land in the hands of corporations? It will be to increase its price, and put it into the market; and one of the weightiest objections to this bill was that urged by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] that it increased the price of the land and excluded the poor toiling millions from settling on it.

But, sir, it has been remarked—and the only argument that I have heard in favor of this appropriation, is—that the increased price of the remaining lands counterbalances the value of that granted away; and that, therefore, the General Government suffers no loss by the transaction.

[Some interruption having taken place, owing to the noise in the Hall, Mr. SKELTON suspended his remarks for a moment. Resuming them, he said:]
